The court also erred in the opinion set forth in the sixth exception. The materiality of an alteration is, I take it, matter for the decision of the court; and, moreover, if it had appeared, that the alteration was made by Mayberry, or any other by his procurement, then he could never recover upon this contract, nor could he be permitted to establish it by any other evidence, or even to avail himself of the contract according to its original and true character. For the principle long since established as to bonds, Pigot's case, 11 Co. 27, is extended, by recent decisions, to other instruments, upon the principle, that no man shall be permitted to take the chance of gain, by the commission of a fraud, without running the risk of loss in case of detection. Master v. Miller, 4 T. R. 320, 1 Anst. 226, 2 H. Black. 11, S. C. Powell v. Divett, 15 East, 29.

The other judges concurring, judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Husband and Wife—Marriage Articles—Failure to Appoint Trustee—Effect Where Husband Uses Wife's Money in Purchase of Chattels—Case at Bar.—By marriage articles, it is agreed, that, during the coverture, husband and wife shall enjoy their respective estates jointly, but that their estates shall be kept separate and distinct from each other, and that the property then belonging to each, shall remain under the control of each, and that the husband shall claim no part of the wife's estate, and the wife no part of the husband's estate, by virtue of the marriage; but no trustee is appointed to hold the wife's estate for her separate use: during the coverture, a sum of money belonging to the wife before the marriage, came to the husband's hands: he laid it out in chattels, which he declared were his wife's property: the husband dies: HELD, the legal estate in the chattels so purchased, vested in the husband, and at his death devolved to his ex'ors, so that they may maintain detinue for them against the widow.

Detinue for sundry chattels, by James and John Faulkner, executors of Jacob Faulkner deceased, against Sarah Faulkner, his widow, in the circuit court of Halifax. Plea, the general issue. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs.

At the trial, the defendant filed a bill of exceptions to a direction given by the court to the jury, from which it appeared, That before the marriage of the plaintiff's testator, Jacob Faulkner, with the defendant Sarah, in August 1811, marriage articles were entered into between them, whereby it was agreed, that during their joint lives, they should enjoy the estates of each other jointly, but their estates should be kept separate and distinct from each other, and that the property then belonging to each should be under the management and control of the party it belonged to; and, in case the husband should survive, he should not have or claim any part of the wife's estate, real or personal, by virtue of the marriage or otherwise; and, in case the wife should survive, she should not have or claim any part of the husband's estate, real or personal, as his widow or otherwise, nor be entitled to administration of his estate. That, among the property of the wife before the marriage, secured to her by the articles, was a sum of money, which,

256 *after the marriage, came into the hands of the husband; and part of this money was laid out in the purchase of the chattels demanded in the declaration. That the husband, in his lifetime, admitted and declared, that these chattels so purchased with the wife's money, were her property; but he held possession of them during his life, and died in possession thereof; his wife took possession after his death. That, after the purchase of this property, there was still a balance of the wife's money in the husband's hands, which he held till his death; and by his last will and testament, besides giving her some property of his own, he bequeathed as follows—"I give to my wife Sally every species of property with the increase thereof which I received with her, also my negro girl Celia in lieu of 300 dollars of her money, which I have made use of." And proof of these facts having been laid before the jury, the court, on the motion of the plaintiffs, instructed the jury, that if it should find from the evidence, that the chattels demanded in the declaration, were not the property of the defendant at the time of her marriage with their testator, nor the increase of any property that then belonged to her, nor acquired by her since the testator's death, the plaintiffs, his executors, were entitled to recover the chattels in question, notwithstanding that the testator in his lifetime, admitted and declared them to be the property of his wife, the defendant, and that they were purchased after the marriage, with the money belonging to the wife before the marriage, and secured to her separate use by the marriage articles. The defendant excepted to this opinion, and appealed from the judgment to this court.

Leigh, for the appellant.

Johnson, for the appellees.

TUCKER, P. The judgment of the circuit court in this case, was doubtless founded upon the well established distinctions between the principles of law 257 and equity, in relation *to contracts between husband and wife, and to the attaching of the marital rights upon the property of the wife. Had a trustee been appointed by the marriage contract in this case, and the property been conveyed to him, a court of law, looking only to the legal title, would have pronounced that Faulkner's executors could not recover the property, thus conveyed by the wife before marriage with the husband's assent. And a court of equity would have sustained the rights of the wife, because that court recognizes the validity of these antenuptial contracts. But, as no trustee is interposed, the legal title was left in the wife; and, in the eye of the law the marital rights attached immediately upon the marriage. In equity, indeed, the interposition of a trustee, is no longer considered necessary for the wife's protection from the operation of the marital rights; and hence it is very possible that the appellant's title may prove best before another forum. These distinctions, however technical, must be preserved in order to prevent uncertainty and confusion. They have always been rigidly maintained; nor do I find a single case in which, at law, a marriage settlement has availed to secure the property of the wife, without the intervention of a trustee. Nor can the contract, however worded, operate a release at law, though it would be a good release in equity; for it is a first principle as to releases, that they cannot operate upon a right not yet acquired; they always suppose a right in being. 10 Co. 48, a. The judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

The same case is reported in 8 Va. Law Reg. 437.

to his son Jesse Dold, four slaves and 1000 dollars to his daughter Catharine Lawrence, and three slaves and 1000 dollars to his daughter Nancy Morgan, directly and absolutely,—devised and bequeathed as follows: "I give to my friends W. Miller and A. Stuart," two parcels of land, three slaves by name, and 100 dollars, "which land, slaves and money, I request my said trustees to hold in trust for the following purposes, and none other: the land and negroes to be employed and used, and the money put to interest, and the proceeds of the whole to be annually employed for the support and maintenance of my son William, and for the education of his children; to be employed in such way as best to promote the true interest of such family; and, at the death of my said son William and his wife, I direct my trustees or the survivor of them, to sell my said lands and negroes, and divide the proceeds thereof equally among his children then living, and the families of such as may be dead. I give to my said trustees, my negroes [three by name] and 1000 dollars in cash: the negroes to be kept and used, and also the interest of the money, for the support of my daughter Elizabeth Donaldson, and for the maintenance and education of her children, and for no other *purpose whatever; and at the death of my said daughter, I direct that the said negroes and money be equally divided among her children then living, and the families of such as may be dead, such family to receive the ancestor's part. I also give to my trustees my negroes [three, by name] and 1000 dollars in cash; the profits of these negroes, with the interest of the 1000 dollars, I direct may be applied to the maintenance and support of my daughter Martha M'Dowell and her child; and at the death of my said daughter, I direct that said slaves and money be given to her child, or children if she has more than one, and to the children of such as may be dead, if any there be: the above advances, to be made to my said daughter Martha, independent of any claim I may have against the estate of her husband." "I direct my executors to sell on such terms as they may think best, the land on which Robert M'Dowell now lives, and to make conveyances thereof to the purchasers."—And the testator having directed the residuum of his estate to be divided into six equal parts, and given to his son Jesse, and to his daughters Catharine and Nancy, one sixth part, each,—proceeded: "The other sixth parts I direct my trustees above mentioned to receive and apply one sixth part to the use and benefit of my daughter Elizabeth, one sixth part to the use and benefit of my daughter Martha, and the other sixth part to the use of my son William: these parts are severally to be used for the benefit of my said children during their lives, and at their deaths to be divided as their several money legacies are directed to be divided."

The testator's daughter and legatee, Martha M'Dowell, having as yet only one child, a daughter named Eliza, who intermarried with William Wallace, Wallace and wife exhibited their bill in the superiour court of chancery of Staunton, against

Dold's executors, Miller and Stuart the trustees, and Robert M'Dowell and Martha his wife; setting forth the will of the testator Philip Dold; alleging, that the plaintiff

260 Eliza, about the time of the testator's death, while she *was yet an infant, went to reside with an aunt in Huntsville, Alabama, with whom she lived, and by whom she was maintained, till her marriage with Wallace in 1822, and her aunt had a claim against her for the expense incurred in her maintenance, to the amount of 400 dollars; that the plaintiff Eliza, since as well as before her marriage, was entitled to an equal share of the profits of the property bequeathed by the testator's will to the trustees Miller and Stuart, to be applied to the maintenance and support of his daughter Martha M'Dowell and her child; and that the plaintiff's mother Martha claimed, and had received and enjoyed, the whole profits, before as well as since the plaintiff's marriage: and praying, that the executors and trustees might be ordered to render an account of this subject, and of the profits thereof; and a decree, that such part of the profits already received, as the plaintiffs were entitled to, and their just share of the future profits, should be paid to them.

The answers of the defendants,—after representing that Robert M'Dowell, the husband of the testator's daughter Martha was an imprudent man, careless of his wife's comfort, and destitute of the means of maintaining her, that that was the reason of this provision of his will, that his primary object was to provide a support for his daughter, and that the profits of the fund were barely adequate to that object,—submitted the question, as to the construction and effect of the testator's will, to the court; and alleged, that the plaintiff Eliza had of her own accord left her parents, and gone to her aunt in Huntsville, and that, even before her marriage, she was only entitled to support and maintenance out of the profits of the fund, while she lived with her mother.

The chancellor was of opinion, that the testator's will, truly interpreted, did not sustain the claim set up by the bill; that it appeared on the face of the will, to have been the testator's primary object, to provide the means of support for his daughter Martha, as without such provision, she would, in his apprehension, be in danger of want; that the mention he made of her child, did not vest in the child a 261 *substantive claim to a moiety of the profits of the fund during the life of her mother, that part of the provision of the will being satisfied, by regarding her as an object of expense, to which the testator knew his daughter would be subject, during the time her child should remain with her: therefore, he dismissed the bill with costs, but without prejudice to any claim the female plaintiff might afterwards set up to participate in the profits of the trust fund, in case her condition should afterwards require aid from this fund for her support. From which decree the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

The cause was argued by Johnson for the appellants: there was no counsel for the appellees.

CARR, J. This case depends upon the construction to be given to that clause of Philip Dold's will, under which the appellants claim. The case is certainly not clear of doubt; but, after the best consideration I can give it, I strongly incline to think the chancellor's understanding of the will is the true one.

There is nothing technical in the will; the simple inquiry is, what this testator meant by the words he has used? In such an inquiry, I do not think we can derive any aid from reported cases. The testator had six children; two sons and four daughters. He seems to have intended to deal upon the principle of equality, between his sons, and his daughters also; giving to the first, land, slaves and money, to the last, slaves and money. The will is sensibly written; and we easily discern the scheme of the testator running through the whole of it. To one of his sons, he gives his portion, directly and absolutely: but he could not trust the other with property; therefore, he gives his portion to trustees, to be held by them in trust, and the proceeds to be annually employed for the support and maintenance of his son, and for the education of his children; and, after

262 the death of the son and his wife, the fund to be equally divided *among the children. Under this devise, it would not be contended, that the children of the son, after they came to full age, or separated from the family, could come in for any of the annual proceeds of the trust fund; for it is to be applied to the maintenance of the son, and education of his children. The testator's four daughters were all married. There is nothing in the will, or in the record, to shew that one was more the object of his bounty or his affection than the others. He seems to have intended to give them about the same portion; to each three or four slaves and 1000 dollars. Two of his daughters, Nancy and Catharine, had married men in whom he had confidence: the other two, Elizabeth and Martha, had not been so fortunate. This circumstance varied the form of the legacies. To the two first, he gives the slaves and money, directly and simply, saying nothing at all about their children, and shewing that the daughters alone were the objects of his bounty. With the two last, he proceeded differently. He gave to the same trustees, three slaves and 1000 dollars in cash: "the negroes to be kept and used, and also the interest of the money, for the support of his daughter Elizabeth, and for the maintenance and education of her children; and at the death of his daughter, the said negroes and money to be equally divided among her children." Do we not perceive in this bequest, equally as in the others, that his daughter was the object of his bounty? He could not give it to her at once; for then the object of the gift would be defeated, as it would go to her husband; but the trustees were to hold the fund and apply the profits to her support, and the maintenance and education of her children. The maintenance and education of her children, was the object most important to her comfort and happiness; it was a part of the burden she had to bear. If the money had been paid to her at once, her husband might have gotten and diverted it from its destined purpose. The trustees are, therefore, to apply it to the education &c. of the children. But, I presume, nobody would contend, that the children

263 *for any part of these profits, after they were educated and turned out in the world. It is very clear to me, the testator had no such idea: the maintenance and education he contemplated, was during infancy merely, when the mother had to support them. The whole fund was to be theirs at the mother's death. If he had intended, that as each child came of age, he should have his share of the profits paid to him annually, would he not have said so? But such a provision would have defeated his chief object, the support of his daughter during her life. The fund at best was a very small one; not more I should presume than 400 dollars a year. Suppose his daughter had had five or six children, and each was to have his aliquot part; his daughter would starve. Next comes the bequest to his daughter Martha, which I consider precisely like the last, in substance: "I give to my said trustees, my negroes &c. and 1000 in cash: the profits of those negroes, with the interest of the 1000 dollars, I direct may be applied to the maintenance and support of my daughter Martha and her child; and at the death of my daughter, the said slaves and money, to be given to her child or children, if she has more than one &c. the above advances to be made to my said daughter Martha, independent of any claim I may have against her husband." Now, I ask, can we suppose that, under this bequest, the testator intended to vest in the child of his daughter, an equal interest with her mother, in the annual profits of the trust fund? and that when she grew up and married, she would have a right to appropriate this half to herself during her mother's life? I can never believe it. Look at the other provisions of the will. They shew, that it was no part of his scheme to enable the children after they came of age, to claim any part of the profits of the trust fund. His daughter Martha, when he made his will, had but one child, and therefore he mentions the support of her child: suppose she had had, afterwards, four or five children more, did he not mean that they, equally with the one then born, should

264 *for we see, that when he comes to dispose of the fund at her death, it is to her child or children if she should have more than one. He meant the same benefit to all her children, both during her life and at her death; and that benefit was the same sort of support that he had provided for the children of his other daughter and son, who took through the trustees. No matter then, how many children Martha had had, they would have had the same right with the eldest, when they came of age, to have taken, thenceforward, their equal portion of the profits, and thus to have beggared their mother. Could the testator have meant this? The mother then old and sinking in years; the children young and able to make their way in the world; could he have intended to leave his own daughter thus exposed to want? The voice of nature cries out against it. He knew that she would be solely dependent on what he gave, for her bread: he knew this, for we see that her husband then lived on his land, which in another clause of his will he directs his executors to sell, and that this husband was then indebted to him. With this knowledge, would he, even if he had been sure his daughter would have no other child, have given to the one she had, half of the slender pittance he had left her? I cannot think so. But further: immediately following the bequest to Martha, he says "the above advances, to be made to my daughter Martha, independent of any claim," &c. The above advances; what advances? Why, the profits of the negroes, and the interest of the 1000 dollars; those are the immediate antecedents. These advances were to be made to his daughter Martha, and she is to have the whole of them, without any deduction for what her husband owed him. This, to my mind, is the clear meaning of the whole sentence. Again: in the residuary clause, he directs the residue of his estate of every kind to be divided into six parts; of which he gives one to Jesse; one to Catharine, and one to Nancy; then he adds, "I direct my trustees above mentioned, to receive and apply one sixth part to the use and benefit of 265 my daughter Elizabeth, *one sixth part to the use and benefit of my daughter Martha, and the other sixth part, to the use of my son William—these portions are severally to be used for the benefit of my said children during their lives, and at their deaths to be divided as their money legacies are directed to be divided;" shewing that he meant this residuum to stand precisely in the situation of the other legacies: and here we see, the profits were left to his children for their lives, without any participation of their children with them during that period. Neither, therefore, did he intend any participation in the former case. I am for affirming the decree.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. This case is certainly not without difficulty, and the very imposing view which has been taken of it by my brother Carr, naturally gives rise to doubts, about the correctness of the opposite opinion which I shall express. That opinion is, that the clause in this will under consideration, does not give to Martha M'Dowell, the right to the profits and interest of the estate, devised to the trustees, exclusive of her daughter.

I think it obvious, that there is not, in the words of that clause, any direct gift to Martha. There is a trust, indeed, created for her benefit, and that of her child; the testator having expressly created two trustees, and manifested by the terms "may be applied," his intention that those trustees were to receive the proceeds or annual profits of the fund, and apply them to the maintenance and support of his daughter and her child. The trust thus created, if words are to govern us, where they are plain and unequivocal, is a trust not for the support of the daughter only, but of the daughter and her child. Could the trustees have been justified in applying the whole of the profits of the trust fund to the use of the mother, if that mother had unnaturally left her child to suffer, or if they perceived that whatever came to the mother's hands, passed immediately 266 into the father's, *and was wasted by his prodigality, while his family were left unprovided? I think not. Nor can I perceive, how we can get rid of the plain import of the words, unless there is something in the will which shall alter and control them. The case of Robinson v. Tickell, 8 Ves. 142, is a good deal like this; and, though I readily agree that cases upon wills very often confuse instead of elucidating, yet I shall advert to it, as shewing, that where words are not so strong as here, they have been considered as excluding the mother from the absolute interest, and raising an interest in the child. There, the testator bequeathed £2000. reduced annuities, to H. to have the interest during her natural life; remainder to his niece Rebecca for her and her children's use: H. died: Rebecca and her husband having sued for the dividends, the chancellor, speaking of the bequest, said, "The bequest is to Mrs. Robinson in the first place; and if it stopped there, it would be absolute to her. But the will goes on to declare a use; which is for her benefit and that of the children." He, however, directed that the payment should be made, in that case, to the mother and her husband, upon the authority of Cooper v. Thornton, 3 Bro. C. C. 96, 186. That was a case, where a legacy was given to A. to be divided between himself and his family; and the question was whether the payment to A. was a good payment? It was decided to be good. And so, in Robinson v. Tickell, from the relation in which Mrs. Robinson stood to her children, whom the chancellor considered as being cestui que trust as well as their mother, payment was directed to be made to her and her husband. So, in 2 Leon. 221, pl. 280, cited and relied on in Land v. Otley, 4 Rand. 221, 234, A. devised that his lands should descend to his son, but he willed that his wife should take the profits until his full age, for his education and bringing up. It was held that nothing was devised to the wife but a confidence, and she was guardian or bailiff for the infant, which determined by his death.

267 *The first of those cases (Robinson v. Tickell) is stronger in every respect than this; for there, there was a devise to Rebecca, of the interest and dividends, which she was of course to receive, for the use of herself and children. She was the trustee, and the property was to pass through her hands as the conduit. Here, Miller and Stuart are the trustees, and the profits and interest are to be applied by them (as I understand the will) to the maintenance and support of Martha and her child. In that case, there might be a pretence for considering the bequest as a bequest to the mother absolutely, and the reference to her children, as merely indicating one of the motives which led to it. In this, there is no bequest to herself, but a bequest to trustees, equally charged with the maintenance and support of her child as of herself.

The case in Leonard wants, indeed, the characteristic of a beneficial interest in the mother. But still it was a devise that the mother should take the profits for the education and bringing up of the son; and yet it was not considered as a gift to the mother, but only as a trust for the son.

Let us next see, if there is any thing in the will, which controls the plain meaning of the words. The testator had two daughters married, perhaps, to men in whom he had confidence: to these he bequeaths his bounty, directly and without the intervention of trustees. But as to Elizabeth and Martha, what he bequeathed to them was given to trustees (it is supposed) lest it should be wasted by their husbands. Still, if the mother was the only object of his bounty, the testator had only to provide, that the profits should be paid over to her. Why say any thing of the child? He (or rather the scrivener who drew the will, and who was very probably, the intelligent and learned gentleman who first attested it*) has systematically pursued the same language in this clause, and in the devise to Elizabeth; and has used similar language in the devise to William. Why, in all these cases, is he provident about the 268 *families or children of the respective legatees? Because, in relation to his son, he feared that if the whole profits were paid over to him, without some provision for his family, they might be left, as too often happens, to suffer by his thriftlessness. And so with the daughters. But for the provision of the will, the whole of the annual proceeds would be paid at once into the hands of the daughter, who might, under the influence of a thriftless husband, pass it into his hands, to be squandered to the injury and suffering of their little family. Is not the will, in this case, just such as might be expected, if the testator was under the influence of the fear of such evils, and desired to guard against them? I think so.

The clause which provides, that the advances made to Martha, were to be independent of any claim he had against her husband, is fully satisfied, by reference to the interest given her in one half of the profits, and does not require that she should be construed to take the whole. And the residuary clause, so studiously different from that which we have been considering, so far from impugning the construction which the appellants contend for, seems to me to sustain it: for it shews, that the testator meant a different bequest here, and that he or his scrivener well knew how to use different expressions, when they intended different limitations.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the daughter is to be considered as entitled to a portion of the profits of the funds created by the clause in question. I am, however, further of opinion, that under this will, although the trustees might in their discretion have declined to pay the whole profits to Mrs. M'Dowell, and might have themselves applied a due portion for the maintenance and support of her child, if they found the funds misapplied; yet they were, prima facie justified in the payments to the mother, by the relation in which she stood to her child, and all such payments should be held good, so long as the daughter was unmarried. No account should therefore be directed anterior to that 269 period. *For this opinion, I rely upon the cases before cited, of Robinson v. Tickell and Cooper v. Thornton.

It remains only to inquire, whether, if the child took an interest under the will, that interest ceased upon her attaining to maturity, and marrying and leaving the mother? With respect to the portion or shares, which the parties are to take in these bequests for maintenance and support, we have I think no assistance from precedents. In ordinary cases, these terms would most probably extend only to the maintenance and support of a testator's family, during minority: as where he devises that his family shall be kept together and maintained out of his estate; in such a case, the trust must be executed, not upon the principle of giving equal portions to each, but of providing for the family as a judicious parent, or as the testator himself, had he lived, would have done. Such an execution of the trust, a court of equity should enforce, according to the spirit and intention of the testator's will, although it is obvious, that the wants and necessities of the different members of the family, might be often unequal; and sometimes one, and sometimes another, might require unusual advances. In such a case, too, it would depend upon ulterior provisions, whether the members of the family, as they grew up, and married and left the paternal mansion, with a view to a settlement in life, should or should not receive any portion of the revenues for their aid and support. But, in the present case, the testator having by the express provision of his will, placed his daughter and her child upon the same footing; having directed, that the trustees in whom the estate was vested, should apply it to the maintenance and support of both, by the same words; I can see nothing to limit the rights of the one, more than those of the other. If the application of the fund is to be made to the maintenance of the daughter while she lived, it must be, by the same words, extended to her child, while she lived; or if it is to be limited in the case of the child, it must be limited in the case of the mother.

270 *In short, in the construction of this will, where the words are so plain, I do not see what we can do but follow them. For, I ask, if the testator really did mean, what I think he meant, what plainer words could he have used, to convey that meaning? And if this court decides, that these words shall not convey that meaning, what words shall a testator adopt to convey it? It is an important matter. For if a man provides that his wife shall receive the profits of his whole estate for the support of herself and his children, and these words be construed to convey the interest to her, to the exclusion of any distinct and independent right in them; then, if she marries again, the whole estate would go into the hands of a second husband; or if she even remained single, either the children must continue to live with her with their families, or they must be turned adrift without patrimony, if they quit their mother's mansion. These are consequences which I apprehend few testators can contemplate, as the result of a provision for the maintenance and support of their widows and children.

I therefore, am of opinion, that the decree should be reversed; but the other judges concurring in the contrary opinion, it is affirmed.

Wainwright and Others v. Harper.

November, 1831.

Judgments by Default.—Errors in Proceedings.—Jeofails.—In cases of judgments by default, the statute of jeofails does not apply to cure errors and defects in the proceedings.
Same.—Variance between Writ and Declaration.—In such cases, the writ is part of the record; and writ being in assumpsit and declaration in covenant, the variance is fatal.

Upon a supersedeas to a judgment recovered in the circuit court of Dinwiddie by Harper the defendant in error, against the plaintiffs in error, Wainwright, Allgood and Grammer, it appeared that the 271 writ was in assumpsit, and *the declaration in covenant; and the judgment was by default, for want of appearance.

Allison, for plaintiffs in error. In cases of judgments by default for want of appearance, the writ, and the indorsement on it, are necessarily part of the record; Nadenbush v. Lane, 4 Rand. 413. It is now settled, that the statute of jeofails does not apply to cases of judgment by default; Payne v. Britton, 6 Rand. 102. The variance between the writ and the declaration in this case, is fatal; Ming & al. v. Gwatkin, Id. 551.

PER CURIAM. The judgment must be reversed.

272 *Watts and Others v. Kinney and Wife.

[23 Am. Dec. 266.]

November, 1831.

Specific Performance.—Contract by Husband to Sell Wife's Land.—Mutuality.—A husband contracts to sell his wife's land: upon a bill in chancery, by the husband and wife against the purchaser, to compel specific execution of the agreement, it seems, specific execution shall not be decreed, because specific execution could not be decreed at the suit of the purchaser, upon a bill against the husband and wife, to compel her to convey her land, and so the remedies are not mutual.

Judgments.—See monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 423.
Pleading.—Variance between Writ and Declaration.—In Long v. Campbell, 37 W. Va. 669, 17 S. E. Rep. 198, it is said: "In Ming v. Gwatkin, 6 Rand. (Va.) 561, a variance between writ and declaration as to initial of middle name was held fatal. The case is doubtful. Just the contrary was held in Dabney v. Knapp, 2 Gratt. 365, as to difference in names of Samuel P. and Samuel B. Christian. The Ming case was cited, but not followed. Besides, the Ming case was under a statute which did not cure a defect in judgment by default. Hatcher v. Lewis, 4 Rand. (Va.) 152; Wainwright v. Harper, 3 Leigh 370.

Same—Decree Directing, before Wife Executes Deed—Effect.—And, at any rate, upon such a bill for specific execution of such a contract, preferred by husband and wife against the purchaser, a decree for specific execution against the purchaser, before the wife shall have executed a deed conveying the land, though the decree be suspended till she shall execute such a deed, is erroneous.

Judgment against Principal—No Execution Issued—Payment by Sureties—Subrogation.—A judgment is recovered against a principal and his sureties; the judgment creditor sues out no writ, or other execution, within the year; the sureties discharge the judgment: Held, the sureties have a right to be subrogated, in equity, to the benefit of the lien of the creditor's judgment upon the lands of the principal, in preference to a foreign attachment, sued out by another creditor of the principal, after the judgment.

Case Disapproved.—The opinion, in Tate v. Liggett, 2 Leigh, 84, that "a creditor at large procuring a mortgage of his debtor's property, cannot claim as a creditor, or in the double character of creditor and purchaser, but only as purchaser," doubted and disapproved.

The principal case is cited in Fidelity, etc., Co. v. R. R. Co., 82 W. Va. 271, 9 S. E. Rep. 190.

For the following proposition, that a court of equity looks to substance not to form: it looks to the debt which is to be paid, not to the hand which may happen to hold it; that the fund charged with its payment, shall be so applied, whosoever may be the person entitled; and it considers a debt as never discharged until it is discharged by payment to the proper person, and by the proper person, the principal case is cited in *Yancey v. Case Disapproved.—The principal case disapproves that part of the opinion in Tate v. Liggett, 2 Leigh 84, where it is said that a creditor at large procuring a mortgage of his debtor's property, cannot claim as a creditor, or in the double character of creditor and purchaser, but only as purchaser. Installments—Some Not Due—Decree.—Upon a foreign attachment in chancery, to subject lands of the absent debtor, to a debt claimed by the attaching creditor, payable in installments, some of which have, and others have not fallen due, at the time of the decree: Held, the court ought not to direct the sale of the subject, to satisfy more than the installments already due; but should order a sale to satisfy what is due, and hold the creditor's attachment a lien on the subject, for the installments afterwards to fall due.

George Holloway and his sister Elizabeth wife of Nicholas Kinney, being entitled, by devise from an uncle, to a tract of 916 acres of land in Amherst, that is, each to a moiety, and holding the same as tenants in common, a parol contract was made between Kinney and Holloway, whereby Kinney agreed to sell his wife's undivided moiety to Holloway; and, thenceforth, Holloway, who had previously been in possession of the whole tract as one of the tenants in common, continued to hold it as 273 intirely his own. In 1822, *Kinney reduced to writing, the terms of the agreement between him and Holloway, as he understood them, executed it himself, and then left it with L. P. Thompson, in order that he might shew it to Holloway, and that he might also execute it. The agreement, thus written and executed by Kinney, was in these words: "Whereas I, N. Kinney of &c. have heretofore sold to G. Holloway of &c. one moiety of a certain parcel or tract of land lying &c. in Amherst, to which I am entitled in right of my wife, who held the same under the will of H. H. deceased, and the said Holloway and myself having never entered into any written contract as to the terms of said sale, it is hereby declared and understood by the said Kinney and Holloway, that the said Holloway, for the moiety aforesaid, is to pay the said Kinney at the rate of ten dollars per acre, the whole tract containing 916 acres; one moiety of which, at the rate per acre aforesaid, will be equal to the sum of 4580 dollars; which is to be paid in manner following, to wit; the sum of 500 dollars, on or before 1st January next; 1000 dollars on or before the 1st January 1824; 500 dollars, on or before the 1st January 1825; 1000 dollars, on or before the 1st January 1826; 500 dollars, on or before the 1st January 1827; and 1080 dollars, on or before the 1st January 1828. But it is understood, that the said Holloway is at liberty to discharge the installments aforesaid in bonds of good and responsible men residing in the county of Amherst due and bearing interest, none of which bonds in amount to be less than 100 dollars. And it is further understood and agreed, that the said Kinney is to make the said Holloway a good and sufficient title in fee simple, on the said Holloway's securing to him the amount of the purchase money in such manner as shall be deemed safe and secure. If the purchase money aforesaid is paid in bonds, the said Holloway is to assign them in the usual manner, punctually, on or before the time the installments aforesaid, respectively, fall due. For the true performance of the above contract, the parties bind themselves, each

This paper being shewn by Thompson to Holloway, he said, that this draft of the agreement conformed with his understanding of the contract, except that it restricted him as to the bonds he was to assign in payment, to bonds for not less than 100 dollars, and to bonds of persons resident in Amherst; whereas in their parol agreement, there was no such restriction. And he addressed a letter to Holloway, dated, Amherst, 7th September 1822, wherein he said—"I consider myself privileged to assign bonds of any amount in discharge of the payments for the land, and I did not expect to be limited to this county for the payment of them. I have informed Mr. Thompson, that with the exception of these two items, the articles of agreement which you delivered to him, correspond with my ideas of the contract."

Holloway was a deputy of John Warwick sheriff of Amherst, for the years 1820-21 and 1821-22; and Henry Watts and eight others were his sureties bound in his bond to Warwick for the faithful discharge of his office of deputy for the first year, and the same Watts and five others were his sureties bound in his official bond for the second year of his service. In April 1823, a judgment was recovered by Warwick upon a motion against Holloway and Watts and the other five sureties in the bond for the second year, for about 5000 dollars, on account of Holloway's defaults in office during that year; and in June 1823, another judgment was recovered by Warwick against Watts and the other eight sureties in the bond for the first year, for 189 dollars, with damages &c. likewise on account of Holloway's defaults in office during the first year.

275 *Before this last mentioned judgment was recovered, Holloway left Virginia, much indebted on account of his official transactions, and otherwise: in consequence of which, Watts and all the other sureties of Holloway in both his official bonds, on the 17th June 1823, sued out of the superiour court of chancery of Lynchburg, a subpoena against Holloway now absent, and several other persons as garnishees, and among them Kinney and wife, the object of which process was to attach any effects of Holloway in the hands of the garnishees, or debts due him from them, for the attaching creditors. This process was not served on Kinney and wife till the winter of 1823-4; and the copy of the process served on them did not indicate that it was a foreign attachment of Holloway's land. Nor was any bill filed in that suit, though it never was dismissed.

One of Holloway's sureties, Watts, went in pursuit of him, in the hope of procuring some indemnity for himself and the others, and found him at New Orleans. And Holloway, by deed dated the 11th December 1823, conveyed to Watts and Kinney one equal undivided moiety of the tract of 916 acres of land in Amherst, describing it as land then held by Holloway and his sister Mrs. Kinney, as tenants in common, under devise from their uncle; with this declaration of trust signed and sealed by Watts, and subjoined at the foot of the deed—"The above deed is given to us for the purpose of disposing of the land therein described, in such manner as we mutually agree upon, for the benefit of the said Holloway; and after the sale, to appropriate the proceeds to the payment of a debt of 200 dollars to H. Watts; the residue to the discharge of any money which Watts' and Holloway's other sureties in his official bonds, 'have paid or may have to pay for the said Holloway.'" This deed was acknowledged by Holloway before a district court of Louisiana sitting at New Orleans, and his acknowledgment thereof certified by the court under its seal, to the county court of Amherst, which, upon this proof, at March term 1824, ordered it 276 to be recorded. *Though it was denied, that this deed was duly recorded, the execution of it was admitted.

In the meantime, namely, in September 1823, a bill was exhibited in the superiour court of chancery of Staunton, by Kinney and wife against Holloway now absent, and one Stephenson; wherein, as to Holloway (for it is not necessary to notice Stephenson's part of the case) they set forth the agreement between Kinney and Holloway, for the sale by the former to the latter, of Mrs. Kinney's undivided moiety of the tract of 916 acres of land, stating the terms of the agreement according to Kinney's draft thereof of the 21st August 1822, with the modifications suggested in Holloway's letter to Kinney of the 7th September 1822, to which, Kinney said, he signified his assent by letter to Holloway. And they insisted, that they had a lien on Mrs. Kinney's moiety, of which full possession had been given to Holloway, though no conveyance thereof had been made to him, for the purchase money stipulated to be paid for the same; and that Holloway's own moiety was liable to be attached to satisfy his debt to Kinney, for the purchase money of his wife's moiety. Therefore, they prayed a specific execution of the agreement, and (as a consequence of specific execution) a decree for the sale of the whole of this tract of 916 acres of land, and the application of the proceeds thereof to the satisfaction of the debt due from Holloway to Kinney, for the purchase money of the moiety.

Holloway having been regularly called before the court by publication, according to the course prescribed by the statute in the case of absent debtors and defendants; and the court having appointed commissioners to ascertain the then value of the whole tract of land in cash, who reported that it was then worth only five dollars per acre, that is, 4580 dollars;

The chancellor, in December 1823, made an interlocutory decree, wherein,—declaring that, besides the equitable lien which Kinney had on the moiety of 916 acres of land sold by him to Holloway, for the purchase money thereof, *he had a right

ing with the conditions thereby prescribed, to have the whole of the land sold to satisfy the debt due him from the absent defendant for the purchase money of the moiety—he decreed, that Holloway should pay Kinney the first instalment of 500 dollars with interest from the 1st January 1823, when it fell due, and the other instalments of the purchase money, to be paid in bonds to be assigned before the instalments should respectively fall due, according to the terms of the agreement as manifested by the draft of the 21st August 1822, and if the deferred instalments should not be so paid in bonds assigned before they should fall due, then they should be paid in money; and upon Holloway's default in making the first or any of the subsequent payments, and continuing so in default for six months, he decreed, that the whole of the land should be sold by the marshal of the court, at public auction, for cash as to so much as should suffice to pay costs and charges, and the money with interest that should be due to Kinney at the time of sale, and as to the residue, upon such terms of credit as to make the proceeds meet the future instalments of the debt due from Holloway to Kinney, with special directions as to the security which the marshal should take from the purchaser at his sale. But he ordered this decree to be suspended, until Kinney and his wife should execute, in due and lawful manner, a good and effectual conveyance of Mrs. Kinney's undivided moiety of the land, with general warranty, and should file the same with the clerk of the court, to be disposed of as the court should afterwards direct; and until Kinney should give bond with approved surety, in the penalty of 9160 dollars, being double the value of the land according to the valuation of the commissioners, with condition to abide by and perform such future orders and decrees as the court should make in the cause.

278 *In June 1824, Watts, and all the other sureties of Holloway in his official bonds, exhibited their bill, in the same court, against Holloway and Kinney and wife, setting forth their suretyship for Holloway, his defaults in office, his insolvency, and departure from the country; exhibiting the judgments already obtained against Holloway and them by the high sheriff, on account of Holloway's defaults, and alleging that they had paid off and discharged those judgments, and were still exposed to other demands on the same account; and exhibiting also Holloway's deed of December 1823, procured from him by Watts for their indemnity; referring to the record of the suit and decree in the case of Kinney and wife against Holloway; and declaring, that they were ignorant of the existence of that suit, until after the decree was pronounced. They mentioned the subpoena and foreign attachment they had sued out of the court of chancery of Lynchburg, in June 1823; and charged, that Kinney had full notice of that proceeding, when he filed his bill against Holloway, in September, or at least before he obtained his decree in December following, and was apprised of their claim to a lien on Holloway's land for their indemnity; and yet had willfully abstained from making them parties. They impeached Kinney's decree, on the ground, that there was no agreement between Holloway and Kinney, binding on Holloway, for the sale and purchase of Mrs. Kinney's undivided moiety of the tract of 916 acres of land, and so there was, in truth, no debt due from Holloway to Kinney; and if that was a debt justly due to Kinney, yet they insisted, they were entitled to satisfaction out of Holloway's own undivided moiety of the land, in preference to Kinney. Therefore, they prayed an injunction to inhibit all proceedings under Kinney's decree of December 1823, and general relief.

The chancellor awarded an injunction until further order.

There was an order of publication against the absent defendant Holloway, and as to him the bill was regularly taken pro confesso.

279 *Kinney put in an answer for himself and his wife, in which he admitted, that the judgments mentioned in the bill had been recovered against Holloway's sureties, as they alleged; and said, he thought it probable they had discharged the judgments, though of this he had no knowledge. He denied the notice imputed to him, of the subpoena and foreign attachment in the court of chancery of Lynchburg. And he insisted, that his decree in his suit against Holloway, of December 1823, was just and right as between him and Holloway, and equally so, as between him and the plaintiffs in this suit: that he was entitled to the debt he claimed of Holloway; entitled, as an attaching creditor, to have the whole land sold to satisfy the debt; and entitled by his attachment, which he had sued out and prosecuted in perfect good faith, without notice of the plaintiff's claims or pretensions, to priority of satisfaction.

There was no proof that Watts and the other sureties had discharged the judgments recovered against them by Warwick.

Upon the hearing of this cause, the chancellor dissolved the injunction he had awarded to stay proceedings on his interlocutory decree in the suit of Kinney and wife against Holloway, and dismissed this bill of Watts and others against Holloway and Kinney and wife, with costs. And from this decree, Watts and others appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Stanard for the appellants, and by Johnson for the appellees.

It being agreed, on all hands, that the appellants, Watts and others, had a right to contest the propriety of the decree of December 1823, in the case of Kinney and wife against Holloway, so far as that decree affected the interest of the appellants—

I. Stanard contended, that supposing there was such an agreement between Kinney and Holloway as Kinney had a right to specific execution of, and that, therefore, there was a debt really due from Holloway to Kinney, for the purchase money of Mrs. Kinney's moiety of the land, for which Kinney might rightly attach Holloway's moiety; yet Kinney's decree against Holloway, of December 1823, was, with respect to Holloway's sureties, Watts and others, plainly unjust. For, 1st, the appellants having stated their case fully in their bill, made the absent defendant Holloway a party, and prayed general relief, ought, upon this bill, to be considered as attaching creditors: they were the creditors, indeed, who first sued out a foreign attachment, for the subpoena they sued out of the court of chancery of Lynchburg, had the effect of an attachment, though no bill was filed upon it: and considering both the appellants and appellees as attaching creditors, all the creditors are equally entitled to the benefit of the diligence of each, and the court in such cases, ought to let in all creditors, who come in while the fund is within the power of the court, to a fair participation in it. Lashley v. Hogg, 11 Ves. 602, Angell v. Haddon, 1 Madd. C. R. 529, and lord Redesdale's opinion in Latouche v. Ld. Dunsany, 1 Sch. & Lef. 156. 2ndly, at any rate, the appellants were entitled to have the surplus of the proceeds of the subject, if any there should be, after satisfying the debt due to Kinney, applied to the satisfaction of their claims; yet the chancellor had not thought it proper to make any provision to give them even that. 3rdly, Kinney could not attach Holloway's property for the instalments of the debt claimed by him, that had not yet fallen due; at least, he was not entitled to a decree for money not due. A foreign attachment and a decree upon it against an absent defendant, were given in place of an action and judgment at law against a resident defendant; but no judgment could be given at law, no action would lie for a debt not due. And, certainly, the court ought not to have decreed a sale to satisfy the instalments yet to come due: the most it could have done, was to decree a sale of so much as would raise enough to pay what was already due. Campbell v. M'Comb, 281 4 Johns. Ch. Rep. 534. *4thly, and chiefly, the judgment which Warwick had obtained against Holloway and his sureties, in April 1823, to the amount of 5000 dollars, being prior in date to Kinney's decree, and even to his attachment, constituted a lien on Holloway's land, prior and preferable to the lien which Kinney acquired by his attachment and decree against Holloway. He said, the appellants had paid off and discharged this judgment; but it was immaterial whether they had or not. If the judgments were still unsatisfied, they gave Warwick a lien on Holloway's lands, which his sureties had a right to have enforced for their indemnity. If the sureties had satisfied the judgment, they had a right to be substituted to the benefit of Warwick's judgment against their principal, and to have his lands extended upon it. Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call, 125, 188; Tinsley v. Anderson, 3 Call, 285-9; Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. 22; Hayes v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch. Rep. 123; Lidderdale v. Robinson, 12 Wheat. 594; Enders v. Bruen, 4 Rand. 438.

II. He contended, that the appellants had a right to have the whole debt due to them from Holloway, charged upon his moiety of the land; as well that part of it, which arose out of the judgment against both Holloway and themselves, as that part which arose out of the judgment against themselves alone, and whatever they should any wise be held to pay as his sureties. He admitted, that Holloway's mortgage of the 11th December 1823, was not duly recorded, because it was not acknowledged before justices of the peace in New Orleans, but before the district court, which was not regular according to the present statute of conveyances, as was decided in Lockridge v. Carlisle, 2 Leigh, 186. But, whether recorded or no, it was good as between the parties; good as against every body but purchasers without notice and creditors. Kinney claimed as creditor. But he was not a creditor of Holloway: he had no right to demand specific execution of the alleged agreement between him and Holloway for the sale of his wife's moiety of the land to Holloway. The agreement was acknowledged, *in the beginning, a parol agreement; and the possession of Holloway was not such a part performance as to take the case out of the statute of frauds; for, in order to constitute possession taken, or acts done, by a vendee of land by parol agreement, such part performance as will take the agreement out of the statute, the possession, or acts done, must have plain and certain reference to the agreement. Sugd. Law Vend. 83. Here, Holloway had the possession before the agreement, as tenant in common, and might well have continued to hold possession in the same right. Certainly, his possession was not, necessarily, a possession under the agreement. The agreement never was reduced to writing and signed by Holloway. Kinney prepared a draft of it: Holloway excepted to its terms in two particulars: his letter stated his exceptions: the terms were never definitively agreed, much less reduced to writing. But, if this objection be ill founded, Kinney could not enforce a specific execution of Holloway's agreement to purchase his wife's land of him, because there was no reciprocity in such an agreement; the remedy was not mutual, since Holloway could not have compelled Mrs. Kinney to convey her right. Id. 158. At all events, the court could not decree specific execution, before Mrs. Kinney had actually joined in a conveyance binding on her, and irrevocable. If she refused to join in a conveyance; if she died the day after the decree for specific execution, of December 1823, and her rights descended to her infant children; Holloway would not have got the land, and yet the decree gave Kinney a judgment against him for the purchase money. The decree of December 1823, placed Holloway's debt to Kinney, not on any thing that had been done, but on acts to be done in future, which might never be done. Holloway, then, owed no debt to Kinney; and the decree that adjudged the debt to him, ought to be put wholly out of the way of the appellants.

I. Johnson, in his answer to the first set of objections to the decree of December 1823, said, 1st, That as to the 283 *subpoena sued out of the court of chancery of Lynchburg, by the appellants, in June 1822, no notice of that proceeding was brought home to Kinney, before he had obtained his decree against Holloway; and if he was apprised of it, it was not easy to see how process in another suit, and that a suit never proceeded in, and in fact abandoned, could be connected with this suit, to any purpose whatever. The court could only look to the appellants' bill in this case; and that was not framed as a foreign attachment: the appellants did not seek to attach Holloway's property; they claimed a lien on it, and a right to satisfaction out of it, in preference to Kinney. But, he said, in the proceeding by way of foreign attachment under the statute of Virginia, the attaching creditor was entitled to the whole benefit of his own diligence; for he could only obtain a decree, upon condition of giving bond with surety to abide any future decree of the court, in case the proceedings should be opened at the instance of the absent debtor; and, surely, he could not be held to undertake that burden for any person's benefit but his own. 2ndly, He had no objection to the appellant's claim to the surplus of the fund, after the debt due to Kinney should be satisfied. The decree might be so corrected as to retain the appellants' bill for this purpose. 3rdly, He insisted, that a foreign attachment would lie for a debt payable in future; Williamson v. Bowie, 6 Munf. 176. Whether the whole subject attached ought to be so sold as not only to pay the instalments due, but to meet the deferred instalments when they should fall due, was always a question for the discretion of the court. And it were strange if it should be otherwise, seeing that the same statute, which gave the foreign attachment in chancery against absent debtors, gave also a common attachment against absconding debtors, for debts to fall due at a future time, and provided for a sale of the subject, exactly in the manner in which the chancellor directed the sale here. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, § 14, p. 478, 9. 4thly, He strenuously contended, that the appellants 284 could claim no benefit "whatever, as against Kinney, from the judgment which Warwick recovered against Holloway and them, as there was no proof that the appellants had discharged that judgment, it must be taken that they had not; and as Warwick had never elected to have execution of Holloway's lands, and as it was quite certain he never would elect to resort to that for satisfaction, the judgment in his hands was not a subsisting lien on the lands. But, if the appellants had discharged the judgment, how was it possible, that this satisfied judgment could be a lien on Holloway's land, when no elegit could ever possibly be sued out upon it? The lien of a judgment on the debtor's lands was only a consequence of the capacity of the creditor to sue out an elegit. If the lien was extinguished in Warwick's hands, it could not be revived for the benefit of Holloway's sureties: they could not be substituted in Warwick's place, for the benefit of a remedy which he himself no longer had. He went into minute examination of the cases, in which a surety paying a debt, has been substituted to the benefit of the remedies which the creditor had against the principal debtor; and he argued, that this doctrine of subrogation was the creature of equity, and that no such subrogation was ever allowed in equity, where the legal remedy of the creditor was extinct at law, and where, if revived in equity, it would overreach or affect the legal rights of third persons having equal equity. But, he said, the conclusive answer to this claim of the appellants, was, that they were creditors who had obtained a mortgage of the subject for the debt due them; and they could not now claim as creditors in any way, or in the double character of creditors and purchasers, but as purchasers only. Tate v. Liggat, 2 Leigh, 84, 104. 5thly, Accordingly, they did claim as purchasers under their mortgage; but the mortgage not being duly recorded was unavailing as against creditors. The deed was executed at New Orleans the 11th December 1823, while Kinney was pursuing his remedy by foreign attachment, and his lien was consummated by the decree of the 20th December 285 1823, *before he could possibly have notice of the deed. The appellants had no just ground to complain, that he did not make them parties to his suit against Holloway.

II. With regard to the other objections, which, if just, shewed that Holloway owed Kinney no debt, and so razed Kinney's claim from the foundation, the first of them rested on the statute of frauds. The contract for the sale and purchase of Mrs. Kinney's moiety of the land, was, at first, a mere parol agreement. If the subsequent transactions with respect to it, did not shew that this agreement was reduced to writing, they shewed, at least, that Holloway claimed under the sale, and that the possession he afterwards held of the land, in intirety, was referrible to the agreement, and not to his tenancy in common. But this was an agreement in writing within the statute: Kinney reduced the agreement to writing, and signed it; Holloway then wrote him a letter, saying that the draft corresponded with his idea of the contract, except in two particulars, which he specified; and Kinney claimed according to the terms of the contract written by him as modified by Holloway's letter. Taking the contract as written by Kinney, and Holloway's letter, together, there was a written agreement, within the words and spirit of the statute. The other objection was, in effect, that a husband cannot make an executory contract for the sale of his wife's land that will be binding on the purchaser, because the wife is not bound to convey in pursuance of her husband's agreement, and so the remedy is not mutual; a principle of very extensive consequence. It had, indeed, been doubted, whether it was right to decree specific execution of a contract of sale by a husband of his wife's land, at the suit of the purchaser against the husband; but it never was questioned, that, where husband and wife unite in a bill demanding a specific execution of a purchaser's contract with the husband, for the purchase of the wife's land, it was right to decree specific execution against the purchaser. To exempt him from the duty of specific performance, in such a case, were to exempt
286 him from an *obligation contracted by him, with his eyes open to the situation of his vendor, with full knowledge of the necessity of the wife's concurrence, and in the expectation of her concurrence, in the execution of the contract; when the wife is willing to unite with her husband in the execution of it; when the purchaser is exactly in the situation in which he voluntarily placed himself; and when he has no delay, inconvenience or mischief to complain of. It was said, that, at all events, the husband and wife coming to demand specific execution of a contract, should have the wife's conveyance in court, duly executed so as to be irrevocably binding on her, before the court should hold the purchaser to specific execution. But there could be no substantial difference between an interlocutory decree for specific execution against the purchaser, founded on an actual exhibition of such a conveyance, and an interlocutory decree, like the present, suspended in its effect, until the conveyance should be duly executed, and filed in court.

TUCKER, P. If the appellant's case is to be sustained in this court, I am inclined to think it cannot be on the ground of their having presented themselves as attaching creditors in this suit, or as seeking to become parties to the attachment of Kinney, or as entitled to avail themselves of the naked subpoena which they sued out of the court of chancery of Lynchburg. Their bill assumes not at all the shape of an attachment; nor do they ask to participate in the benefits of Kinney's, upon the usual terms of the court; so that we may throw out of the case the various questions which have been suggested upon these views of the subject. And as to the Lynchburg attachment, whether the original indorsement on the subpoena was or was not imperfect or inefficient; whether the lien has been preserved by keeping the cause on the docket, or lost for want of prosecution; certain it is, I think, that we cannot (if I may so speak) splice that case to this, for the purpose of preserving the supposed preference, which the creditors may have obtained, by that process, over Kinney and wife.

287 *But though upon these grounds the creditors have little pretensions to success in this case, yet there are others that present much stronger claims to our attention. I shall consider these in succession.

The first of them which I shall notice, refers itself not so much to the merits of the respective pretensions of the parties, as to a question not vital to their interests. Admitting the superiority of the claim of the appellees, it is yet contended, that as they, after all, had only a right to have that claim satisfied, the bill of the creditors should not have been dismissed, until it had been ascertained by a sale, that there would be no surplus, out of which they could have received payment. Whatever were the comparative merits of the claims of the appellants on the one hand, and of Kinney and wife on the other, the claims of the former against Holloway, have not been seriously contested. If, therefore, the proceeds of sale shall suffice to discharge the demand, or that portion of the demand, of Kinney and wife, which they may have a right to charge upon the land, and a surplus shall remain, there seems no assignable reason, why payment out of such surplus should be refused to the appellants, who stand, as sureties, in the shoes of a creditor whom they have satisfied, and moreover hold the deed of Holloway for the security of their demand: for, whether as representing Warwick, they could overreach Kinney and wife, or whether Kinney and wife were or were not bound by the unrecorded deed of Holloway, he at least was bound and chargeable to the appellants, on either of those grounds. Nor was it an apology for the dismissal of the bill, that relief was hopeless, as no surplus was to be expected. Hopeless as it might have been, the result should have been awaited. And, indeed, it ought not to have been considered as hopeless. The decree was for the sale of the whole tract, for the satisfaction of the price of but half of it: and, though no calculation, in judicial proceedings, should have been made on the probability, that the ties of kindred would restrain

Kinney from buying in his brother-
288 in-law's estate *at an immense and ruinous sacrifice; yet there was a reasonable ground of hope, that long credits, and a judicious sub-division of the subject, might effect that which the more amiable feelings of our nature might have been appealed to in vain to bring about. Moreover, if it should appear, that the vendor, Kinney, had a right to a decree only for the amount actually due when his decree was rendered, and not for the deferred instalments, then there was every reason for presuming, that that half of the land which was sold by him, would be more than sufficient for that purpose, and would leave the proper land of Holloway for the indemnity of the appellants. I am of opinion, therefore, that in this regard, the decree of dismissal is very clearly erroneous.

It is essential, however, that the court in reversing the decree, should pronounce upon certain other principles in the case, involving the merits of the controversy, in order to its ultimate adjustment. This leads me to consider, and to compare the pretensions of the parties, at least in some important particulars.

The superiority of the claim of the appellants may be considered, either as arising out of the deed from Holloway to Watts and Kinney, for the benefit of his creditors, or as sustained by the supposed right to stand in the shoes of Warwick, and to charge the lands of their debtor, by virtue of the lien of the judgment which they have paid off and discharged.

First, let us consider their claim under the deed to Watts and Kinney. This deed, though not duly recorded, and therefore not valid as to the creditors of Holloway, is nevertheless binding between the parties themselves. It constitutes a lien, of which, as against Holloway, the appellants had a right to avail themselves. And it is not only valid against him, but it is also valid against all persons, except purchasers without notice or creditors of Holloway. It can only be assailed, then, in this case, upon the ground, that Kinney and wife are either purchasers without notice, or creditors.

The former is not pretended. The latter must *be examined; and it brings us to one of the most litigated points in the case.

I will remark, at once, that I do not conceive Kinney or Kinney and wife to be creditors of Holloway, in this regard. A verbal contract having been entered into between Kinney and Holloway, for the sale of the lands of Mrs. Kinney, the parties separated without having reduced the terms of the contract to writing; but with an understanding (to place the facts in the strongest points of view for the vendors) that Holloway, who was already in possession as jointenant should continue to hold the whole tract, one half in his own right as devisee of his uncle, and the other half as purchaser from Kinney and his sister. Waiving the question, whether this continuance of possession constituted part execution, and waiving also the objection arising out of the difference between the parties as to the terms of the parol contract, it is material to remark, that the written contract never was signed by Holloway, the party to be charged with it. Kinney, therefore, never has had any right of action at law against Holloway. If, indeed, the contract had been signed, and the covenants could have been regarded as independent covenants, Kinney might have then maintained an action for the money, notwithstanding a deed had not yet been made and tendered by himself and wife. But as the contract was not executed, he had no demand whatever at law against Holloway. His demand was only in equity, where the payment of the purchase money never could be enforced until the title was made. Until this was done, he was no creditor in equity: and to this day it has not been done: to this day, for aught we know, the title is in his wife, or, if she is dead, in her heirs; and if she refuses to make a title, or should die without the due execution of one, the contract is annihilated, both at law and in equity; all pretence of specific performance is extinguished; and the parties are thrown back upon those original rights, which they possessed anterior to their treaty. How, then, can that be said to be a debt, which is a debt to-day, and to-morrow is 290 *none? which is a debt, in case a wife shall, voluntarily and without the threats of her husband, convey away her own inheritance, and enable him to pocket the money, and no debt if she should decline to do so? How can he be said to be a creditor, whose demand depends upon a contingency which is beyond human ken, since that contingency, in its turn, depends upon the will, not to say the caprice, of a feme covert? Nay, how can he be said to be a creditor, or his adversary a debtor, when the whim, or caprice, or self interest, of that creditor himself, may make, or may avoid, the contract? Can there be a debt without a contract? Can there be a contract without mutual obligation? Can there be an agreement between two parties, which binds one of them absolutely, and the other only at his pleasure? Yet, here the contract between these parties would be binding on one, and not upon the other, if Holloway is to be considered as bound. If from an increased value in the land, or from any other cause, it should be the desire of Kinney to recede, what could restrain him? At law, he was not bound, nor is he yet bound for any thing. In equity, he cannot be decreed to pay Holloway damages or the loss of a good bargain, for this is a jurisdiction it does not exercise (Gwillim v. Stone, 14 Ves. 128; Todd v. Gee, 17 Ves. 277,) unless, indeed, in very special circumstances; and as to compelling the husband to procure a conveyance, the doctrine, never well received, has never been acted upon with us, and seems recently to have been discontinued in England. Emery v. Wase, 8 Ves. 505, 1 New Rep. 267. It is true, that in a recent case it has been said, that if the wife assents the husband will not be permitted to recede. Howell v. George, 1 Madd. Ch. Rep. 1-7. But so easy is it where family convenience and profit concur, for the influence of the husband to withhold the assent of the wife, that, practically, the doctrine can never be of use. Be this as it may, the wife in this case is the essential contracting party, if indeed she is to be called a contracting party, who is bound or not bound, at her absolute will and pleasure. *Being only thus far bound, the other party cannot have been bound, and cannot therefore have been a debtor.

Upon this ground also it is probable, that no specific performance could properly have been decreed, since the want of mutuality in the contract, is generally a valid objection to the exercise of that jurisdiction. 1 Madd. Ch. Prac. 423, 4. Certain it is, I think, that no decree should have been rendered against the vendee until the vendor had procured and offered in court a deed executed with all proper solemnities to pass the title of the wife; since, otherwise, this solecism is presented, that the decree between the parties is binding or not binding, at the will and pleasure of one of them.

It would be unprofitable to pursue, through all its consequences, this anomalous state of contract. Difficulties and absurdities fasten upon it, whithersoever we turn. Thus, this very decree of dismissal, may have been free from error when it was rendered, upon the supposition that Holloway was a debtor of Kinney, for, in that case, the deed of trust was void as to him; yet, if Mrs. Kinney is since dead, or should now refuse to execute the contract, he is no debtor, and the decree is erroneous; for, in that event, he would certainly not be the debtor of Kinney, and therefore the deed of trust would be good against him. A bill for specific performance will lie for Kinney and wife, if they choose to abide by the contract; but Holloway cannot maintain such a bill. If he becomes a suitor for the benefit of it, he cannot compel, he can do no more than solicit. And his shortest course, instead of being suitor to the court, would be to become a suppliant to the lady.

With these views, I have no doubt, that Kinney was no creditor of Holloway, and that the deed of Holloway, though not recorded, was good against him. This view of the subject renders it unnecessary to consider, whether as an attaching creditor, Kinney comes in by act of law, so far as to be within the principle, that he, who takes by act of law, steps only into the shoes of his debtor; and "takes his 292 *rights precisely in the same plight and condition, as he possessed them."

"In such cases even though a complete legal title vests in the party, and there is no notice of any equity affecting it, he takes subject to all the equity to which his debtor was liable." This is the doctrine as to assignees of bankrupts, and is broadly stated by sir W. Grant in Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. 100, in reference to all persons coming in by act of law. Whether attachment creditors are so to be considered, and whether the lien of an unrecorded deed would bind the estate in the hands of such persons, are questions not now necessary to be decided.

If the superiority of the rights of the appellants, should not seem clear as arising out of the lien created by the deed of trust, let us next consider it in another light, in which it was presented in the argument at the bar.

It is contended for the appellants, that having as the sureties of Holloway, paid off the judgments obtained by Warwick, they have a right, upon the principles of substitution, to the lien of the judgments upon the land, which has been subsequently attached at the suit of the appellees. The payment indeed was denied in the argument, though not absolutely denied in the answer. I shall take it as a fact in the cause, because alleged by the appellants themselves whose case would perhaps present itself yet more strongly, if we suppose the judgments not to have been paid. In that view they would be relieved from the force of the argument, that equity will not revive a satisfied judgment, to the prejudice of an incumbrancer having the legal title; and of the other argument, that the taking the deed of trust changed their character of creditors into the less advantageous character of purchasers; an argument, which rests upon a supposed decision of this court in Tate v. Liggat. Moreover, their bill would then be considered, in the light of an application to have the benefit of the judgments assigned them; or as seeking to have the property sold to pay off the judgments, for which they are responsible; a

of Campbell v. M'Comb, 4 Johns. Ch. Rep. 538; Ranelagh v. Hayes, 1 Vern. 190.

Taking the sureties, then, to have paid the debt, and to seek by substitution to have the benefit of the creditor's lien, there can be nothing more clear, than their right to this, as a general principle. It imports us only to examine the objections made to its application in the present case. These objections have been presented with great force and ability, by the counsel for the appellees. It is contended, that the lien of the judgment has been lost by lapse of time, no elegit or indeed other execution having ever issued; that the lien has been destroyed by the discharge of the judgment by the sureties; and that it has also been destroyed by the execution of the deed of trust, which has changed the character of the sureties from creditors into purchasers.

I do not understand the counsel for the appellees as contending, that the two first of these objections could prove a barrier to the right of the sureties to proceed against the debtor himself. However long the judgment may have been out of date, there is no doubt, that, if susceptible of being revived at all, the lien upon the land yet in the hands of the debtor, would be revived eodem flatu; and there can be as little doubt, that if the principal debtor were to interpose the objection that the surety had discharged the debt, a court of equity would frown upon such a defence in its own forum, and would inhibit it in any other. 2 Call, 136, 7. But it is alleged, that the subsequent creditor has equal equity; and that by the payment or other discharge of the judgment, the legal lien which it gave is extinguished; and it is contended, that that lien should not be revived at the instance of a surety against the second incumbrancer, who has by the fact of the discharge of the first judgment, acquired the better title at law. And the principle is relied on, that where equity is equal the law will prevail.

The principle is unquestionable, but its application may be doubted. It is not true, that the equities of the parties, 294 *in the case supposed, are equal; and if that of the sureties be superior, it must prevail, although their adversary may have the law in his favour. The whole train of authorities on this subject, is founded upon the principle of the superior equity of the sureties, to be paid out of that fund to which their creditor might have resorted, for their relief. The surety in a bond, for the payment of which the principal has bound particular property, has a preference over all other persons, to have the debt charged upon that fund. If the principal dies, and after his death the surety pays off the bond, he has a right to demand the payment of the bond, out of the assets, before the simple contract creditors, and thus to be placed in the shoes of the obligee; because, at the instant of the principal's death, the obligee had a right to demand payment out of the assets, in preference to any simple contract creditor: in good faith, he should have demanded such payment, instead of putting the burden on the innocent surety: in good faith, the executor should have so applied the assets. An adequate portion should have been set apart and appropriated for that debt. No simple contract creditor had, or could have by law, any claim thereto. If the executor were sued by simple contract creditors, he might plead the outstanding bond in bar of the demand. He might fence around an adequate portion of assets against all their assaults. Nor is the state of things changed by payment being forced from the surety, or being voluntarily made by him. If forced from him, a court of equity will give him redress: it will consider him as standing in the shoes of the creditor, who ought to have looked to the estate of the principal, instead of drawing money from the pocket of the surety: it will consider the executor as holding a certain portion of the assets, as trustee for the payment of this very debt, and hold him to the discharge of the trust in its spirit, when it can no longer be performed to the letter: and it will deny to the simple contract creditor, who had no right to these funds, the application of them to the payment of his debt. And why? If the surety dis-

295 charge *the bond, or a judgment and execution upon it, is he not a simple contract creditor only? and has not any other simple contract creditor a legal right to resort to this fund, as there is now no longer any bond or judgment to be charged upon it? and has he not equal equity? The answer is, no: he not only has not equal equity, but he has no equity whatever to charge a fund which, in equity and justice, belongs to another. He has no equity to demand, that money, which by law ought to have been applied to pay my debt, shall be applied to pay his. The case is the same, if the payment is made voluntarily by the surety. In making that payment, he is governed by the law of this court. Even on entering into his engagement as surety, he looks to its well established principles. He knows, if he pays the debt to the obligee, he will stand in the obligee's shoes. He knows he will be subrogated to all the rights of the obligee, as they subsist at the time he makes his payment. He knows that a court of equity looks not to form but to substance; that it looks to the debt which is to be paid, not to the hand which may happen to hold it; that the fund charged with its payment, shall be so applied, whosoever may be the person entitled; and that it considers a debt as never discharged, until it is discharged by payment to the proper person, and by the proper person. He knows, that that court, which permits no act of a trustee to prejudice the cestui que trust, will not permit one who stands in the relation of the creditor or obligee to the surety, to bar him of those rights which the principles of equity have secured to him. He is conscious, that his rights do not depend upon the caprice of the creditor, or the whim of an executor, or the sense of right of other creditors, but rest upon the immutable principles of justice and equity; and, in making his payment, he does it in the confidence, that he will be entitled to be indemnified to the full amount, to which his creditor could have charged the assets of the principal.

The foregoing case, which I have put as an illustration, will sufficiently disclose my idea of the principles of equity, 296 *in relation to this doctrine of substitution; and all the cases, I believe, will sustain the opinion, that the surety's right of subrogation, can never be resisted by any other creditor, on the ground that he has the law in his favour and equal equity. For, in truth, he has no equity at all as against the surety.

It would be unprofitable to go into a minute examination of the various cases which have been decided upon this subject, in some of which it is clearly seen, that the supposed legal advantage of a party will not protect him from the operation of this subrogation of the surety to the remedies of the creditor. It may, however, not be amiss to refer to two of the cases, with a view to make this matter more clear.

In the case of Eppes v. Randolph, Wayles's executors paid off a bond in which their testator was surety for Randolph to Bevins. Chancellor Wythe declared, that they would have a right to stand in his shoes as against the heir, who had been forever discharged at law by the payment of the bond; and that if they had taken an assignment of the bond, and the heir had pleaded payment by the surety, he would have enjoined him from making that defence.

And the court of appeals further declared, that in the administration of the assets of the estate, which were inadequate to the discharge of all the debts, the executors of Wayles, who at law would only have been simple contract creditors, should be considered as bond creditors. The effect of this arrangement was to give them a preference over simple contract creditors, who at law had a right to an equality, and thus to deprive the latter of the legal right to participate in the fund, which they would have enjoyed but for the interference of equity. So in Tinsley v. Anderson, it was declared, that, in the distribution of the funds, the sureties should be placed in the shoes of the creditors they had paid; the effect of which arrangement was to exclude from their legal equality, simple contract creditors, who, but for the interference of equity, would have enjoyed a full share of the fund.

297 *Now, in these cases, it is clear, the legal right of the simple contract creditors was invaded. For, if the fund was only sufficient to pay off the bond, they would get nothing; and if it was even more than adequate to pay off the bond, but not enough to pay off the simple contract creditors also, the bond would be discharged in the first place, and they would only get the residuum among them. A more marked disregard of the legal privileges of parties, cannot well be conceived.

As to the position, that by taking the deed of trust, the sureties put off their character of creditors and assumed that of purchasers, I cannot understand that the opinion in Tate v. Liggat, referred to, designed to go so far as to say, that a creditor by judgment, who takes a mere collateral security for the payment of his debt, thereby loses intirely the benefit of his judgment lien; and unless the principle be extended thus far, it can have no influence upon this case. Be this as it may, I understand that the principle is not considered as settled by that case. I am of opinion, therefore, that there is no validity in this objection.

In the views I have taken of the sureties' right of subrogation here, I have treated the claim of Kinney, as if it were a real and subsisting debt. But if we regard it otherwise; if, as I have shewn, Holloway was no debtor of Kinney; then the question of subrogation is one between the sureties and their debtor alone, and not between the sureties and another creditor of that debtor. In this point of view, the case is divested of every difficulty. The existence of a debt from Holloway to Kinney is, indeed, the essential ingredient in every part of this transaction. Without it, the deed of trust to the sureties is unquestionable; without it, their right to subrogation cannot be contested; without it, there is no barrier to an elegit on Warwick's judgment, though it may have run out of date; without it, the attachment of Kinney was illegal; without it, the decree in that case, was irregular; and without it, no decree could have 298 *been properly entered against Holloway in the state of the cause appearing to this court.

I have not deemed it material, or proper, to examine all the objections to Kinney's decree against Holloway, as there is no appeal from that decree. There is one, however, which ought not to be passed in silence, lest this court should seem to have disregarded it. I mean the decree for the sale of the land, not for payment only of the sum due, but for the deferred instalments also. The parties not having contracted for a mortgage, a mortgage could not have been decreed to be executed by Holloway. Yet this decree is, uno flatu, both mortgage and foreclosure. The utmost that should have been decreed, was, that Holloway should execute his bonds for the instalments, and that the vendor's lien should be retained for the security of them until payment.

The decree entered by the court, declared, that in the original cause of Kinney and wife against Holloway, no sufficient ground appeared, upon which Kinney and wife could proceed by foreign attachment against the absent defendant, Holloway; no debt appearing to be due by Holloway to Kinney, but his demand depending upon the contingency of the execution of a deed by his wife for her land sold by her husband, which contingency might never happen, and did not appear to have as yet occurred: that, such being the case, whatever decree might have been rendered as between Kinney and Holloway (a matter of which this court had not cognizance, since no appeal from the decree in that cause, was before it), the appellants had a right to arrest the execution of the decree actually pronounced, at least so far as it respected the sale of Holloway's proper moiety of the tract of 916 acres of land, devised by his uncle to him and his sister; and they had moreover a right to decree for the sale of Holloway's moiety (either under Holloway's mortgage thereof for their indemnity, or as standing in the place of Warwick, so far as they had paid off and discharged his judgments, or as entitled to compel 299 *payment thereof out of Holloway's property thereby bound to satisfy them) for any sums which they might have paid, or be liable to pay, for Holloway; of which an account ought to be taken: and that, therefore, the injunction to the execution of Kinney's decree against Holloway, of December 1823, ought to be reinstated and perpetuated, so far as respected the moiety of the tract of 916 acres which belonged to Holloway as devisee of his uncle. Therefore, the chancellor's decree was reversed with costs, and the cause remanded, to be further proceeded in, according to the principles here declared.

*Kelso v. Blackburn.

December, 1881.

Foreign Attachments.—Nonresidence of Debtor.—Averment.—Proof.—In a bill in chancery, against a debtor as an absent debtor or defendant, and other defendants resident, holding lands by voluntary or fraudulent conveyances from the debtor, to have a decree against the debtor for the debt, and against the home defendants to subject the lands to the debt; the bill, in order to give the court jurisdiction, under the statute concerning attachments and suits against absent defendants, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, must distinctly aver the non-residence of the debtor; and, if the home defendants in their answers say that the debtor is a resident, though they do not plead that matter in abatement to the jurisdiction, the plaintiff, to sustain the jurisdiction, must prove the fact of the debtor's residence abroad; and if his non-residence be not distinctly averred in the bill, or, if so denied by the home defendants, be not proved, the court has no jurisdiction, and a decree for the plaintiff will be reversed on that ground.

Fraudulent Conveyances.—Right of Creditor at Large to Impeach.—A creditor at large, not having obtained judgment or decree against his debtor, cannot resort to equity, to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of his debtor.

A bill was exhibited in the superiour court of chancery of Staunton before the commencement of the revised statute of 1819, concerning attachments and suits against absent defendants, by Blackburn against James Kelso, and John, Hugh, Elizabeth and Mary Kelso, sons and daughters of James, setting forth, That James Kelso, 300 the father, *was indebted to him 420 dollars by bond, and about 57 dollars on open account: That the debtor was, at the time the debts were contracted, a resident of the county of Bath, on land he owned there; but since, had very seldom appeared in that county, having married in Louisa or some other of the lower counties of the state; and on very diligent inquiry he could not be found in the county in which he was said to reside: That, at length, he disappeared intirely, and at the time of the commencement of this suit, was said to have left the state and gone to parts unknown, and reported to be an inhabitant of Kentucky; at least, he was said to have been sometimes seen there: And that he had made conveyances of his lands in Bath, on which he had lived, to his children John, Hugh, Elizabeth and Mary; which conveyances were, at best, merely voluntary; but, in truth, they were fraudulent in fact, being executed with design to defraud his creditors. Therefore, the bill prayed, that the conveyances should be set aside, and that the land be subjected to the payment of the debt due the plaintiff; and general relief.

Foreign Attachments.—Statute.—Construction.—In Barksdale v. Hendree, 2 Pat. & H. 47, the principal case is cited to the point that the statute allowing attachments against absent debtors is an innovation on the common law, and should be carefully watched and strictly confined to the ground covered by the statute. To the same effect the principal case is cited in Bank of U. S. v. Merchants' Bank of Baltimore, 1 Rob. 585.

The defendants, John, Hugh, Elizabeth and Mary Kelso, promptly put in answers to the bill, all insisting, that the conveyances made by their father to them, were fair; that their father had, at the time the conveyances in question were made, and yet had ample means besides the property thereby conveyed, to pay this debt; and that he resided and had resided, for four years next before, in the county of Louisa, Virginia, where he was a housekeeper and farmer.

No steps were taken in the cause, against the defendant James Kelso, as an absent defendant, under the statute giving remedy by bill in chancery against absent defendants. Process was, from time to time issued against him, but it did not appear in the record, to what county it was sent: it was never executed. Two years after the bill was filed, he appeared voluntarily, and, without being held to give security to abide the decree, put in his answer: in which 301 he admitted "the justice of the debt claimed by Blackburn on the bond, but contested the claim upon the open account; and he denied that his conveyances to his children, were fraudulent. He did not deny, that at the time the bill was filed, he was a non-resident.

To this answer, as well as the others, the plaintiff put in a general replication.

There was no plea in abatement, to the jurisdiction of the court, put in by any of the defendants.

It was proved by the depositions of several witnesses, particularly Francisco and Sittlington, that for some time before the bill was filed, James Kelso, the debtor, being much embarrassed with debt, was in the habit of carefully avoiding the officers of justice, in order to prevent the service of process upon him; and Sittlington deposed, that, at the time the bill was filed, it was reported and generally believed, that he had removed to and was living in Kentucky, and never expected to return. And, in a letter which he wrote to Blackburn, some time after he had filed his answer to the bill, (the principal object of which was to effect a compromise for his children), he said, "I was sorry, as the matter has turned out, that you did not serve the common process at law upon me, which was always in your power, only the time I was in the western country; for the debt would have been paid long ago, as there was property enough to have paid three such debts, before and long after you brought the present suit."

There ensued a contest as to the fairness of the conveyances made by the debtor to his children; and the chancellor directed an issue to be made up and tried at the bar of the circuit court of Bath, to ascertain whether they were fraudulent or no. The jury found that they were fraudulent as to the plaintiff Blackburn.

Then, a new contest arose, as to the title of the lands conveyed by the defendant James to his children, these claiming an interest in the subject paramount to their father.

302 *In the event, the court declared the conveyances fraudulent as to Blackburn; adjudged, that the defendant James Kelso should pay him the bond debt of 420 dollars with interest, and the costs of this suit; and in case he should fail to pay the same within three months, directed the marshal of the court to sell the land so fraudulently conveyed, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the debt, interest and costs.

From this decree the defendant John Kelso appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellants, said, The bill did not shew a case proper for relief in equity. It was now settled, that a creditor at large, not having recovered a judgment or decree against his debtor, cannot be entertained in equity to set aside fraudulent conveyances of the debtor. Tate v. Liggett &c., 2 Leigh, 84, 99. The bill stated, indeed, that upon diligent inquiry, James Kelso could not be found in the county of Bath, so that process of law might be served upon him, and that he was said to have left Virginia, and it was reported he was an inhabitant of Kentucky. But, at the time the bill was filed, real estate was not subject to foreign attachment; it was only made so, by an amendment at the revival of 1819. Statute of 1792, Rev. Code of 1794, ch. 78, § 2; Pleasants' edi. p. 115, 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 123, § 1, p. 474. It was expressly stated in the answers of John, Hugh and Elizabeth Kelso, that their father was, and had for years been, a resident of Louisa; and there was no proof that he was or ever had been a nonresident. There was no affidavit accompanying the bill, or afterwards filed, as the statute required, that he was absent, or not to be found: neither was he afterwards, in any respect, proceeded against as an absent defendant: he appeared and put in his answer as a home defendant. Therefore, no ground was laid to sustain the jurisdiction of the court of chancery, under the statutes giving remedy against absent debtors or defendants.

303 *Leigh for the appellee, referred to the provision of the statute concerning proceedings in chancery (which was as old as 1787) that "after answer filed, and no plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court, no exception for want of jurisdiction, shall ever afterwards be made, nor shall any court of chancery ever thereafter delay or refuse justice, or reverse the proceedings, for want of jurisdiction, except in cases of controversy respecting lands lying without the jurisdiction of the court, and also of infants and femes covert." 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 86, p. 214. The construction of this statute was well settled—that it has no application to the case of a bill shewing, on its face, a case not proper for relief in equity; but, where the bill shews a case proper for relief, and the objection to the jurisdiction arises from a state of facts extrinsic of and different from that shewn by the bill, and the defendant without pleading in abatement to the jurisdiction, puts in his answer, there, whatever may appear in the sequel, the statute precludes all objections to the jurisdiction, either in the court of original or of appellate cognizance. Pollard v. Patterson, 3 Hen. & Munf. 67; Hickman v. Stout, 2 Leigh, 6. And this construction of this statute, which was intended to disembarass the substantial justice of the case of technical objections to the form of remedy, as much as possible, was, he thought, narrow enough in all reason. Then, the question here was, Whether this bill, on its face, shewed a case proper for relief in equity? It was not a foreign attachment: it was a suit against an absent defendant and resident defendants, at once to recover judgment against the absentee for debt he owed, and to have his fraudulent conveyances of his property removed out of the creditor's way; a suit founded on the 5th section of the statute of 1792, retained, unaltered, in the revised statute of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, p. 476. The design of both statutes was to give the remedy in chancery, wherever, in consequence of the defendant's absence from the state, of his being without the reach of legal process, no action at law could be prosecuted

304 against him; and to give *the remedy in all cases, where there is a subject within the jurisdiction of the court, of which it can lay hold, to accomplish the ends of justice. It was true, that the revised statute of 1819 was the first that gave the foreign attachment of real estate belonging to an absent debtor; but the only effect of that amendment was to make the very process of foreign attachment a lien on the land. It never had been doubted, before the statute of 1819, that the courts of chancery might subject the lands of an absent debtor, lying within their jurisdiction, to his debts, at the suit of the creditor; but then, it was not the process of attachment, but the decree of the court, that bound the lands. Then, let this bill be fairly examined. The court would not require all the precision and certainty that would be necessary in special pleading: it would disregard form, and look to substance. The bill alleged, in substance, that the debtor could not be found to serve process upon him; that he was reported, and therefore believed, to have left the state, and to be an inhabitant of Kentucky: and this, indeed, was all that a plaintiff at home could, with strict truth, aver as to an absent party: his absence from the state, his residence in any particular place abroad, could not be positively known. The bill, therefore, on its face, laid a ground for the jurisdiction of the court, under the statute concerning absent debtors and defendants. The debtor defendant did not deny, that he was an absentee when the bill was filed; and he was the person against whom the judgment was asked; the person, therefore, to object to the jurisdiction. If the home defendants might have pleaded in abatement to the jurisdiction, that the debtor defendant was at home and amenable to legal process, they did not plead that matter in abatement; they answered the bill, and contested the claim upon the merits; and no matter how the fact afterwards turned out to be, they could not except to the jurisdiction; and neither the chancellor nor this court could regard exceptions to jurisdiction. The plaintiff's bill placed him rectus in curia. There was no necessity for him to accompany his bill with an affidavit of the debtor's

305 *absence: in common practice, and correct practice too, the affidavit is only required as the foundation of a special order of court to attach the absent defendant's effects, or of an order of publication against him. For proof of this, he remarked, that the strongest process against an absentee, the process of foreign attachment, is only an ordinary subpoena in chancery, with a restraining order indorsed, which may be indorsed by the clerk or the plaintiff's attorney; and this is regular and effectual, provided the attachment turns out, in the progress of the suit, to be just: no one ever heard of an affidavit at that incipient stage of the proceeding. When it was alleged by the home defendants in their answers, that the debtor defendant was at home, within reach of legal process, it was right to forbear farther proceedings against him as an absent defendant, and to send process after him, as was done here. At any rate, he insisted, that this court could not touch the decree as to the debtor defendant James Kelso, who had not appealed from the decree: the judgment for the debt thereby rendered against him must remain in full force, and that would bind his lands. Tate v. Liggat, 2 Leigh, 84, 108.

CARR, J. It was contended by the counsel for the appellant, that this case was wrong from the foundation, because the plaintiff, a creditor at large, had filed his bill for the sale of his debtor's land; that this was done upon the pretext, that Kelso was an absent defendant, when in truth he was not; but that if he was, the law as at that day, gave no such remedy against the debtor's land; and if it had, Kelso, in the progress of the suit, having appeared and filed his answer, could not be decreed against as an absent defendant. For the appellee, it was insisted, that the bill made a case clearly within the jurisdiction of the court; that, namely, of an absent defendant having land here, which he had fraudulently conveyed to his children; and as there was no denial of the absence of the debtor when the suit commenced, by plea in abatement to the jurisdiction, his 306 appearance afterwards, could not affect the jurisdiction, or the decree to be rendered.

The proceeding by foreign attachment against absentees, is an innovation upon the common law; a proceeding in rem, founded on the necessity of the case, lest there should be an absolute failure of justice; and, like all ex parte proceedings, it is liable to great abuse, unless carefully watched, and strictly confined to the ground covered by the law. It is not under their general jurisdiction, that courts of equity take cognizance of these cases, but under particular statutes; and these, it will be found, have, with special care, marked out the extent, and described the manner, of the proceeding. Our earliest act upon this subject (that I have met with) was passed in 1744, and may be found in 5 Hen. stat. at large, p. 220. It has remained the law ever since, with few alterations, until the revision of 1819; when an important change (to be noticed presently) was made. The preamble to the act of 1744, states, couciously and clearly, the mischief to be remedied. "Whereas creditors have experienced great difficulties in the recovery of debts due from persons residing without the jurisdiction of this commonwealth, but who have effects here, sufficient to satisfy and pay such debts: for remedy whereof, be it enacted" &c. We see here, that the very foundation of this jurisdiction is the non-residence of the debtor, and his having effects here. The next section shews more particularly, the meaning given to the word effects: it speaks of a suit in equity against a defendant who is out of this country, and others within the same, "having in their hands effects of, or otherwise indebted to, such absent defendant." Thus the law stood from 1744 to 1819. The language here used, plainly evinces, that the remedy did not reach the real estate of the absentee; and the uniform practice under the law, so far as I have seen, proves that such was the understanding. At the revival of 1819, we find the words just quoted as existing in the old law, and immediately following are these, "or 307 *having lands or tenements within the commonwealth." And in an after part of the statute, we find a clause providing with special care, for the mode of proceeding, in order to subject the land of absent defendants to sale. Until this law took effect, it may be safely affirmed, that no land of an absent defendant could be decreed to be sold under a foreign attachment. Let us return to the form in which the suit is to proceed. The law prescribes, that if, "in any such suit, the appearance of the absentee be not entered, and security given, to the satisfaction of the court, for performing the decree; upon affidavit that such defendant is out of the country, or that upon inquiry at his usual place of abode he could not be found, so as to be served with process;" then, the court is to take proper steps for the safety of the debts or effects; then also, it is to appoint some day in the next term, for the absent defendant to enter his appearance, and give security for performing the decree; and this order is to be published. If the absentee shall fail to comply with this order, by appearing and giving security, the court may then proceed to a final decree; subject to be opened within seven years, by the appearance of the absentee &c. and such proceedings are then to be had, as if he had appeared at the first filing of the bill. It will be observed how careful the law has been in these provisions, to guard against abuse: 1. the defendant must have failed to appear to the subpoena; 2. there must be an affidavit that he is out of the country, or that upon inquiry at his usual place of abode, he could not be found, so as to be served with process; 3. there must be a day of appearance given; 4. this must be published, both in the newspapers for two months, and at the door of the courthouse. Without these proceedings, there can be no foreign attachment; no decree against an absentee; no sale of his effects or estate. The affidavit, especially, lies at the very root of the proceeding; without it, the court cannot take a single step. It seems to be the idea of some, that this affidavit comprehends as well him take. This part of the statute is dealing wholly with persons residing without the jurisdiction of the commonwealth. The legislature knew, that a person indebted, and about to leave the state, would often remove so secretly as to put it beyond the power of his creditor, to prove whither he had gone: in such case, it was considered, that an affidavit, that upon inquiry at his usual place of abode, he could not be found, was sufficient evidence of non-residence, to found and commence the proceeding. That this is the meaning, seems still more clear from the 6th section of the same law, which authorizes a justice of the peace, to issue an attachment against a debtor, who "is removing out of the county or corporation privately, or absconds or conceals himself, so that the ordinary process of law cannot be served on him." This is a proceeding very different from a foreign attachment, and made for the express case of a debtor, who, without leaving the state, keeps out of the way of process.

Let us now briefly examine the case made by the record. The plaintiff, and the defendant James Kelso, had, it seems, for a number of years, resided in the county of Bath. The plaintiff alleges, in his bill, that after the debts due him by Kelso were contracted, and became due, Kelso very seldom appeared in Bath, having married in Louisa, or some of the lower counties of this state; and on very diligent inquiry, he could not be found in the county in which he was said to reside, and at length disappeared intirely, being said to have left the state and gone to parts unknown; that, at the commencement of this suit, he was reported to be an inhabitant of Kentucky, or at least, he was said to have been sometimes seen there. The bill then states several fraudulent conveyances of his land made by Kelso to his children, with intent to defraud his creditors; and prays the court to set aside these conveyances, and subject the lands, or so much of them as shall be found sufficient, to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim. Taking this bill simply upon its face, is it 309 *not demurrable? I am clearly of opinion that it is. It is most defectively drawn, and so vague, that it is difficult to decide, whether the draftsman expected by the force of his bond alone, to attack the deed to the children, set it aside, and sell the land, or whether he thought to come to the same results, by treating the defendant as an absconding debtor; or whether the object was to proceed against him as an absent defendant. If he meant the first, we know that no creditor at large, can come into equity to impeach the conveyance of his debtor. To me it is equally clear, that the fact of a debtor's so absconding or concealing himself, that the ordinary process of law cannot be served on him, confers no jurisdiction on a court of equity to sell his land. I think so, not only because I find no law giving such power, but because I find a law giving, in that express case, process of a different kind, against the personal goods, not the land of the debtor; to bring him before a legal not an equitable tribunal. But, even if equity would, under any circumstances, entertain a bill of this kind, against an absconding debtor, such bill must at least be accompanied by an affidavit that the debtor was absconding: here there is none such: and for this defect, the bill was demurrable. But the third hypothesis, to wit, that Kelso was an absent defendant, seemed most relied on. Does the bill so state him? I say no. There is no such averment. It says, indeed, (but even this, not sworn to), that at the commencement of the suit, he was reported to be an inhabitant of Kentucky, or at least, to have been sometimes seen there. This surely will not be said to be an averment of any thing: it is the statement of a vague rumour, that Kelso was sometimes seen in Kentucky, which might happen from a transient visit; and this, no one will contend, would justify a proceeding against him as an absent defendant. The bill then was demurrable, for this defect. But, again, at the time this bill was filed, there was no law (as I have already shewn) subjecting the lands of non-residents to sale for debt; and, therefore, if the bill had positively averred that Kelso was an absentee, it would have been demurrable.

310 *The proceeding was wholly irregular in other respects. There was no affidavit, either that the defendant was an absentee, or that on application at his usual place of abode, he could not be found; and this, we have seen, is necessary. There was no day of appearance given him; no publication; in truth no one step, which the law directs to be taken against an absentee; but process after process was issued, and the cause continued from rules to rules as to Kelso, just as it would be against a resident defendant. Again; suppose we consider the allegation that Kelso was an absentee, properly and directly made by the bill, there are the answers of three defendants, put in promptly after the bill was filed, directly contradicting the allegation, and averring that Kelso was and had been living in Louisa, where he was a housekeeper and farmer, for four years; which would make him a resident there, before the commencement of this suit, and one of the defendants denied, that he ever lived in Kentucky. Will it be said that these defendants had no concern with this fact, and that their answers cannot be evidence for the other defendant? The reply is, that they are concerned, and deeply interested, in the fact: for the sole pretence on which this creditor at large, could call them into court, was the non-residence of their father. If they had brought into court, full proof that their father was, at the commencement of the suit, and had been ever since, residing on his farm in Louisa, amenable to process, can any body doubt, that the court, without any appearance or answer of the father, should have dismissed the whole proceeding? And, though they have not brought in this plenary proof, they have, by answers responsive to the bill, disproved the allegation; and that is enough, until the plaintiff countervail it by sufficient proof, which he has not done. But afterwards Kelso himself appeared, and filed his answer: if the plaintiff had considered him still a non-resident, he would, of course, have objected to this appearance, unless he gave bond and security to perform the decree; and, if he had so objected, the court would have

311 *required such bond and security, unless the residence of the defendant had been proved to its satisfaction. But, so far from objecting, the plaintiff assents, by taking at once a replication to the answer. This changed the aspect of the case: the defendant was no longer an absentee, but rectus in curia: the attached property was discharged; and the cause would proceed, like any other, to a hearing. If, on the hearing, the court considered, that the case made by the bill gave it jurisdiction, it would render a personal decree for the debt, which the plaintiff might enforce as he could any other decree or judgment. It is admitted, on all hands, that an appearance discharges the attachment, where the property attached is personal. Surely, the same effect follows where land is attached, both from the reason of the case, and the care with which the land of an absentee is protected from sale, while there is any personal fund in the power of the court. And this very point was decided in Tiernans v. Schley &c., 2 Leigh, 25. In that case, the appearance of the absent defendant was what, in the judgment of this court, changed the nature of the suit, and discharged the land. In the case before us (as I have said) the plaintiff may fairly be taken to have assented, since, without objection, he took a replication to the answer; or, if he did not assent, the court might have had full proof before it, that the defendant had never been an absentee, in which case it ought not to have required security; and, as it might have had such proof, we are bound, until the contrary appears, to presume, that it did have it, if such presumption be necessary to justify its proceedings.

I have been thus particular in my examination of this case, because my experience, especially in the western chancery court, has convinced me, that this process, unless narrowly watched, is liable to great abuse. I think the case wrong from the foundation, and that the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

312 *CABELL, J. It has been repeatedly decided by this court, that a creditor at large, having no judgment or other lien on the property of his debtor, cannot prosecute a suit in equity, for the purpose of setting aside a fraudulent conveyance of property by the debtor. To this general rule, there is, however, one exception; and that is where the debtor by removal out of the state, or by evading the process of the law, puts it out of the power of the creditor, to obtain a judgment at law. But, in such case, the fact of non-residence, or of evasion of legal process, must be averred in the bill, and proved to the satisfaction of the court. If the fact be not proved, it is the same as if it had not been averred, and then there is no ground to support the jurisdiction of the court as against the fraudulent alienees. In the case before us, the fact of residence beyond the limits of the state, was expressly denied and put in issue by the answers; and there is no proof to support the averment in the bill, except the testimony of a witness, who speaks of a vague report, that the debtor had removed to the state of Kentucky. This testimony cannot prevail against the answers. As to the evasion of the process of the law, there is no evidence whatever, except as to the difficulty of serving process in the county of Bath. But the debtor was not an inhabitant of that county, according to the allegation of the bill itself. To justify the interference of a court of equity, on this ground, it is necessary, that it should be proved to the court, that the defendant, upon inquiry at his or her usual place of abode, could not be found. There is no such proof in this case. Nor did the plaintiff proceed, in any respect, as directed by law in the case of absent defendants, or defendants evading the process of the law. He has not, therefore, entitled himself to proceed against the alienees of the debtor's property; and as to them, the bill ought to have been dismissed, whatever decree the plaintiff may have been entitled to as against the debtor himself. But, in truth, he was not entitled to any decree, even as against the debtor; for even according to the bill, the claim was 313 purely of a legal nature. A general demurrer to the bill, as between the plaintiff and the debtor, would have been sustained. Therefore, I am of opinion, that the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

BROOKE, J., concurred in the opinion of judge Cabell.

TUCKER, P., dissented. He said, I am satisfied in this case, that the appellee had a right to consider the defendant, James Kelso, as within the provisions of the statute prescribing the mode of proceeding against absent debtors. That statute authorizes a proceeding by foreign attachment, where it appears that the defendant is not a resident of the commonwealth, or that, upon inquiry at his or her usual place of abode, he could not be found so as to be served with process. Here, the bill sufficiently alleges, I think, that the defendant was believed to be non-resident, and at any rate, to use its language, that he could not be found. It is too late, in this stage of the cause, to bring this matter into question, after an appearance and answer by James Kelso, without putting the matter fairly in issue. But if it were not, I think enough appears to sustain the bill. Sittlington deposes, that it was generally believed, that he had removed to, and was living in, Kentucky, about the time the suit was brought; and he himself, in a letter, alludes to the fact that he had been in Kentucky after the right of action accrued. Moreover, Sittlington and Francisco, with several other witnesses, conspire to fix the fact that he systematically kept out of the way of the process of the law; and the record shews, that process after process issued against him in this suit, unavailingly, for several years. He was, then, precisely such a defendant, as is permitted to be sued in equity upon a law demand, because he cannot be arrested upon legal process. In equity, he was liable to be proceeded against by order of publication, and after decree, by such order as the court might think proper. Had he never appeared, the decree against him would have been 314 erroneous, without an order of publication duly executed. But, as he appeared and answered, that measure was not necessary, and, indeed, would not have been proper. Had he, upon appearing, pleaded in abatement, to the jurisdiction, that he had not absconded, and was not a non-resident, and that fact had appeared, the bill must have been dismissed. But it was essential that that matter should be so pleaded, according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 86, which applies in all cases, where the objection to the jurisdiction depends upon circumstances extrinsic. After answer filed, and no plea in abatement to the jurisdiction, the exception to jurisdiction, founded on a state of facts different from that alleged in the bill, cannot be heard. For this, there are sound reasons; 1. to prevent the plaintiff, when he comes to hearing upon the merits, from being surprised by an objection which he could not anticipate; and 2. to prevent the gross abuse (as in this case) of awaiting the last stage of a controversy, before an objection is presented, which, without touching the merits, turns the plaintiff round to a new course of litigation. This is, in my opinion, a gross abuse. The objection would seem to be made, for the first time, in this court; and to allow it, would be to repeal a most wise and salutary statute; a statute whose provisions, instead of being narrowed and confined, deserved to have been construed with the greatest liberality.

The court then, was, in my opinion, properly possessed of the cause. Kelso submitted himself to the jurisdiction without objection, and filed an answer to the merits. That did not oust the jurisdiction. The filing of the answer, whether with or without security, and resting upon the merits, has no other effect than to discharge the attachment. It does not abate the suit. The only effect of the answer is, to make up an issue on the merits, and present the case to the court for its decision; for, as its jurisdiction well attached at first, it must proceed to settle the matter between the parties. This is too plain to be contested. If A. attaches B.'s goods in the hands of C. for a bond 315 debt, *and B. enters his appearance, answers, and gives security; the attachment is discharged, indeed, but the chancellor proceeds to decree the amount of the bond, though it is obviously a legal demand. For, in truth, though the proceeding is had in equity, the question between the debtor and creditor, in these cases, is, generally, a legal demand, to which the defendant may plead such matter as would have been good in a court of law. Wilson v. Koontz, 7 Cranch, 202.

The court thus having jurisdiction of the case regularly, at least as to James Kelso, proceeded to a decree, which is not assailed upon the merits: so far from it, James Kelso has acquiesced in it. He took no appeal. John Kelso is the only appellant.

By the decree thus rendered, and which is in its character definitive, if not technically final, the plaintiff's demand is decreed him. And it cannot be denied, that that decree would have bound the lands of James Kelso, and indeed does bind the lands of James Kelso, as he did not appeal from it. The instant this lien on his lands attached, the right to assail the fraudulent deeds sprung into existence, according to the strictest principles. That right now unquestionably exists, I presume, under this decree; and although this court should reverse the whole proceedings as to the fraudulent grantees, yet the plaintiff may commence against them de novo, on the foot of this decree, and demand the rescission of their deeds. The utmost, then, to be effected is, that the parties will be turned around to a new race of litigation, to try again a question already settled by the verdict of a jury; and settled, too, to their satisfaction, for no new trial has been solicited. If this oppressive and vexatious course is indeed required by the rules of the court, we must, I acknowledge, acquiesce in it. But, while on the one hand, I think no direct authority can be produced in its favour, it is not difficult to shew that, in equity, parties may be brought before the court, along with the debtor of the plaintiff, with a view to charge them, when 316 *the demand shall have been first established, against the principal defendant. Thus, although it is admitted that, as a general rule, an executor and his sureties could not, without a previous suit establishing a devastavit, be sued in equity for the purpose of subjecting them; yet, if the executor is out of the state, or is dead, leaving no representative, such suit will be entertained. Spotswood v. Dandridge, 4 Munf. 298. In such case, as the law formerly stood, they would only have been liable at law, after a judgment should have been recovered against him. And yet equity held the innocent surety in court, until it could pronounce that judgment; and, in the same instant, decreed also against them. How much more reasonable, in this case of a fraudulent and absconding debtor, to bring him and his accomplices before the court together, the court having full jurisdiction as to him, and to hold them in court until it could pronounce judgment against him? If, indeed, the creditor was without this remedy against an absent defendant and his fraudulent donees, then it is obvious, that nothing more was wanting to consummate a fraud, before the statute authorizing lands to be attached, than that the fraudulent donor should hasten to quit the state, before a suit at law could be prosecuted against him. In that event, as no judgment could be rendered, no lien could be obtained. The creditor must have been without remedy; and the perpetrators of the fraud would have been protected by this nicety, in the enjoyment of their nefarious gains. I cannot readily accede to propositions, which would lead to such consequences.

If it be said, that a demurrer to the bill by the fraudulent donees, would have been sustained, I answer, it would not lie with more propriety, than a demurrer by the sureties of the executor, in the case above cited. The same answer would be given to the sureties who are privies in contract, and to the donees who are privies in fraud; namely, that the establishment of the plaintiff's demand against their principal, would, in the same instant, justify a decree against 317 *themselves. Having connected themselves with him, they are joined with him in action, to abide his fate.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that the court had jurisdiction of this case, and that the decree is correct, except in one particular. A sale of the land is decreed, which should not have been directed, unless it had appeared that the rents and profits would not keep down the interest; and moreover, the sale of the whole is decreed, instead of a moiety, which upon principle, and on the authority of Stileman v. Ashdown, 2 Atk. 608, is all that the plaintiff had a right to charge. The fraud does not add to the extent of his power to charge the land. Nor will this court add to it. It only removes the fraudulent deed out of his way, and leaves him to the effect of his elegit, which is to charge the moiety only; with this difference, that a sale, instead of an extent of that moiety, will be directed, where it has been ascertained that the rents and profits will not keep down the interest. The court, therefore, should have decreed the debt to the plaintiff; and, upon that foundation, should have further decreed the deeds to be void. They being removed out of the way of the plaintiff, he might then have been at liberty to sue out his elegit on the decree; and, had it appeared, that the rents and profits would not keep down the interest, then and not till then, a sale should have been decreed of the moiety.

Decree reversed, and bill dismissed.

Mills—Failure to Establish According to Law—Right as against Public Navigation Company—Case at Bar.

—W. being the owner of an island situate in the falls of the Appomattox, a navigable river, applies to the county court for leave to erect a mill on his island, and to condemn an acre of land on the main, belonging to T. for an abutment for his mill dam: the acre of land is condemned, and leave is given to W. to build his mill on his island: W. abuts his dam against the condemned acre, but does not build his mill on his island, but builds it on the mainland belonging to T. below the condemned acre, on a canal conducted from a point above the dam, through T.'s land; and he cuts his canal through, and builds his mill on, T.'s land, with T.'s consent: HELD, this mill is not established according to law, so as to entitle W. and those claiming the mill rights under him, and T.'s land under him, to take the water from the river to work the mill, as against the public right of navigation, and a company incorporated by law to improve the navigation.

Easement by Twenty Years' Use—Must Be Adverse. —The use of the water of a river, or other easement, claimed on the ground of twenty years possession and enjoyment: HELD, such possession and enjoyment, to give the right claimed, must be adversary.

court of Henrico) by Stokes & Smith, merchant millers and partners, against The trustees of the Upper Appomatox company, (a company incorporated by law for improving the navigation of the river Appomatox) for unlawfully diverting the water of the river from the plaintiffs' mills thereon situated.

There were two counts in the declaration. The first alleged, that the plaintiffs were the owners of a manufacturing mill, grist mill and saw mill, situate in the county of Chesterfield, near the lower end of the falls of the Appomatox, and that they were of right entitled to the use and benefit of the water of the river, as it flowed in its natural channel, for working the machinery of their mills; and charged, generally, that the Upper Appomatox company, by means of a dam erected across the river, above the falls thereof, diverted into a canal cut by the company, a large quantity of the water of the river from its natural channel, and from the plaintiffs' mills, and to which the water ought of right to have flowed, and so prevented a sufficient supply of the water of the river for working the machinery of the mills, from flowing to the same. The second count,—after setting out (in like manner as in the first) the plaintiffs' ownership of the mills, and their right to the use and benefit of the water of the river, as it flowed in its natural channel, for working the same,—charged, that the company, being incorporated to improve the navigation of the river, and authorized to take and turn into a canal, only so much of the water of the river as should be necessary and sufficient for the purposes of the navigation, did lawfully cut their canal, and did, at first, divert into the canal as much water as was necessary and sufficient for all purposes of navigation, leaving the remainder of the stream, which was abundantly sufficient for the plaintiffs' mills, to flow in the natural channel of the river, as of right it ought to have flowed, to their mills; and then, the company unlawfully diverted into their canal a large quantity of the remainder of the stream, and more than enough for the purposes of navigation, and so prevented a sufficient quantity of the water to work the plaintiffs' mills, from flowing in the natural channel of the river to the same, as of right it ought to have flowed; by reason whereof, there was not now a sufficient supply of water to work the mills, left flowing in the natural channel of the river.

The company pleaded, 1. the general issue: 2. that it had, as lawfully it might and ought, diverted into its canal, only so much of the water of the river from its natural channel, as was necessary for the purposes of the navigation: and 3. that the plaintiffs' mill and mill dam were not authorized and established according to law, being erected without any order of court, at the place where their mill and dam were erected, and so the plaintiffs were no wise entitled by law to the use of the water of the river for their mills. And upon these pleas issues were made up.

At the trial of these issues, the plaintiffs filed two bills of exceptions to instructions given by the court to the jury.

I. The first stated, that several acts of assembly, relative to the navigation of the Appomatox, were given in evidence, viz:

1st. The act of 1762, ch. 16, § 4-10; 7 Hen. stat. at large, p. 591-4, providing, that every owner of a mill then erected on this river, above Atkinson's mill (a mill situated on the falls, between the scite of the plaintiffs' mills, and the head of the company's canal) should place such locks in their mill dams for the passage of boats, as the trustees therein named should direct, and that any persons, who should afterwards build mills, on the river, either above or below Atkinson's mill, as the river should from time to time be cleared and made navigable, should, in like manner, place locks in their dams, under heavy penalties for failing to do so; appointing trustees for clearing the river for navigation; authorizing them to receive and collect subscriptions for the purpose; and empowering them to remove all stops and hedges, except such mills and mill dams as were thereby permitted and allowed to be built.

2nd. The act of 1787, ch. 53, 2 Old Rev. Code, Pleasants' edi. append. 3, ch. 1, p. 34, appointing trustees for clearing and improving the navigation of the Appomatox, from Banister's mill (a mill situated on the falls, below Atkinson's, and above the plaintiffs' mills) to the highest point practicable, provided they should begin the work as near Banister's mill as circumstances would admit; empowering them to cut canals where necessary for the purpose of navigation; authorizing them to receive and collect subscriptions for the work; vesting all canals and other works in the trustees and their successors, for the use of the subscribers, with power to collect tolls, to compensate them for the improvement; and providing, that all owners of mills on the river above Banister's, should place locks in their dams, or on canals cut round them, for the passage of boats; and if they failed to do so, declaring their mills and dams nuisances, which might and should be abated.

3rd. The act of 1792, ch. 60, Id. ch. 5, p. 40, to "explain and amend" the act of 1787; whereby,—after reciting that doubts had arisen, whether the trustees would have a right, under that act, to lease or sell any part of the land they might acquire, and any of the water passing through their canals, for water mills and other useful works,—the trustees were expressly authorized [§ 2], to sell or lease any part of the lands they might acquire, and so much of the water passing through their canals, as might be necessary for such mills or other useful works, and as, in their opinion, might be disposed of without prejudice to the navigation. And, reciting that doubts had arisen under the act of 1787, whether the trustees had a right to open the navigation below Banister's mill, they were authorized [§ 4], to open the navigation as near to that mill, either above or below the same, at such places, and in such manner, as in their opinion would be most for the benefit of the navigation. But it was provided [§ 6], that nothing therein contained should be construed to allow the trustees to make sale of any mill seat, except between Atkinson's and Banister's mills.

4th. The act of 1795, ch. 35, Id. ch. 6, p. 42, entitled, "an act to amend and reduce into one the several acts for opening and extending the navigation of Appomatox river," by which the present company was incorporated (for nothing had been done under the former acts) by the name of The trustees of the Upper Appomatox company. This act appointed trustees; incorporated them into a company, for clearing, improving and extending, the navigation of the river from Banister's mill as far up as practicable, so as to have a sufficient depth and width of water for the navigation of boats carrying eight hogsheads of tobacco; gave the company the usual corporate powers, with 322 authority to receive and collect subscriptions for the work, and to demand *and receive tolls as compensation for the improvement; empowered it [§ 6], to purchase lands by contract through which to cut their canals where necessary, or to have them valued and condemned by a jury, in like manner as was provided by the act for opening and extending the navigation of Potowmac river; and vested the lands so purchased, and the lands so to be condemned, upon payment of the valuation assessed by the jury, in the company, in fee. And the profits arising from the tolls [§ 10], were vested in the company, to enable it to keep its canals, locks and other works, in repair, and the overplus for the use and benefit of the stockholders. This act also again enacted [§ 12], that owners of mills on the river, above Banister's mill, should make locks through their dams, or on canals cut around them, and keep the same in repair, with persons to attend them, to let boats pass at all times; declaring all mill dams in case the owners should fail to make such locks &c. nuisances, which might and should be abated at the owners' expence.

5th. The act of 1796, ch. 26, Id. ch. 7, p. 46, entitled, "an act to amend" the act of incorporation of 1795; whereby power was given to the company, to clear, improve and extend, the navigation of the river from Banister's mills to tide water, or as near thereto as it should deem advisable and necessary; and to enable the company thus to extend the navigation, the same powers, under the same regulations, as were given by the act of 1795, were in the company.

And 6th, the act of 1802, ch. 26, Id. ch. 13, p. 54, providing, that no court should thereafter grant leave to any person whatever, to build a mill or dam on that part of Appomatox river, which lies between Planters Town [the highest point of the navigation] and the head of the canal cut by the company (meaning the canal cut round the great falls to Petersburg).

And the company adduced evidence to prove, that the canal it had in fact cut, was, according to the original plan, intended to be 3 feet deep and 16 feet wide, 323 such being proper *dimensions for a canal for boats carrying eight hogsheads of tobacco: that the water of the river was turned into the canal at its head, above the great falls, by means of a dam run across the river for the purpose: that the body of water so turned from the river into the canal, was, at its head, only 3 feet deep and 16 feet wide: that the bed of the canal was so graduated through its whole course, as to have a regular gradual fall of twelve inches to the mile, and it is thus conducted to Indian-town creek, about 3 miles 122 poles below the head of the canal: that, at Indian-town creek, the company had constructed four locks, to let the water down from the canal above, to a proper level for the canal below, which was graduated in like manner, and was conducted from the locks, by an aqueduct over the creek, and thence, 1 mile 260 poles, to an artificial basin, 120 feet square, constructed at the upper end of the town of Petersburg, for the purpose of receiving boats, and affording a convenient landing for their cargoes; at which basin the upper navigation of the river at present ends: that, just below the head of the canal, there was a large waste, so constructed as to discharge back into the river, all the water received into the canal at its head, beyond what was necessary to keep the water in it three feet deep: that, between that large waste and the waste at the locks at Indian-town creek, there were three other smaller wastes, the last of which was one and a half miles above the waste at the locks; and these three wastes were so contrived as to discharge back into the river, far above the plaintiffs' mills, all the water diverted into the canal, beyond what was necessary to keep the water therein three feet deep: that, at the said locks at Indian-town creek, there was another waste, so contrived as to discharge all the water in the canal immediately above those locks, beyond what was necessary to keep three feet depth of water in the canal there; but the water discharged by this waste at the locks, was not returned to the river, but was conducted round the locks, into the canal below them;

324 such being the method adopted to feed *the canal from the locks to the basin at Petersburg: that the waste at the locks was about 14 feet wide, and the water running over it, in ordinary seasons, about two inches deep on the waste: that there was another waste at the basin, to let off the water from the basin to the river; which waste was 25 feet wide, and the water running over it, in ordinary seasons, only one inch deep on the waste: that, in dry seasons, the water running over the wastes, was not half so deep on the wastes, as at ordinary seasons: that the water discharged by the waste at the basin, passed over a stripe of land, owned by the company down to the river, into which it fell about 100 yards below the plaintiffs' mills; and on this stripe of land, were situated the mill seat and the mill, let to tenants by the company, of which, and of the lease of water for working the same, the plaintiffs complained in this action, as injurious to their property; and that, at dry seasons, there was a great dearth of water discharged over the waste at the basin, for working the company's mill there situate.

And the plaintiffs adduced evidence to support the issues on their part, and in opposition to that adduced by the company; evidence to prove, inter alia, that the fall or graduation of the canal, of twelve inches in the mile, was greater than was necessary or convenient for the purposes of navigation, and the company thereby acquired. and was enabled to apply to mill power, a much greater quantity of water than was necessary for navigation, or for any other purpose except mill power: and that the surplus of water might be conveniently discharged at a waste, which was placed at a short distance below the locks at Indian-town creek, which would discharge the water above Banister's, as well as the plaintiffs' mills; but the waste last mentioned, has been so constructed by the company as to prevent the passage over it, of much of the surplus water in dry seasons, and to throw all or the greater part thereof over the waste at the basin, whence it was used and applied by the company for mill power.

325 *And it was proved, that the supply of water for the plaintiffs' mills, was drawn from the river at a point below Banister's mills, and below all the wastes of the company's canals, except that at the basin: that, at dry seasons, namely, for a considerable time between the 1st August and the 1st October, in ordinary years, there was a scarcity of water for the mills on the river, including the plaintiffs' mills: and that, during this time, the water discharged over the company's waste at the basin, was used by it, or under its authority, for mill power, and discharged into the river below the plaintiffs' mills.

Whereupon, the counsel for the company prayed the court to charge and instruct the jury as to the law of the case; and the court gave the following charge and instruction to the jury—

That a grant of running water to a company, and a grant of a right to carry that water through a navigable canal, from one point of a river to a lower point, for the purpose of improving the navigation, conveyed an absolute right to the use of all the water which might be necessary for that purpose. That the right to carry the water through a canal, given to such company, gave no right to stagnate it, so as to injure the health of the people dwelling in the neighbourhood. That, unless vessels were perpetually passing such a canal, there must be always a surplus of water, over and above what was necessary for navigation, and it was the duty of the company to carry off such surplus water, and its right, to carry it off, at the lower end of its canal, unless it was restricted by law as to the point at which it was to be carried off. That this company had a right to sell or lease the surplus water to others, for the purpose of working mills and the like; in other words, that this mill power (as it had been called) so far as it could be given by the surplus water, was a necessary incident to the grant of running water, and of the right to convey it by a canal, as aforesaid. That this incidental power was so understood by the legislature, when it granted

326 the charters of the James and Potowmac river navigation companies; for it there recognized it; but fearing lest the companies might abuse their power, by trespassing upon the lands of adjacent proprietors, or by condemning their lands for mill seats, under pretext of carrying their canals through them, it restrained them from using their water for mill power, except with the consent of those proprietors. That the act of 1787, ch. 53, granted to The trustees of the Appomatox company, the right to sell or dispose of all the surplus water, which might be in their canal, over and above what was necessary for navigation, for mill purposes, and was so understood by the legislature. That, by that act, the trustees could not let off this water below Banister's mill; and by the act of 1792, though they were allowed to open the navigation below Banister's mill, yet they were restrained from selling a mill seat below it. That the act of 1795, ch. 35, incorporating the present company, gave it the same powers as the old company had by the act of 1787, but did not allow the new company to open the navigation below Banister's mill: therefore, the power to do so, conferred by the 4th section of the act of 1792, ch. 60, was repealed, by the act of 1795, as coming within its purview; and with the 4th section, the proviso contained in the 6th section, restraining the trustees from selling any mill seats except between Atkinson's and Banister's mills, was also repealed. That, by the act of 1796, ch. 26, express power was given to the company to extend the navigation from Banister's mills to tide water; and that, the former restriction as to selling mill seats not being renewed, the incidental power of carrying off the surplus water of the canal from the lower end thereof, and selling that surplus water to other purposes, for working mills, and the like, accompanies the power so to extend the navigation. That, for the purpose of improving the navigation of Appomatox river, a just and sound discretion was vested in the present company, by its

327 *canal, and the proper mode of cutting and graduating it; in the exercise of which discretion, it was bound strictly to keep in view the object for which it was authorized to cut the canal: if it had exercised this authority mala fide, for the purpose of taking from the river, more water than was convenient and sufficient for the commodious navigation of boats carrying eight hogsheads of tobacco, and had, by the graduation of the canal, increased the quantity of the surplus water therein beyond what was necessary for such commodious navigation, so as to increase its own mill power to a greater degree than it would have by a canal judiciously made, then it was liable to an action for damages, by any owner of a mill on the river, whose quantity of water was reduced by such injudicious act: but, if it had exercised its authority soundly, having regard to the nature of the ground, the expense to which it was subject, the distance of the two points between which the canal was to be cut, and the health of the neighbourhood, then no injury was done to any of the proprietors of the mills on the river, for which an action could be maintained. That it was the duty of the jury to decide, whether or not this discretion on the part of the company, had been exercised soundly. That the company had a right to apply the surplus water of the canal to mill power, on its own account, or on account of such persons to whom it might lease or sell the same, so as not to trespass on the lands of other persons, in the use of the water, or letting it off, and a right to let off the surplus water at the basin terminating the canal in Petersburg; and was not restricted, by any of the acts of assembly referred to, from establishing mill seats, on any part of the river or canal, except between Atkinson's and Banister's mills. And that the plaintiffs had no right to claim redress in this action, for any injury to the navigation of the canal, between the basin and the locks at Indian-town creek, by the use of the water from the basin.

The plaintiffs, by their counsel, excepted to so much of the above opinion and charge, as affirmed the right of the 328 *company to use water from their canal for mill power, and to discharge the same below their mills, thereby lessening their supply of water, or to discharge any more water from the basin at the end of the canal, to a part of the river below the plaintiffs' mills, than was necessary to keep the water in the canal and basin, from stagnating and injuring the health of the neighbourhood, provided the surplus water, or the excess thereof beyond the purposes last mentioned, could be conveniently discharged above Banister's mills; and also, to so much of the said opinion and charge, as affirmed the right of the company to make sale of any mill seat on any part of the river or canal, except between Atkinson's and Banister's mills.

II. The second bill of exceptions set out the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs, to shew that their mills were established according to law.

It being admitted, that the whole bed of the Appomatox, in that part, is in the county of Chesterfield, the southern water line of the river being the boundary between that county and Dinwiddie; the plaintiffs exhibited the record of a proceeding in the county court of Chesterfield, whereby it appeared, that Luke Wheeler, in April 1791, being the owner of an island in the river, not far above the termination of the falls and the head of the tide water, applied to that court, for leave to erect a water grist mill on the island, and prayed that an acre of land on the main, on the northern shore, belonging to John Tabb, should be laid off and condemned as an abutment for his mill dam. Whereupon the county court issued the usual writ of ad quod damnum; in pursuance whereof an acre of Tabb's land was laid off for the abutment, which the jury valued at £20. and found, that the building a mill, at the place set forth in Wheeler's petition, would not damage any mansion house or offices, curtilages or gardens, thereto belonging, nor would any orchards be overflowed, nor would fish of passage or ordinary navigation be in any manner ob-329 structed thereby. The inquisition *being returned, and Wheeler producing Tabb's receipt for the £20. the court, at May term 1791, with Tabb's consent, made an order, declaring that there appeared no legal impediment or reason why the leave asked by Wheeler should not be granted, condemning the acre of land for the abutment of the dam, and giving Wheeler leave to erect the mill on his island.

The plaintiffs then proved that Wheeler proceeded, without delay, to erect his mill, not however upon his island, but on Tabb's land on the main, taking the water from the river above the dam and abutment allowed by the order of the county court, and conducting it by a canal to his mill, which was built some distance below the abutment. And they offered evidence to prove, that the canal was dug through, and the mill built on, Tabb's land, with his assent and approbation; that the plaintiffs had acquired the title of both Wheeler and Tabb; and that they, and those under whom they claimed, had been in quiet and undisturbed occupation of the mills, for more than twenty years before this action was instituted.

The plaintiffs also exhibited the record of another proceeding in the county court of Chesterfield, whereby it appeared, that in 1816, they applied by petition to that court, representing that they were now the owners of the land on the main on the northern shore of the river, and that, for the purpose of raising the head of water for their mills already established, they wished to make a dam from the main across an arm of the river, to an island therein belonging to S. Turner, and thence across another very small gut to another island in the river, which was the northern abutment of Mackenzie & Christian's mill dam (whose mill was situate on the southern shore, on the main); and praying leave to erect such dam from the main to Turner's island, and the condemnation of land on Turner's island for the abutment. The court issued a writ of ad quod damnum; an inquisition was taken and returned; the whole of Turner's island (about 3-4ths of an acre) was, with his consent,
330 condemned *for the abutment; and leave was given to the plaintiffs, to make the dam from the main to Turner's island, according to the prayer of the petition. The continuation of the dam, from Turner's island to the island which was the abutment of Mackenzie & Christian's dam, was made by them and the plaintiffs, uniting in the work for their mutual advantage.

It appeared, by a map laid before the jury, that this new dam was some distance above the dam made by Wheeler, and that the water drawn from the river for the use of the mills at present, was taken out above the new dam, and thence conducted by a canal to the mills.

Whereupon, the court, on the motion of the counsel for the company, instructed the jury, that, under the order and proceedings of the county court of Chesterfield first above stated, Wheeler had no right to build his mill where he did build it, on the land of Tabb, or on any other land but his own, and no right to take water from the river for the mill he built on Tabb's land; that no consent or act of Tabb could authorize Wheeler, under the order of the county court, to build his mill and cut his canal on Tabb's land, and to take water from the river for the use of the mill so there built; that, therefore, the mill was not established according to law, so as to entitle Wheeler, or any claiming under him, to draw water from the river, by means of his dam, for the use of the mill; and that, upon the pleadings in this case, the plaintiffs could not recover damages for any injury done by the company, in diverting the water of the river, by means of its canal and works connected with it, from the plaintiffs' mills thus built without any authority of law. To which opinion and instruction the plaintiffs excepted.

There was a verdict for the defendants, and judgment accordingly; to which this court, upon application of the plaintiffs, allowed them a supersedeas.

I. Johnson, for plaintiffs in error, upon the points presented by the first bill of exceptions, contended, that the 331 *charter of The Upper Appomatox company, did not, and could not, give the company a right to divert the waters of the river from their natural channel, even for the purposes of the navigation, to the injury of the owners of mills upon the river, whose rights to the use of the stream, for working their mills, had been previously acquired from the commonwealth, under the general law of the land: that though the public had a right to the use of the Appomatox, as of all other rivers, for the purposes of navigation, yet the plaintiffs in this case, under the order of the county court of Chesterfield of May 1791 (supposing that order and the proceedings under it regular) acquired a right to the use of the stream for their mill, paramount to the public right to the river for the purposes of navigation, and paramount, of course, to the rights granted to this company, to improve the navigation, since this company claimed its charter under the act of 1795: for, that the general statute of 1785, ch. 82, 12 Hen. stat. at large, p. 187, concerning mill dams and other obstructions of water courses, and all the subsequent statutes on the same subject, delegated to the county courts, full authority to grant leave to individuals to build dams across any stream, navigable or innavigable, for the purpose of raising a head of water to work mills; and empowered the county court to ascertain and determine, whether or no ordinary navigation would be thereby obstructed, and if it would, to lay the party under such conditions for preventing such obstruction, as to the courts should seem right; and these statutes proceeded on the principle, that the grantees of the mill rights, erecting mills which were of public use and convenience, performed a meritorious service to the public, which was a valuable consideration for the grant to them of the privilege to use the water. For these propositions, he cited Crenshaws v. The Slate river company, 6 Rand. 245, which, he insisted, was directly in point. In the present case, the county court of Chesterfield did ascertain and decide, that the building Wheeler's dam would not in any manner obstruct ordinary navigation, and granted him the privilege without any condition.

332 *Stanard and Leigh, for defendants in error, said, there was an obvious distinction between Crenshaws v. The Slate river company, and this case: Slate river had never been declared a navigable stream, and the legislature had never passed any act to assert the public right to that stream, for the purposes of navigation, much more any act expressly declaring and providing, that all mill rights should be subordinate to the public right of navigation, until long after the mills of the Crenshaws had been established according to law; whereas, with respect to the Appomatox the legislature had, expressly and repeatedly, asserted the public right to the stream for the purpose of navigation, and had provided that all mill rights granted to individuals, should be held in subordination thereto, before any leave was granted by the county court to Wheeler, under whom the plaintiffs claim, to build any mill and dam upon the river. This distinction between Slate river and the James and Appomatox, was carefully stated by Green, J., in his opinion in The Slate river company's case, Id. 268. Besides the several acts stated in the bill of exceptions, they referred to the act of 1745, ch. 18, 5 Hen. stat. at large, p. 375, and 1752, ch. 40, 6 Id. p. 291, to shew, that even thus early, the grant of any mill rights, that could at all interfere with the navigation of this river, or the improvement thereof, was inhibited. These early acts on the subject, indeed, were not set out in the bill of exceptions; but they were public statutes, of which the court would take judicial notice; for they were statutes concerning all persons generally, though in respect of a particular thing. 6 Gwill. Bac. Abr. Statute F. p. 374; Stribling v. Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 138, 148, 169, 188. Then, putting the authority of The Slate river company's case out of the way, it was impossible to find an objection to the charge given by the circuit court to the jury, stated in the first exceptions.

II. The general question presented by the second exceptions, was, Whether the mill that was in fact built by Wheeler 333 *on the main upon Tabb's land, with his consent, under colour of the order of the county court of Chesterfield of May 1791, granting him leave to build a mill on his own land in the island, was a mill established according to law, for the use of which he acquired, by that order of court, a right to draw water from this navigable river, the bed and the stream whereof belonged to the commonwealth? And this question led to a minute examination of the provisions, the principles and the policy, of the various statutes concerning mills and mill dams, which are referred to in a note upon the title of the revised statute of 1819, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 235, p. 225.

But Johnson contended, that the plaintiffs' legal right to their mills, and to the use of the water of the river for the same, could not be inquired into, in the collateral way, in which it was attempted to be drawn in question here. And if it might, and if their right was originally imperfect, yet they and those under whom they claimed, having enjoyed the use of the water for their mills, without interruption and without question, before the charter to The Upper Appomatox company, and for more than twenty years since the date of the charter, and before the commencement of this suit, such possession of itself sufficed to give them a right to the use of the water as an easement.

To this it was answered, 1. that the twenty years uninterrupted enjoyment of the water by the owners of these mills, was not stated in the bill of exceptions: it was only stated there, that they had been in quiet and undisturbed occupation of the mills for more than twenty years before the commencement of this suit, not before the company completed its canal, basin and waste at the basin, which was an interruption of the use of the water by the plaintiffs for their mills, and the very interruption they were now complaining of.

2. That the possession of such an easement, in order to give title to it, must be an adversary one; Coalter v. Hunter, 4 Rand. 58. Here, the use of the water for Stokes & Smith's mills, never became adversary

334 to the rights of the *company or of the public, till the company's use of the water became adversary to their's; that is, not till the company had completed its canal, basin, and waste there. Neither was it conceivable how any use of the water below the head of the company's canal, by which it drew its supply of water from the river, could be adversary to the company's use of the water. And 3. That mill rights of this kind, being only acquirable in Virginia by order of court, and the precise title of Stokes & Smith appearing by matter of record, there could be no room to presume a grant to them from any length of possession and enjoyment. There was no attempt to inquire into the plaintiffs' mill rights in a collateral way; they were directly put in issue by the pleadings.

CARR, J. If the instruction given by the circuit court to the jury, stated in the second bill of exceptions, was correct, that is decisive of the case. Was it correct?

Two preliminary objections were taken to it; 1. that the plaintiffs, and those under whom they claim, had been in quiet possession of the mill for more than twenty years; and 2. that the legality of the erection, could not be questioned in this collateral way. To the first, two answers present themselves: 1. that this is a public right; Crenshaws v. The Slate river company: 2. that the twenty years possession must be adverse; Coalter v. Hunter. The occupation of these mills on the stream below, could in no way affect the Appomatox company in their use of the water taken into their canal far above. As to the other objection, that we cannot inquire here, whether the order of court authorized the building the plaintiffs' mill; it must be recollected, that this case stands on ground very different from that of The Slateriver company. The Appomatox had long been declared by law a public highway, and the rights of the riparian possessors, with respect to building mills &c. modified and restricted. For the particulars on this point,

I refer to my brother Green's remarks

335 in *The Slate river company's case, 6 Rand. 267-9. The Appomatox company, under a public law, had erected their works, dug their canal, and taken out the water: for this, the plaintiffs, as millers, bring this action for an injury done to their mills: the defendants plead the very fact, that the order of court did not authorize the erection of this mill, and that therefore it is no legal mill; the plaintiffs take issue on this plea. Could it be wrong under this state of the pleadings, for the defendants to ask, or the court to give, instructions, as to the law of the subject?

But were those instructions right? Wheeler, owning the island, moved for leave to build a mill on it, and not owning the opposite shore, moved to condemn an acre for an abutment for his dam: he got this acre condemned, and leave to erect his mill on his island. Did this authorize him to build the mill on the opposite acre, condemned for his abutment? or on a canal taken out on the north side of the river, and away below that acre? I say, clearly no. The words have a distinct and definite meaning, and to that they must be confined. Suppose Wheeler, owning the island, had moved the court to condemn an acre on the opposite side, to build his mill on, meaning to abut his dam on his island; could the court have done it? where is the authority? The law expressly says, that the party applying to build a mill, must own the lands on which he means to build it. Wood v. Boughan, 1 Call, 329; Wilkinson v. Mayo, 3 Hef. & Munf. 565. A mill is a great public benefit,—a mill seat a valuable property; and to him who owns this, the law has given power to have an acre on the opposite shore condemned, to enable him by means of his mill to subserve the public interest. The very words of the law are "any person desiring to build a water grist mill, or other machine, or engine useful to the public;" and, indeed, nothing but the public interest could justify the strong handed measure of taking from a citizen his own property, whether he will or no. But if one own the land where the mill is to be built, he owns the mill seat; and it is his privilege to 336 *condemn the acre opposite, not the privilege of the opposite owner, to condemn his mill seat. The county court, therefore, in this case, neither meant to give, nor had power to give, or to sell, to Wheeler, an acre of Tabb's land, to build his mill on. If, then, under this order, Wheeler had built his mill on the condemned acre; I should have said he had no authority to do so. But it is worse than this: under the order to build on his island, he has taken water out, on the north side, by a canal cut through the land of Tabb, for some distance below (we are not told, whether a quarter or a half mile, or a mile) and has built his mill on this canal. If this is justified by the order, there is no locality at all about it. There is the dam to be sure, where the order designates; but the race may be as long, and the mill as far off, as you please. It must be observed that the inquest says, a mill built at the place set forth in the petition, will not damage any house, overflow any offices, or cause any of the other mischiefs which the law guards against, but says nothing of the effect upon the property or health of the citizens, of carrying this water through the canal to the mill where it was actually erected. We all know how often lands are injured by carrying water through them, and how often a canal affects the health of those living near it. Do not these considerations alone shew, that a scite which was never viewed, and a canal that was never contemplated, by the jury of inquest, cannot be authorized by its report? I say, then, that the proceedings of the county court, did not authorize the digging this canal, and building this mill where it stands; and that the instruction of the circuit court on this point, was correct. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

CABELL, J., concurred.

BROOKE, J. The merits of this case depend on the pleadings, and the several instructions given by the circuit court to the jury, at the trial. The two material issues joined involve *the inquiries, 337 1st, Whether The Upper Appomatox company, under the acts of 1795 and 1796 incorporating it, and the several acts referred to in the first bill of exceptions, was authorized to take the water of the river for the purpose of navigation, and also to use the surplus water incidental to the use of it for navigation, for milling purposes? and 2ndly, Whether Wheeler, under whom the plaintiffs claim, built and established his dam and mill, in pursuance of the order of Chesterfield court?

The Appomatox, it must be premised, had, before the order of Chesterfield court authorizing Wheeler to build his mill, been declared a navigable river by law. This feature of the case takes it out of the decision of this court in the case of Crenshaws v. The Slate river company. I think the instruction of the judge to the jury, which belongs to the first inquiry, was perfectly correct. It was, in substance, that the rights of this company, under the several acts referred to, were paramount to the rights of the plaintiffs under the order of Chesterfield court. The jus publicum in the navigation of the river, expressly granted by those acts to the company, for the legitimate purpose of facilitating its navigation, gave to the company, for that object, all the water of the river necessary for the purpose, and also all the surplus water incidental to the use of it for navigation, for milling purposes. Though our institutions and laws are justly tenacious of private rights, yet the ruling principle of them is, that, when private rights come in conflict with public, the former must yield to the latter; in which event the legislature alone is competent to make compensation. The public right to the navigation of the rivers of the commonwealth, cannot be weaker, than the public right to a highway on the land; and it will be found, on an examination of our legislation on that subject, that the right of way on the land, has uniformly been asserted, notwithstanding the grant of the land, in the broadest terms, and that without compensation to the proprietor, until a very late period, when by statute the writ of ad quod damnum was provided 338 in that *case. Nor should I think it material, but for The Slate river company's case, whether a river has or has not been declared navigable by law. The common law on the subject, as understood in England, mixed up, as it is, with the prerogative of the crown, is not to be so understood here. Its peculiar beauty is, that it adapts itself to the rights of parties, under every change of circumstances. So far as it recognizes the prerogative of the crown, it was abolished by the revolution; and, even where that is not the case, it is not always applicable to the same objects here, as in England; as was said by some of the judges of this court, in the case of Lightfoot v. Colgin, 5 Munf. 42; Findlay v. Smith, 6

Munf. 134. Therefore, even the grants of the crown before the revolution, are not now to be interpreted, as before, when the prerogative was in full force here. The public right to a way on the water, or the land, is a trust to be administered by the government for the community at large; never to be destroyed, but to be so administered as to facilitate the enjoyment of it by the public; as it was administered by the charter incorporating this Appomatox company. It cannot, in its nature, be the subject of a grant to an individual or corporation but for that object, since it cannot be enjoyed as private property in any other mode. I know, that there are rivers and streams in England, in which individuals have a property by grants from the crown, as to which the public right to a highway on them, has ceased to exist. Lord Hale, in his tract de jure maris, p. 8, 9, is not very precise, when he says, there be some streams and rivers that are private, not only in propriety and ownership, but in use, as little streams or rivers that are not a common passage for the king's subjects. He does not tell us, how these little streams or rivers became private property. We can only infer, that they became so by force of grants from the crown; especially, as he tells us also, that there be other rivers, as well fresh as salt, that are of common or public use for carriage of boats and lighters, and these, whether they are fresh or salt, whether they flow and reflow or not, 339 *are, prima facie, publici juris. However this may be by the common law in England, I think the doctrine which gives private property in rivers, has no application here, for the reasons before stated. In considering this point, I can perceive nothing in the grants under our legislation, that authorizes the distinction, taken by Hale, as to the streams and rivers of this commonwealth; nor do I think the broadest of our grants can be so construed. Even the patents under the act of 1705, in which the form of grant is given, and in which rivers, waters, marshes &c. are specified, ought not to be so construed as to deprive the people of this commonwealth of the jus publicum in the navigation of our rivers. In 3 Kent's commentaries, p. 333, it is said the doctrine was asserted in the state of Jersey, that the soil of its navigable rivers, and the waters also, was private and not public property, that passed in fee simple from the original proprietors under royal patents to the present occupiers and grantees; that the title was originally in the king, by right of discovery, according to the public law of Europe; and, upon that foundation, that the proprietors of land on rivers and waters, navigable and innavigable, have, immemorably, exercised the right to the soil, and to several fisheries; but this claim was decided to be subject to the jus publicum in the navigation, and also to the regulations of the legislature for the protection and passage of fish. And this too, under a grant to the duke of York from the crown, as comprehensive in its terms as it could well be, even broader than the grants under our land law of 1705, the form of which has been since changed by statute. But, in the present case, we have no such grant before us. And how it can be inferred, from the several statutes concerning mills, that the public right in the navigation of the rivers and streams, on which mills are by those statutes authorized to be erected, passed to the mill owners, I cannot perceive. One of the earliest of those statutes, the act of 1734, ch. 2, 4 Hen. stat. at large, p. 53, 4, expressly and carefully guard the right of way over mill dams. I think, there is nothing in 340 *the statutes authorizing the county courts, upon application to them, to grant leave to erect dams, and to build mills; on the contrary, the charge prescribed by them to be given to the jury, who are to estimate damages &c. requires, that they are to inquire, whether navigation will be obstructed, or the passage of fish; and provides the remedy in such cases, by directing slopes &c. And, though mills are a great public convenience, yet as that convenience, is of an intirely different character from the jus publicum in a highway, the latter, on the construction of the statutes, ought not to be made to yield to the former.

On the second head of inquiry, I concur with judge Carr. I think the defendants had a right to question the authority of the plaintiffs, or of Wheeler, under whom they claimed, to erect their dam or mill under the order of Chesterfield court; the more especially, as the defendants had a right to dispose of the surplus water for milling purposes, which would be materially affected in value, by the mill of the plaintiffs. I think the judgment must be affirmed.

TUCKER, P. I am of opinion, that the instruction given by the circuit court upon the trial of this cause, as set forth in the second bill of exceptions, was erroneous. That instruction was vital to the plaintiffs' action, though it determined but a single insulated question, not affected by the various interesting matters; which have been evolved in the discussion here, and very probably, were fairly before the circuit court.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs in error, to recover damages for a diversion of the water of the Appomattox from their mill, by the defendants. To support the allegation in their declaration, they produced the record of proceedings in the county court, giving leave to build the mill in question, and to erect their dam for its use. It was proved, that the mill was forthwith erected, and has been quietly occupied for twenty years, by the plaintiffs and those under whom they claim. But the plaintiffs, or those un-341 der *whom they claim, having built the mill house and dug a mill race to it, on the lands of Tabb, on the main land opposite to Wheeler's island, instead of on Wheeler's island, as authorized by the order of the county court, the circuit court, on the motion of the defendants, instructed the jury, that, under the order of the county court, Wheeler had no right to build his mill on any other land than his own, and to take water from the river for such mill; that the mill in question, was, therefore, not legally established, and so the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.

Although I think it clear, that an order to build a mill on a particular scite, does not authorize the erection of the mill house at a spot so essentially variant as neither to possess the advantages, nor to avoid the mischiefs, which the county court may have had in contemplation, in authorizing the establishment; yet, upon mature reflection, I very much doubt, whether that question can be collaterally inquired into in this case; and, even if it may be, I am of opinion, that the defendants should have shewn, that the departure from the strict interpretation of the order of court, was so material a departure as to deprive the plaintiffs of the use of the privilege which had been granted them. No such evidence was adduced; on the contrary, the acquiescence of twenty years very strongly evinces, that the change of scite of the mill house, was not considered as material, or as injurious to any one, or inconvenient to the neighbourhood. The question would have been very different, had it appeared, that the dam was not erected where the county court authorized it, or that it had been abandoned, or that a new and unauthorized dam had been erected elsewhere. For the location of the dam is, indeed, required by law to be ascertained, but not the scite of the mill house. The dam is not only, as to this matter, the principal, and the mill house the accessory, but it is, moreover, as far as appears in this case, the only matter with which the defendants had any thing to do. Had their canal been so located, as to have required the removal of the house, then 342 it might have *become a question whether the plaintiffs had had a right to build a mill house there. But, in the case as it appears in this record, the location of the mill house was not a matter in which they had any concern. The question between the parties, is, merely, whether the plaintiffs had a right to have the water running to their dam? If they had, and the defendants had diverted it, without lawful authority or superior right, they are responsible.

Nor is the instruction supported by the pleadings. The plea is that the mill and dam were not erected according to the order, and the essential part of the plea, in reference to this contest, is that the dam was not so erected. If that had been proved, then indeed the court might have instructed the jury, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to their action; but the mere proof as to the mill house, did not sustain the plea, and the instruction was therefore improper.

If I am right in this opinion upon the second bill of exceptions, it is unnecessary to go into an examination of the various questions submitted by the other. For, although it is true, that this court will affirm a judgment notwithstanding an erroneous instruction, against the plaintiff, provided it appears that upon the whole matter the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, yet I do not think the facts are sufficiently stated to enable this court to pronounce definitively upon the rights of the parties. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the judgment should be reversed and the cause sent back for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

*Ex Parte Richardson.

December, 1831.

Mandamus—When Issued to Compel Chancery Court to Hear Cause.—The statute of 1825-6, ch. 15, was intended to prevent unreasonable and causeless delays in suits in chancery; and, with that view, the 14th section authorizes the court of appeals to award a mandamus to the courts of chancery, to compel them to hear causes at the first term at which they are prepared for hearing, when no special cause appears for the refusal of the court to hear them; but the statute does not authorize a mandamus to compel a hearing of a cause, which the court of chancery, in its discretion, for reasons satisfactory to it, thinks proper to continue.

William Richardson and Judith Richardson, being the maker and indorser of a note for 1700 dollars, discounted at the Farmers' bank of Virginia, for the accommodation of Thomas Richardson, he, by deed, conveyed and assigned to J. G. Williams, a life estate which he owned in a parcel of land in Hanover, two slaves, a horse, two cows, some furniture, and two debts due to him, in trust, to sell the specific property, if necessary, for the purpose of indemnifying William and Judith Richardson from loss by reason of their engagements for his accommodation. Williams, the trustee, was called upon by William and Judith Richardson the cestuis que trust, to sell the trust subject, in pursuance of the deed, and to apply the proceeds to their indemnification; and he gave notice to Thomas Richardson, of his intention to make the sale, unless he should satisfy the claim, of the cestuis que trust.

Whereupon Thomas Richardson exhibited his bill against the trustee and cestuis que trust, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, alleging, that the whole of the debt due to the Farmers' bank, on the accommodation note, had been paid and satisfied, out of his Thomas's own funds; and praying an injunction to restrain the trustee from proceeding to sell the trust subject. The injunction was awarded, at first, upon condition, that the plaintiff should give an injunction bond with surety, in the penalty of 200 dollars, to abide and perform the decree, in case the injunction should be dissolved (a bond required only as security for the costs) but this condition 344 was afterwards dispensed *with by order of the court, and the injunction awarded, without any security being required.

The defendant, William Richardson, answered, and denied that the debt due to the Farmers' bank, on the accommodation note, had been fully paid off and discharged out of Thomas's funds; and insisted, that there was a sum of money still due and chargeable on the trust subject, for which it ought to be sold.

At January term 1831, William Richardson moved the court to dissolve the injunction. The chancellor overruled the motion, and ordered an account, to ascertain whether any, and if any, what balance remained of the debt properly chargeable on the trust subject.

The bill was then regularly taken pro confesso as to Judith Richardson and the trustee Williams; and the cause, having been transferred to the circuit superiour court of law and chancery of Henrico, stood on the docket of that court, ready for hearing, at October term 1831.

The cause was called in its turn, on the 10th November. The plaintiff demanded a hearing. But the courts, on the motion of the defendant William Richardson, made an order, that the injunction should stand dissolved, unless the plaintiff should within twenty days after he should be served with a copy of the order, enter into bond with sufficient surety, in the clerk's office, in the penalty of 1200 dollars, with condition to pay the defendant all such damages, as he might sustain by the depreciation of the value, or the elignment of, or termination of the plaintiff's title in, the trust subject, whereof the sale was enjoined, in case the injunction should be dissolved in whole or in part.

The plaintiff's counsel insisted, that notwithstanding that order, the cause should be heard and disposed of during the term; because it was regularly prepared and set for hearing, and no cause was shewn against the hearing, except the order requiring bond with surety to be given by the plaintiff, and that order constituted no objection to the hearing of the cause; for he insisted, that, as the plaintiff would be entitled to a hearing of his cause, if 345 the time for giving the *bond had expired, and the injunction stood absolutely dissolved, so he was entitled to a hearing presently, when the injunction was only conditionally dissolved. The defendant's counsel objected to a hearing of the cause, until the bond with surety should be given, as required by the order; because, if it was heard before that order should be complied with, the benefit of it would be lost to the defendant, whatever might be the decree of the court: if the court, on the hearing, should dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill, the plaintiff might appeal, on giving security for costs only: if the court should perpetuate the injunction, and the defendants should appeal, they would be intirely without security pending the appeal; and the termination of the plaintiff's title in the land mortgaged, by his death, and the removal of the personal part of the trust subject, pending the appeal, would deprive the cestuis que trust of any benefit from a decree of the court of appeals in their favour.

The circuit court refused to hear the cause at that term, unless the plaintiff should comply with its order requiring bond with surety.

And now, during the term of the circuit court, Robinson, for the plaintiff, moved this court for a rule upon the judge of the circuit court, to shew cause, why a mandamus should not be awarded, to compel him to proceed to hear and determine the cause, upon the proofs therein, as they now existed.

He founded the motion on the statute, "to alter and reform the mode of proceeding in the courts of chancery," passed at the session of 1825-6, ch. 15, § 14, Sess. Acts, p. 18.*

*This statute provides. "That all causes, which shall be prepared for a hearing agreeably to the provisions of this act, shall be docketed, called and disposed of, at the term to which they shall be so

The rule was made.

346 *The judge of the circuit court returned and shewed for cause why the mandamus should not be awarded, that the hearing and determining the cause at the then term of the court, would frustrate the order therein made on the 10th November, requiring the plaintiff to give bond with surety &c. and that there was no other reason for his refusal to hear the cause.

Robinson argued, that the refusal of the court to hear the cause, under the circumstances of the case, amounted, in effect, to this: that the plaintiff should not be permitted, before a sale was made of his property, to shew that such sale ought not to be made; but after the sale, he might shew, that it ought not to have been made: that he should not be permitted, at the present term of the circuit court, to shew that he was entitled to retain his property; but at the next term, after it had been taken from him and sold, he might shew, that he was entitled to the proceeds, and upon shewing this, have a decree against the defendant for the proceeds of sale, and recover them of him, if he should be solvent. Neither, he said, could he perceive the force of the reasons against a present hearing, assigned by the defendant's counsel in the circuit court. If it were true, that the consequences he complained of would ensue, the inconvenience was imputable to the defendant's own fault in not earlier asking, or to the fault of the court in not sooner requiring, the security required by the order of the 10th November: the plaintiff ought not to suffer for their neglect, nor ought the hearing of this cause to be longer delayed on account of it. It seemed to him impossible, that the plaintiff could, with justice, be placed in a worse situation now, than he would have been in if the defendant had asked, and the court had required, the security lately ordered, when the injunction was first awarded: if the security had then been required, and not given, the 347 plaintiff would, indeed, *have lost the benefit of the injunction, but his cause would, nevertheless, have been proceeded in, and would have been prepared for hearing at the present term: and if in such a state of the case, he would have been entitled to a hearing now, he could see no reason why he should not be entitled to it, in the actual circumstances of the case.

CARR, J., delivered the unanimous resolution of the court, to discharge the rule for the mandamus. He said—We think we should restrict this provision of the statute, as nearly as possible to the class of cases for which it seems to have been made. A contrary course would bring before us every cause, which the chancellor might, upon reasons deemed sufficient by him, continue. This, surely, could never have been intended, nor could it be endured. We think, prepared; and if the court shall refuse to try any such cause, or continue it, without good cause shewn, the party asking for a trial, may have his application spread upon the record, with a true statement of the facts relative thereto. Upon such statement, it shall be lawful for the court of appeals, upon the application of the party injured, to award a mandamus, and compel a trial of the cause, upon the proofs as they existed at the time when it was erroneously continued, or the trial was improperly refused.—Note in Original Edition.

that by taking this 14th section in connexion with those which precede it, in the statute, we may find ground for this narrow construction. The purpose of the statute was to quicken the slow and cumbrous march of equity; to bring cases more speedily, and with less expense, to hearing: to these ends, all its provisions are directed. It takes away the necessity of serving a decree nisi; and enables the plaintiff to have the cause set for hearing, unless the defendant, within four months after service of the subpoena, shall appear and plead, answer or demur. After several other provisions, comes this 14th section, which gives the mandamus. We think we may fairly say, that the provision was meant to provide against any attempt of the judge to thwart the object of the statute, by refusing to try the causes prepared for hearing, at the first term: and not, in all causes depending, to give an immediate application for a mandamus, whenever the court should, in its discretion, continue a cause. The provision is sufficiently anomalous in this restricted form; but taken in the larger sense, it would be monstrous. We think it best to place our decision on this general ground alone.

Rule discharged.

348 *Burwell's Ex'ors v. Anderson, Adm'r &c.

December, 1831.

Wills—Construction—Estate Given for Life with Power of Disposal—Effect*—Case at Bar.—Testator, after directing the sale of certain property to raise a fund to pay debts, and after giving all the residue of his estate to his wife for life, directs, that at her death, all his estate, real and personal, shall be turned into money, to be distributed as follows—first, he desires, that his wife, by will or otherwise, may have the absolute disposal of £500.—then, he bequeaths to his nephew W. P. £200.—and, after deducting these two sums, he bequeaths 2-3rds of the balance, to his niece A. S. and the other 1-3rd to his sister A. C.: and he directs, that if the fund provided for debts prove inadequate, the sum to make up the deficiency shall be deducted in equal proportions from the sums bequeathed to his wife, his nephew, his niece and his sister: Held, the wife took by the will, the absolute property in the £500, bequeathed to her, and not a mere power to dispose of that sum.

Legacies—Payment—Presumption from Mere Lapse of Time.—Payment of a legacy by an ex'or, cannot be presumed from mere lapse of time, during which there is no representative of the legatee entitled to demand and receive it; especially, where, though there have been dealings between the ex'or and the distributee of the legatee, yet the ex'or, in settling his accounts, has not claimed credit for payment of the legacy.

Executors—Settling Account—Bill to Surcharge and Falsify—Lapse of Time.—An ex'or qualifies in hustings court of W. in 1791: he settles his account of administration, before commissioners of hustings court ex parte, in 1810, the distributee of a deceased legatee, whose legacy has never been paid.

living in the town of W. at the time of settling the account: the distributee of the legatee, dies in 1816; then the ex'or dies; no one takes administration of the legatee's estate till 1823; then, the ex'or of her distributee, takes the administration; and then, the adm'r of the legatee, and ex'or of her distributee, files a bill against the ex'ors of the ex'or, to surcharge and falsify his account, settled in 1810: HELD, the lapse of time is no objection to such a bill.

Same—Balance in Hand—Interest—Ex Parte Settlement by Commissioner.—Though there may be circumstances, which ought to exempt an ex'or from being charged with interest on balances in his hands, yet, in general, an ex'or is chargeable with interest on such balances: and where, in an ex parte settlement by commissioners, of an ex'or's accounts, the commissioners improperly omit to state an interest account, and charge the ex'or with interest, that is cause for surcharging and falsifying the account.

Same—Mode of Stating and Charging Interest—Case Explained.—The rule of Granberry v. Granberry, 1 Wash. 249, as to mode of stating and charging interest in ex'ors' accounts, examined, explained and settled.

Upon an appeal from a decree of the superiour court of chancery of Williamsburg, in a suit between Robert Anderson, administrator of Elizabeth Pasteur and executor of Mary Stith deceased, and the executors of Nathaniel Burwell deceased, who was the executor of William Pasteur 349 *deceased, a great many questions of fact, and several points of law arose, and were discussed. The points of law, and the state of facts on which they arose, were as follows:

I. Dr. William Pasteur of Williamsburg, who died in March 1791, by his will,—after empowering his executors to sell his lands in Goochland, and all the personal property at and upon the same, excepting slaves, and directing them to apply the proceeds of sale in the first place to the payment of his debts, and after some specific bequest of particular slaves,—devised and bequeathed as follows: "I desire that my wife Elizabeth Pasteur may have and possess, during her life, all the rest and residue of my estate, whether real or personal. And, after her death, my will and desire is, that all my estate, both real and personal, shall be turned into money, by the most advantageous sale which my executors can make of it, and the amount thereof distributed in manner following, viz: I desire my wife, by her will or otherwise as she pleases, may have the absolute disposal of £500. thereof. I give my nephew William Pasteur, to be paid him when he attains to the age of twenty-one years the sum of £200. sterling other part thereof. And it is my will and desire, after deducting the two last mentioned sums, that two thirds of the residue be paid to my niece Anne Smith for her own use, and the remaining third to my friend Nathaniel Burwell, for the use and benefit of my sister Ann Craig, to be always at her disposal, in such manner that her husband Thomas Craig and his creditors may have no power over it. I give to my wife the absolute property in my chariot. It is my will and desire, that, if the estate hereby before directed to be sold for the payment of my debts, should not prove sufficient for that purpose, whatever sum my other estate shall be called upon to make up, shall be deducted in equal proportions according to the sums devised in money, to my wife, to my nephew, to my niece and to my sister as aforesaid."

350 The testator's *widow, Mrs. Pasteur, died in the year 1792, intestate, and without having made any disposition, by any act in her lifetime of the £500. mentioned in her husband's will; and her sister, Mary Stith, was her sole distributee.

And the question was, Whether the bequest as to the £500. contained in the will, was a legacy and gift of that sum to Mrs. Pasteur, or only gave her a power of appointment of so much, and that power having been no wise executed by her, this money fell into the residuum of the estate, for the benefit of the other legatees?

II. Dr. Pasteur, as has been mentioned, died in March 1791, and Mrs. Pasteur in 1792. Nathaniel Burwell, one of the executors named in Dr. P.'s will, proved it, and qualified as executor, in the hustings court of Williamsburg, at July term 1791. Shortly after he took upon him the administration of the estate, moneys to a large amount came into his hands, and remained in his hands for several years; the greater part of the debts of his testator being british debts, as to which there was, at first, a doubt whether or no they were recoverable, and then they were to be ascertained and liquidated. In October 1810, the hustings court of Williamsburg appointed commissioners, to audit, state and settle, his accounts of administration of his testator's estate; and, in stating the accounts, the commissioners did not charge the executor with interest on the balances annually appearing to have been in his hands, and to have remained for several years applied to the debts of his testator, which debts were, however, paid in the sequel, with the interest that had accumulated upon them. The accounts so settled, shewed a balance due the executor. The commissioners reported their settlement of the accounts to the hustings court, and the court, at November 1810, ordered it to be recorded. At the time the accounts were thus audited, reported and recorded, no person had ever taken administration of Mrs. Pasteur's estate. But her sister and sole distributee, Mary Stith, was 351 living, and *living at Williamsburg.

Mary Stith died in 1816, having made a will, in which Anderson was appointed her executor, who qualified as such in the same year. Anderson, as the executor of Mary Stith, exhibited his original bill in this cause, against the executors of Burwell, who was the executor of Dr. Pasteur, in the year 1818; and the case stated in that bill, shewed, that he was, in that character, entitled to demand a resettlement of Burwell's accounts of administration of Dr. Pasteur's estate, if the accounts stated and reported by the commissioners of the hustings court, were unjust; and he alleged matters to falsify and surcharge them, and, in particular, objected to the omission of all charge against the executor, for interest. In 1822, Anderson took administration of Mrs. Pasteur's estate, which till then had remained wholly unrepresented; and then, in this character, he exhibited another bill against the executors of Burwell, who was the executor of Dr. Pasteur, claiming among other things, the £500. bequeathed to his intestate Mrs. Pasteur, by Dr. Pasteur's will, which he alleged had never been paid, and which, certainly, was not charged in Burwell's accounts of administration, settled and reported by the commissioners of the hustings court, as having been paid; and again surcharging and falsifying the account so settled, and objecting to the omission of all charge against the executor, for interest. It appeared, that there had been several dealings, from time to time, between Burwell, the executor, and Mary Stith, during her life: she had contracted a debt to him, and given her bond to him for it, which remained unpaid at her death. And upon this part of the case, several questions were raised.

*Same—Same—Correction.—The principal case is cited in foot-note to Corbin v. Mills, 19 Gratt. 438. See also, citing the principal case, Coltrane v. Worrell, 20 Gratt. 447. See generally, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

* 1. Whether it might be presumed, that Burwell had made payment to Mrs. Pasteur in her lifetime, or after her death to Mary Stith, her distributee, during her life, or otherwise made satisfaction to either of them, of the legacy of £500. bequeathed by the will of his testator Dr. Pasteur, to his wife Mrs. Pasteur?

352 *2. Whether, as Mary Stith had never, during her life, set up any claim on this account against Burwell the executor, and had never complained of the accounts settled and reported to the hustings court in 1810, Anderson, as the representative of Mary Stith and of Mrs. Pasteur, ought to have been entertained to open, surcharge and falsify those accounts, at the time he exhibited his bills, in either character, for that purpose?

3. Whether an executor's account, settled and reported by commissioners of the court of probat, returned to the court, approved and recorded, can, in any case where no fraud appears, be afterwards surcharged by bill in chancery, on the ground that the commissioners have omitted to charge the executor with interest?

And 4. Whether such an objection could properly be made to the executor's accounts in this particular case? in other words, Whether an interest account ought to have been stated against this executor, under all the circumstances of the case?

III. The chancellor having referred Burwell's accounts to a commissioner, to be reformed and restated, the commissioner raised an interest account against the executor, and he brought the interest accrued on the balances of former years, found due from the executor to the estate, into the account of the succeeding years, whenever the amount of disbursements exceeded that of the receipts during such succeeding years, and applied the excess of disbursements above the receipts of any year to the extinguishment of the interest charged on the former balances, so as to extinguish such interest before applying any part of the disbursements to extinguish the principal of such former balances, leaving those balances still bearing interest.

The question was, Whether this was a just and correct mode of stating the interest account, in settling an executor's accounts of administration?

353 *And this was a question of very general interest and importance. For, though all the courts of chancery, ever since the decision of Granberry's ex'or v. Granberry, 1 Wash. 246, have professed to be governed by the principles there laid down, as to the manner of charging interest in the adjustment of such accounts; yet, in the application of those principles in practice, various methods of stating the interest account, have been adopted by the several courts, some more and others less onerous to the executor.

This last point, particularly, was very earnestly discussed in this cause, together with the other questions above stated, and some others peculiar to the case and of no general interest, by Scott and Johnson for the appellants, and Stanard for the appellee.

TUCKER, P. The questions presented for decision in this case are numerous and important. The appellants rely upon the presumptions arising from length of time, as having an important influence, not only on the general question of the appellee's right to rip up this ancient transaction, but on several particular items of the appellee's demand. They call in question also the rights of Mrs. Pasteur to the legacy of £500. They loudly complain of the manner in which the accounts have been adjusted by the commissioner in the court below. And they urge besides, many minor objections.

The death of Dr. Pasteur having occurred in 1791, and of his wife in the year following, and the accounts of his executor having been settled by commissioners of the hustings court of Williamsburg, in 1810, it is conceived by the appellants, that they should be protected by the lapse of time from a further investigation of the subject. No one feels more strongly than I, the salutary influence upon the peace and repose of society, of the principle which forbids us to encourage stale claims, or to unravel long settled accounts. Nor is there any among all the subjects of con-

354 troversy arising *in courts of justice, to which this principle should be more liberally applied, than to that of executors' accounts. No man's estate would be safe, if no lapse of time could be permitted to close the door forever against inquiry. No man could die in peace, who had ever been an executor, if he knew that when he should be gone, and the memory of transactions lost, his representatives would be called to a new and rigorous scrutiny of matters buried in oblivion. No man would be executor under such circumstances; and thus, one of the charities of life, the preservation and administration of dead men's estates, would be committed altogether to careless officers of the law, instead of being discharged with fidelity and zeal, by some friend of the deceased. Courts, therefore, have wisely discountenanced these antiquated claims, and even where the length of time does not operate to shut them out altogether, throws the burden of proof upon those who are thus disturbing the ashes of the dead. Nor is the presumption of which I speak, confined in its operation, I apprehend, to the exclusion of any inquiry as to the truth and fairness of the items charged in a settled account. The frame and structure and principles of that account, ought also to be considered as exempted from criticism, after a great lapse of time, and this for the preservation of the repose of society. Doubtless, there are many accounts settled in the last century, upon principles now reprobated by the courts: but who would disturb what has been so long at rest, for the purpose of subjecting it to modern improvements in the adjustment of executors' accounts? This remark very peculiarly applies to objections to an ancient account, on the ground that the executor has not been charged with interest. For, as that charge depends (as we are told in Granberry v. Granberry) upon the circumstances of each case, it cannot fairly be a subject of examination, when those circumstances may be presumed to be buried in oblivion. I should, therefore, unhesitatingly, repel an attempt to unravel and new model a very old account, because 355 that interest had not *been charged to the executor. But, in all these cases, the lapse of time must be considerable, to justify the court in closing the door upon all inquiry. In the present case, the account was settled in 1910. There was then no administration of Mrs. Pasteur, although the distributee entitled to her estate, was alive. That distributee died in 1816; too short a time to give rise to the presumption. The bill was filed by her administrator in 1818, there being no representative of Mrs. Pasteur until 1822, when the bill demanding a full settlement of these accounts was filed by the appellee in that character. I do not think he is barred by the length of time, from an examination of the accounts, and from objecting to their frame and structure, or to the omission to charge the executor with interest.

Neither can the presumption of payment of the legacy in this case arise. The length of time is sufficient, indeed, if it stood alone. But this presumption, like every other, may be repelled; and it is successfully repelled as to Mrs. Pasteur herself, by the fact that it was not payable till after her death; and as to all others, by the facts, that there was no one to receive, that the executor kept up the funds for the payment of debts, and that he has not pretended in his accounts to allege the payment.

We come next to inquire into the subject of the legacy of £500. It was contended, that the testator did not design a gift of £500, but only gave his wife a power of appointment, which, not having been exercised, the legacy falls into the residuum for the benefit of the residuaries. The will, in other words, was said to give power only, not property.

From the earliest time, it has been among the received doctrines of the common law, that an absolute and unqualified power of disposing, conferred by will, and not controlled or explained by any other provision, should be construed as a gift of the absolute property. In this the law but corresponds with the dictates of common reason. Every man of ordinary capacity would understand a power to dispose *of a thing as he pleased, as a gift of the thing itself; and hence, every one who uses the phrase without qualification, is understood by the law as intending a gift. The power of absolute disposition is, indeed, the eminent quality of absolute property. He who has the absolute property, has, inseparably, the absolute power over it; and he to whom is given the absolute power over an estate, acquires thereby the absolute property; unless there is something in the gift which negatives and overthrows this otherwise irresistible implication. Thus, a devise to A. to dispose at his will and pleasure, gives a fee; and devises to dispose of for payment of debts, or to give, sell or do therewith at pleasure, are all held to give an absolute estate, even in lands. 4 Com. Dig. 161. So, a devise to be at the discretion of a person, without any express disposition to him, otherwise than to declare that the lands are to be at his discretion, gives a fee. So, that a person (tenant in tail under another devise) shall have power to dispose at his will and pleasure: so, too, that the executor shall sell or levy a fine, or make a feoffment, or grant a rent in fee. 2 Preston on estates, 74, 5. So, though a devise to a wife for life, and after her decease, she to give the same to whom she will, passes but an estate for life with a power; yet, if an express estate for life had not been devised to the wife, an estate in fee would have passed by the other words. 8 Vin. Abr. Devise, 4 W. a., pl. 4, p. 234. Where, indeed, such an inconsistent life estate is given, the fee does not pass; for this whole matter rests upon intention. The estate being the testator's to give, his will is the law of the subject, unless that will be against the law of the land. Where, therefore, there is an absolute power of disposition, without any other bequest to the party, except what those words themselves imply, they operate to convey property, and not power only. And where an interest is given, generally, and without limitation, that gift is not converted into a mere power, by annexing thereto a general power of disposition. As, a devise to A. with power to dispose at pleasure, is considered 357 as *conveying property, not as conferring power; for the words of power will not be permitted to take away what without them is expressly given. 2 Preston on est. 81, 2, 13 Ves. 453. But where there is an express and inconsistent estate for life given, the construction of the instrument is altogether different. For the express estate for life, negatives the intention to give the absolute property, and converts these words into words of mere power, which, standing alone, would have been construed to convey an interest. This appears to me to be very clearly established, by the cases that were cited at the bar; which further lay it down, that where an interest and not a mere power is conferred, the absolute property is vested without any act on the part of the legatee; but where a power only is given, that power must be executed or it will fail. What will amount to an execution of it, has been a matter of discussion; but, upon the principle that a defective execution, however imperfect, will be aided in equity, the recent cases have considered even the assertion of the right of property by suit, as a sufficient execution. Bull v. Vardy, 1 Ves. jr. 270; Shermer v. Shermer's ex'ors, 1 Wash. 266; Goodtitle v. Otway, 2 Wils. 67; Barford v. Street, 16 Ves. 135; Irwin v. Farrer, 19 Ves. 86. Looking at this case upon those principles, I cannot doubt, that this will conveyed, not a mere power, but an interest also. A life interest had, indeed, been given to some estate in specie; but that interest is altogether severed from the subsequent appropriation of the proceeds of sale, by the power to the executor to sell and distribute. This was very forcibly demonstrated by the counsel for the appellee himself. So that as to the £500. it is a devise "to be at the absolute disposal of the wife by will or otherwise as she pleased," without any other disposition to her by name, than what is implied by those words: there is no life estate in the £500. to control their operation: and, therefore, they have the established effect of passing an absolute right. And, if I could have 358 doubted this construction, after reading this clause, and comparing *it with the authorities, I could not hesitate as to the testator's intention, when explained by other clauses. Thus he provides, that after deducting this and one other sum, Anne Smith and Anne Craig are to have the residue. The absolute deduction of this sum is thus clearly in the mind of the testator. They are only to have what remains after taking this sum out. And in the next clause, he further manifests his understanding of his own will, by providing for the deduction (in case debts require it) in equal proportions, "according to the sums devised in money to his wife, nephew, niece and sister." Here he considers the money as devised; and moreover draws no distinction, in terms between this bequest and the others. He considered all as upon the same footing; all as equally legacies. That the others are so, cannot be denied. Therefore, this too must be considered so.

I shall proceed next to consider the question as to the propriety of raising an interest account against the executor, and the yet more important question of the manner of stating that account.

That interest is not to be charged under all circumstances is admitted. It is so decided in the case of Granberry v. Granberry, which has furnished the law of the subject, for the court, and for the country, for nearly half a century. But the general rule is unquestionable, that an executor shall be charged with interest upon the balances in his hands, from the expiration of the year. This case furnishes no circumstances, on which to found an exemption of the executor from the operation of the rule. On the contrary, it is a strong case for its application. Very large sums came to his hands recently after he assumed his office of executor. The principal debts of the estate were British debts. If the question of the propriety of paying them, was doubtful, the money should have been invested till that doubt was settled. If it was not doubtful, if the obligation to pay was clear, the debts should have been paid in order to prevent the accumulation of interest, which has consumed 359 *the estate. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that an interest account should be raised.

But how raised? I answer upon the principle of Granberry v. Granberry, so often recognized by the court. It is, and (as I have said) has been for thirty-seven years, the established rule for the courts and for the country. Executors, and the inferior tribunals who have settled their accounts, have governed themselves by it, until a new rule was adopted by the court of chancery of Richmond about the year 1813. I am not disposed to disturb it. Some rule must be established for the government and direction of these fiduciaries. It is a matter which daily comes home to the business of every man in society. Who is there that is not, in some mode or other, concerned with the settlement of executorial transactions? It is important, therefore, to have some fixed and settled rule for this every day business; and it is most important, that that rule should not be lightly changed. That which was laid down by our predecessors, is founded, I think, in practical good sense, and a knowledge of affairs; and its wisdom has been sanctioned by their successors, and the general acquiescence of the community.

The account in this case is supposed to be stated upon principles at variance with those laid down in Granberry v. Granberry. It is necessary, therefore, to examine that case, and to extract from it its essential principles, which will probably be found applicable to every supposable case.

The question as to the mode of settling executor's accounts, arose out of the establishment of a rule for the settlement of the accounts of debtor and creditor, different from (what I will call) the ordinary mercantile rule. The effect of the mercantile rule was, to give interest upon the payments as well as upon the debt. The operation of this system is, in many cases, so obviously injurious to the creditor, that it was justly rejected, and a new rule was established by chancellor Wythe, in the case of Ross v. Pleasants &c. which may be called the court rule. It is that,

360 *which now universally prevails in calculating the balance due upon a bond, where partial payments have been made, and it is that to which the court had reference in Granberry v. Granberry. In that case, upon exceptions to a commissioner's report, it was decided, "that in the settlement of executor's accounts, the accounts ought to be closed at the end of each year; and interest allowed upon the different balances, up to the time when the transaction closed. Such interest ought not to be carried to the account of the succeeding years, in order to deduct the same from the payments made in succeeding years. This, though done in the common cases of debtors, is too strict as to trustees." From this decision, I deduce these rules or principles:

1. The various items of receipts on the one hand, and disbursements on the other, in each current year, are not to be treated as distinct items of account, but are to be added together and considered as constituting a single item.

2. Interest upon these balances, is not to be carried to the succeeding year, so as to be set-off against the disbursements in such succeeding year; for

3. The important principle of the rule, is, that the payments or disbursements shall always be first applied to discharge the principal, so long as any principal remains unpaid, and shall never go to discharge interest until the principal has been altogether paid off. Hence results the direction,

4. That, instead of calculating interest upon the balances of the year, and carrying it to the succeeding year (which is expressly forbidden) interest upon the respective balances are to be calculated up to the close of the transaction, and then, and not till then, brought into the general account with the principal.

A case however may occur, and frequently does occur, where a partial, or perhaps only an apparent, variance from the rule of Granberry v. Granberry, may seem essential. It will be found, however, not to be a departure in principle, but in form merely. And, as it is of much importance, that the rule, with its real or apparent exceptions, should be properly understood, I shall exemplify the supposed case by a statement.

Suppose that, on the 1st January 1801, the balance against an executor, is £100. principal, and £100. interest. In 1802, he pays £100. which is set off against the principal sum of £100. leaving no balance of principal. In 1803, he pays another sum of £100. and in that year, there are no receipts. The question here is, shall the £100. thus paid carry interest, because there are no receipts of the year against which to set it off, or shall it be applied to the discharge of the £100. which remains due for interest? Unquestionably the latter; for, as there is no principal to the reduction of which it can be applied, the rule in Granberry v. Granberry is not invaded, by applying it in payment of the interest; and it would be grossly unjust, that the executor's £100. should be an interest bearing sum for a long course of years, while the testator's £100. would be a dead capital. The effect would be, that in sixteen years the testator's £100. would be paid off by interest on the executor's £100. which would then remain an unimpaired demand against the estate.

But suppose another transaction: that on the 1st January 1801, the balance against the executor is £1000. principal, and £500. interest. In 1802, he pays £100. which is set off against the principal, leaving due at the end of the year, £900. of principal, and the £500. of interest. In 1803, he pays £500. and receives nothing. Shall this £500. be applied to the payment of the £500. interest, or to reduce the £900. principal? Unquestionably, the latter. The spirit and essence of the rule is, that while there is any principal to reduce, the disbursements shall go to reduce it. And in this case, though there are no receipts in that year, against which to set off the disbursements, there is a large arrear of the principal of former years, to which it should be applied. Shall it be said, that, by the case of Granberry v. Granberry, the balances of one year shall not be carried to the transactions of the next? This indeed is true; *and the account in Granberry v. Granberry, as we shall see, was so settled, accordingly. But if we vary the form of the account by carrying forward balances at all, we must pursue the overruling and all pervading principle, that while there is any principal remaining, the disbursements shall be applied to reduce that principal and not to reduce the interest. To carry on the balances of interest and thus to apply the disbursements to interest, where there is a large unpaid balance of principal of former years, is to violate the rule, both in its letter and in its spirit. For it is not only forbidden in terms, to carry the interest into the account of succeeding years, but it was also the design of the framers of the rule, that while a principal sum remains to be discharged, the disbursements shall not go to liquidate the interest.

After this exposition, it is hardly necessary to add, that the account, in this case, is in my conception utterly erroneous. It violates the rule in Granberry v. Granberry most decidedly, in carrying the interest of the account into succeeding years, whenever the receipts of those years were less than the disbursements; and applies the disbursements to the discharge of that interest, merely because there happened to be no receipts in those years, though there was an arrear of principal of many thousand dollars of former years. If the commissioner was entitled to carry the interest of a former year into the account of a succeeding year, why could he not also carry the arrear of principal into that year? Had he done so, there would have been ample sums of principal, at all times, to absorb the disbursements.

In coming to the resolution to conform, as far as possible, to the rule laid down in Granberry v. Granberry, the court has very naturally turned its attention to that case, to see how it was practically applied, and have found the accounts finally closed, in strict conformity with the language of the court, in the passages I have extracted from its opinion.*

363 *It is material to remark that after the former account, which had been disapproved, was thus remodelled, the chancellor confirmed the report, and his decision was affirmed by the court of appeals, thus giving a double sanction to its principles and the best evidence that they had been rightly understood.

However, where the mode of stating the executor's account, which was correctly pursued in the case of Granberry v. Granberry, is strictly pursued, it operates unjustly, where the balances shift; as, where the disbursements of a year are more than sufficient to discharge the whole principal, there the excess should be applied to pay interest. We therefore feel at liberty, thus far to explain the rule of Granberry v. Granberry: that where, in any year, there are disbursements but no receipts, or where the disbursements exceed the receipts of such year, such disbursement, or excess of disbursement, shall be applied to the payment of the balance of principal of the next preceding year or years, in which there may have been a balance. But if there be no principal remaining due to the estate, then, and not till then, the disbursements shall be applied to the payment of any interest which may be due. And if there be neither principal nor interest remaining due, interest shall then be allowed upon such disbursement, unless it be absorbed by subsequent receipts. And where the balance of principal of any preceding year, shall be thus extinguished, the interest on such balance shall then cease.

Many of the commissioners of the courts of chancery, do not follow strictly the formula of Granberry v. Granberry. It is possible, that the formula pursued by the commissioner in the present case, amounts to the same thing with the formula in Granberry v. Granberry, as modified above. But as, perhaps, it will be better to adhere to a particular formula, that the mode of statement may become familiar to parties, to counsel, and to the court, who are often perplexed by complicated modes of statement, far more than they would be by executing the task of commissioner 364 themselves, I have prepared a very simple one. I think this court should never undertake to recast accounts which come before it; and though I am strongly inclined to think that the plaintiffs' intestate has received, in this case, more than the avails of the estate justified, and that his bill will eventually be dismissed, yet I cannot enter into that investigation. An error, not in principle, but in mere calculation, or in statement, if committed by us, cannot be corrected. If committed by a commissioner, it is open to correction. Moreover, neither the time nor the capacity of this court, will enable it to recast the various accounts which come before it. That is the business of thorough bred accountants. It is for us only to settle the principles upon which such settlements shall be made.

It is proper to observe, that in adopting as a general rule, the rule of Granberry v. Granberry, as I have modified it, I do not mean to declare it inflexible. There may be strong cases, in which it would work gross injustice, and in which, as our predecessors admit, it must bend. Such would be the case, if a very large sum was received in the last month of one year, and paid away again in the first month of the succeeding year, or vice versa. In such a case it would be unreasonable to burden the executor, on the one hand, or the estate on the other, with a full year's interest on such sum; and in such case, therefore, I should deem it proper, that interest should only be charged until the reimbursement.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of the president, on all the points; and a decree was entered accordingly, reversing the chancellor's decree, declaring the principles on which the interest account of the executor should be stated, correcting the accounts also as to various matters of detail, and remanding the cause &c.

365 *Dowse v. Buchanan's Ex'ors.

December, 1831.

[23 Am. Dec. 280.]

(Absent TUCKER, P., and BROOKE, J.)

Deed of Bargain and Sale—Equitable Title without Warranty—After-Acquired Title—Effect*—Case at Bar.—H. having only an equitable estate in land, conveys the land by deed of bargain and sale, without any warranty to M. and F. in trust to secure a debt to B. and this deed of trust is duly recorded; afterwards, H. acquires the legal title; and then he sells the land to D. and conveys it to him with warranty: Held,

1. Same—Same—Same—Same.—That as the deed of trust executed by H. to M. and F. to secure the debt to B. was executed when H. had not the legal estate, and as that deed contained no clause of warranty, the legal estate subsequently acquired by H. did not enure to the trustees M. and F. to secure the debt to B. so that B. had only a lien on the equitable estate.
2. Same—Recordation—When Not Notice to Subsequent Purchaser.—That the recording of the deed mortgaging H.'s equitable estate to secure the debt to B. was not constructive notice of that deed to D. the subsequent purchaser from H. For.
3. Same—Same—Same.—The statute requiring deeds to be recorded, makes them void, as to subsequent purchasers without notice, if not recorded, but gives them no additional validity if recorded.

Conveyances—After-Acquired Title—Estoppel.—The principal case holds that where one having an equitable estate in land conveys such land by deed of bargain and sale without warranty to secure a debt, and afterwards acquires the legal title in the land; such legal estate subsequently acquired does not enure to the benefit of the grantees. JUDGE CARR, in his opinion, says, a deed of bargain and sale, like a release, passes no title which the bargainor had not at the time, yet if there be a warranty annexed, it will bar.

In Raines v. Walker, 77 Va. 96, it is said, if a person conveys land with general warranty, and does not own it at the time, but afterwards acquires the same land, such acquisition enures to the benefit of the grantee. Citing opinion of STAPLES, J., in Burners v. Keran, 24 Gratt. 47 (which case and note cite the principal case), and opinion of CARR, J., in Dowse v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 365; Gregory v. Peoples, 80 Va. 102; Cox v. McMullin, 14 Gratt. 90; Gregory v. Peoples, 80 Va. 357.

And in Reynolds v. Cook, 83 Va. 821, 3 S. E. Rep. 710, it is said, the general rule undoubtedly is, that where land is conveyed without warranty a grantor is not estopped from setting up an after-acquired title. On the other hand, a covenant of warranty works an estoppel and the reason usually given is that the estoppel prevents circuity of action. Dowse v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 365; Gregory v. Peoples, 80 Va. 355. But this is not the only ground upon which the estoppel arises. The rule is well established that where the deed recites or affirms, expressly or impliedly that the grantor is seized of a particular estate which the deed purports to convey, and upon the faith of which the bargain was made, he will be thereafter estopped to deny that such an estate was passed to his vendee, although the deed contains no covenant of warranty at all. This rule accords with common honesty and fair dealing. Citing for this last proposition Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How. 297; French v. Spencer, 21 How. 228. See also, Nye v. Lovitt, 92 Va. 717, 24 S. E. Rep. 345, citing the principal case.

†Deeds—Recordation—Notice.—In the principal case it is held that the recordation of a deed mortgaging an equitable estate is not constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser of the legal title. And in Harvey v. Fox, 5 Leigh 452, it is said: "It is not the recording of such deeds according to all the requisites of the law, to be deemed constructive notice, so as to be binding on subsequent creditors, in the

*See statement B. at the end of the volume, which exemplifies the rule of Granberry v. Granberry, as expounded and modified by the court in the present case.—Note in Original Edition.

4. Bona Fide Purchaser—When Complete.—To sustain a plea of purchaser without notice, the party must be complete purchaser before notice; that is, must have obtained a conveyance and paid the whole purchase money.

The late general Thomas Nelson, by deed dated the 30th December 1788, conveyed a tract of 1500 acres of land called Bullfield in Hanover, to Nathaniel Burwell and three other trustees, upon trust to sell the same for certain purposes therein mentioned. General Nelson was in possession of the whole tract at the time of this conveyance; but he had purchased a part of it (it did not appear what part) from James Harris, who never made any conveyance thereof to him: in this part, therefore, he had only an equitable title: in the residue, his title was complete. He died in January 1789. In December 1789, the trustees, in execution of the trust, sold the whole of Bullfield, at auction, to John Lyons; and they put him into possession of it, but made him no conveyance, retaining the title (it seemed) as a security for the purchase money. Lyons, after continuing in possession of the land, for some time, sold it to John Hopkins, and put him in possession; Hopkins undertaking *to pay that part of the purchase money, which yet remained due and unpaid by Lyons to Nelson's trustees.

Some years afterwards, Hopkins and Lyons brought a suit in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, against Burwell, now the only survivor of the trustees who same manner, and to the same extent, as if they had actual notice of the execution of the deeds? and if so, are such deeds to be held fraudulent as to them, although they may be clearly so as to prior creditors? I have referred to the opinions of JUDGE GREEN, in Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 258, and of JUDGES CARR and CABELL, in Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 366, and the law does not seem to be conclusively settled on the subject. I forbear, however, to say anything on it.

But see § 2465, Code of 1887. The principal case is cited in Donnell v. King, 7 Leigh 399; Pillow v. Southwest, etc., 1mp. Co., 92 Va. 152, 23 S. E. Rep. 32.

Equal Equities—Priority.—It may be laid down as a general rule, that between mere equities, equal in all other respects, the elder will prevail. If, however, the junior claimant shall have an advantage at law, or superior equity, such party shall prevail. Cox v. Romine, 9 Gratt. 29, citing Moore v. Holcombe, 3 Leigh 597, and opinion of JUDGE CABELL in Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 365.

Bona Fide Purchaser—What Constitutes.—The proposition laid down in the principal case, that to sustain the plea of purchaser without notice, a party must be a complete purchaser before the notice; that is, must have obtained a conveyance and paid the whole purchase money, is criticised in Preston v. Nash, 76 Va. 354, which case holds that a complete purchaser is one who has paid the purchase money, and who, though he has not received a conveyance of the legal title, is entitled to call for it. CHRISTIAN, J., in his opinion, saying in effect that the other judges, GREEN and CABELL did not adopt the statement made by CARR, J. in Doswell v. Buchanan, that a complete purchaser must have paid the purchase money and obtained a conveyance of the title. See also, citing the principal case, the following cases which approve the rule laid down in Preston v. Nash, supra: Preston v. Nash, 76 Va. 6, 7, 8; Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 156; foot-note to Briscoe v. Ashby, 24 Gratt. 454. But in McCormack v. James, 36 Fed. Rep. 18, the rule in the principal case seems to be approved. See foot-note to Mutual Assurance Society v. Stone, 3 Leigh 218.

Statutes—Construction—Effect Where Foreign Statute Is Adopted.—When the construction of a foreign statute has been settled by a number of decisions and the legislature enacts that statute in the same words, it must be presumed that the construction based upon statute was adopted along with it. Norfolk & Western R. Co. v. Old Dominion Bag. Co., 90 Va. 115, 37 S. E. Rep. 784, citing Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 364.

had made the sale to Lyons, under general Nelson's deed of trust of December 1788, and the heirs of Harris, to compel those defendants to convey the legal title of the whole tract to Hopkins; and the chancellor, by a decree in that cause, made the 1st September 1808, directed, that Burwell, the surviving trustee, and the heirs of Harris, should, with the assent of Lyons, execute deeds of conveyance of Bullfield to Hopkins, he defraying the expenses of such conveyances. A deed was accordingly prepared, purporting to be a deed between Burwell the surviving trustee and Mrs. Nelson the general's widow, and Lyons and wife, of the one part, and Hopkins of the other, conveying the land in pursuance of the decree. This deed was dated, and executed by Burwell and Mrs. Nelson on the 2nd December 1810, and, as to them, was duly recorded in the county court of Hanover in June 1811; but Lyons and wife, who had been made parties to the deed, in order to signify Lyons's assent to the conveyance as required by the decree, never executed it till 1814, Lyons having till then remained exposed to a claim of Nelson's trustees for a balance of the purchase money he had contracted to pay them, and which Hopkins had thus long failed to pay. In 1814, the deed was duly executed by Lyons and wife, and recorded in the same court as to them. No conveyance was ever executed, in pursuance of the decree, by the heirs of Harris.

Meantime, and while Hopkins yet held only the equitable title of Bullfield, he borrowed 5000 dollars of John Buchanan; and by indenture of bargain and sale dated the 7th May 1808, Hopkins conveyed 800 acres parcel of Bullfield, to Thomas Marshall and George Fisher, in trust to secure the debt to Buchanan. But this deed contained no covenant of warranty, or covenant of 367 any kind for assurance *of the title. It was duly recorded in the general court, at June term 1808.

After the deed of December 1810 was executed by Burwell and Mrs. Nelson to Hopkins, and recorded, but before it was executed by Lyons and wife, namely, on the 31st July 1811, Hopkins, by articles between him and James Doswell, of the last mentioned date, covenanted to sell and convey the whole of Bullfield to Doswell, for 22,000 dollars, payable in four instalments, the last of which was to be paid the 1st January 1814. And by deed dated the 16th December 1811, Hopkins made a conveyance of the land to Doswell, with general warranty.

In 1822, Buchanan exhibited a bill against Hopkins, Doswell, and Marshall and Fisher, (the trustees), in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, in which he insisted and prayed that the trust declared in Hopkins's deed of May 1808, should be executed, and the 800 acres parcel of Bullfield, thereby mortgaged to secure the debt of 5000 dollars due by Hopkins to him, subjected to the debt, and the interest thereof in arrear.

Before the defendants put in their answers, Buchanan died, and the suit was revived and prosecuted by his executors, one of whom was Fisher, the trustee named in the deed of May 1808, under which Buchanan claimed.

Doswell, in his answer,—after objecting that Hopkins, at the time of the execution of the deed of May 1808, had no legal estate in the land, and so no legal estate passed by that deed to the trustees therein named,—averred, that he himself was a fair purchaser of the whole of Bullfield from Hopkins, after Hopkins had acquired the legal title thereof from Nelson's trustees, and that he had procured a conveyance of the legal estate from Hopkins, and paid the whole of the purchase money which he contracted to pay Hopkins, before he had any notice of the deed of May 1808, under which Buchanan claimed; and so holding the legal estate, and having equal equity with Buchanan, he insisted, he was entitled to be protected against Buchanan's claim.

368 *Pending the suit, Doswell died, having by his will devised Bullfield to his son Thomas; and Hopkins also died, utterly insolvent: and the suit was revived against Doswell's executors, and his son, Thomas Doswell, to whom he had devised the land, and (pro forma) against Hopkins's heirs and distributees.

The only controverted question of fact was, Whether Doswell had completed the payment of all the purchase money he contracted to pay Hopkins for the land in question, and obtained a regular conveyance of it, before he had any actual notice of the existence of the deed of May 1808, under which Buchanan claimed? Upon the proofs in the cause touching this point, it was probable he had, yet there was room for doubt whether he had or no.

The chancellor, having directed a commissioner to ascertain the balance of the debt due to Buchanan's executors, who reported that it was 6560 dollars with interest on 5000 dollars, part thereof, from the 10th May 1826,—decreed, that, unless the defendants or some of them should pay the same within six months, the marshal of the court should sell the 800 acres of land mortgaged by the deed of May 1808, defray the charges of sale out of the proceeds, and bring the residue into court, to be disposed of by future order.

This court, upon the petition of Thomas Doswell, allowed him an appeal from the decree.

The attorney general and Johnson, for the appellant. 1. As Hopkins had not any legal estate but only an equity in the land, at the time he executed the deed of bargain and sale of May 1808, therefore no legal estate passed by that deed to the trustees therein named; the deed conveyed only the equitable estate and the possession, which the grantor then had, for the security of the debt due to Buchanan. Hopkins's subsequent acquisition of the legal title did not enure to the trustees, so as to unite the legal to the equitable estate conveyed to them by the deed; for the deed

369 *could act on the subsequently acquired legal estate of the bargainor, and have the effect of vesting the legal estate in the bargainees, only by way of estoppel or rebutter; but, as there was no covenant of warranty in the deed, there was no estoppel or rebutter. Harg. Co. Litt.

§ 446, fo. 265, a. b. note 214; Jackson v. Wright, 14 Johns. Rep. 193. And, if in a suit between Buchanan's trustees and Hopkins, Hopkins would have been estopped by his deed, from claiming the legal estate, yet, in this case, between those trustees and Doswell (a bona fide alienee of Hopkins for valuable consideration) the deed can have no effect by way of estoppel to vest in them Hopkins's after purchased legal estate. The only doubt, whether a deed of bargain and sale without warranty can operate by way of estoppel to vest in the bargainee the bargainor's after acquired estate, has arisen in contests between parties or privies. Rawlins's case, 4 Co. 53. See also Pollexf. 67, 8; Palmer v. Ekins, 2 Ld. Raym. 1550. And many acts which estop a party shall not estop a stranger. Palmer v. Stanage, 1 Lev. 43; T. Raym. 21, S. C. What is said on this subject, in Trevivan v. Lawrence, 1 Salk. 27b, is a mere dictum. Besides, there can be no estoppel, where an interest passes; Co. Litt. 45, a. 47, b. And here an interest did pass from Hopkins to the trustees Marshall and Fisher; namely, the equitable estate, and the right of possession.

2. If Doswell can be held to have had notice, actual or constructive, of the deed of May 1808, under which Buchanan claimed, before he received his conveyance, and paid the purchase money to Hopkins, we admit Buchanan's executors must prevail in equity. As to actual notice, we submit, upon the proofs in the cause, that Doswell was a complete purchaser without any actual notice of that deed. And the recording of the deed was not constructive notice to Doswell. Our statute of conveyances requiring the recording of deeds, is, in all essential particulars, like the english register acts concerning conveyances in York and Middlesex, 2 and 3 Ann. ch. 370 4, 5 Ann. ch. 18, 6 Ann. ch. *35, 7 Ann. ch. 20, 8 Geo. 2, ch. 6. See them, 4 Cruise's Dig. title 32; Deed, ch. 28, § 2-10, pp. 357-542; 2 Cay's Abr. Register, p. 31. Now, under the english statutes, it has been uniformly held, that the registry of a conveyance is not constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser; for, that, although the statute avoids deeds not registered as against purchasers, it gives no greater efficacy to deeds that are registered, than they had before. Bedford v. Backhouse, 2 Eq. ca. abr. 615, pl. 12; Le Neve v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 646; Morecock v. Dickens, Amb. 678; Williams v. Sorrell, 4 Ves. 389; Bushell v. Bushell, 1 Scho. & Lef. 90.

Leigh for the appellees. As to the last point, it is material to consider, that though Hopkins had only an equity in the land and the possession, at the time of his conveyance of May 1808, to secure the debt to Buchanan, yet he acquired the legal title from Nelson's trustees by their deed of December 1810, duly recorded in June 1811, before the date of his conveyance to Doswell, and even before that of the articles by which he covenanted to sell the land to him. He could sell Doswell no better right than he himself had; his assignee must stand in his shoes; it is impossible to withhold the legal estate from Buchanan's trustees, in favour of Doswell, upon any principle, which would not equally withhold it from them in favour of Hopkins himself. Now, as between Buchanan's trustees and Hopkins, the legal estate acquired by the latter enured to them: he could never claim the legal estate against his own deed to them, though that deed contained no warranty. Whether the deed might have operated strictly and technically as an estoppel, is immaterial; he was concluded by it. And Doswell, who purchased from him afterwards, was equally concluded. Jackson v. Bull, 1 Johns. Ca. 90, 91; Jackson v. Murray, 12 Johns. Rep. 201; Stevens v. Stevens, 13 Johns. Rep. 316; Trevivan v. Lawrence, 1 Salk. 276; 2nd Res.; Vick v. Edwards, 3 P. Wms. 382; Smith v. Low, 1 Atk. 490, 10 Vin. ab. Estoppel, 2 pl. 10, p. 471. In Jackson v. Wright, 371 *14 Johns. Rep. 193, the point was probably very little considered, since it was no wise necessary to the decision of the case. Littleton, § 446, and Coke's commentary, fo. 265, a, cited and mainly relied on for the appellant, relates to the case of a disseisin, and a release to the disseisor by the son of the disseisee, without warranty, in the disseisee's lifetime, and the right at the disseisee's death afterwards descending to the releasor; a case, in which the court would be most astute to avoid the effect of the release. The present case is a conveyance for valuable consideration, by one having the possession, with an equitable estate, and (it seems) the right to call for the legal estate. Hopkins, in May 1808, was, in a common law point of view, the tenant at sufferance of Nelson's trustees; and by the conveyance in fee to secure the debt to Buchanan, he disseised them; he assumed the legal estate, and it was his intent to convey it. What Coke says in Co. Litt. 47, b, concludes against the argument of the appellant's counsel—"If the lease be made by deed indented, then both parties are concluded; but if it be by deed poll, the lessee is not estopped to say that the lessor had nothing at the time of the lease made. A. lessee for the life of B. makes a lease for years by deed indented, and after purchases the reversion in fee; B. dieth; A. shall avoid his own lease, for he may confess and avoid the lease, which took effect in point of interest, and determined by the death of B." (Holt, C. J., explains the reason in Gilman v. Hoare, 1 Salk. 275.) "But, if A. had nothing in the land, and made a lease for years by deed indented, and after purchased the land, the lessor is as well concluded as the lessee, to say that the lessor had nothing in the land; and here it worketh only upon the conclusion, and the lessor cannot confess and avoid as in the other case." "Et videtur, that by purchase of the land, that is turned into a lease in interest, which before was purely an estoppel. Vide tamen P. 3; Car. C. B.; Crook n. 2; Isham and Morris; Hale's MSS. See Cro. Carr. 109." Harg. note 11, 47, b. The whole doctrine is, merely and in the last degree, technical.

372 *2. Doswell certainly had not completed the payment of the purchase money of the land to Hopkins before Lyons joined in the deed of Nelson's trustees to

Hopkins; that is, not till 1814. Whether his purchase was completed by the payment of the whole purchase money to Hopkins, before he got notice of Buchanan's mortgage, is a question of fact to be determined by the evidence. Was the recording of Buchanan's mortgage, supposing it to be, in its effect, a mortgage only of the equitable estate which Hopkins then held, constructive notice to Doswell and all the world? The point is of general consequence, and of the utmost importance. I admit that the general course of decisions in England, upon the register acts, which are the law of only two counties, is, that the registry there is not constructive notice; though in Hine v. Dodd, 2 Atk. 275, lord Hardwicke said, that the register act "is notice to the parties, and notice to every body; and the meaning of this statute was, to prevent parol proofs of notice or no notice." Those decisions seem to me so contrary to the spirit of the statutes, that I cannot but impute them to the inclination of the courts to keep the law of the two register counties, as nearly conformable with the general law of the land, as the statutes would allow. We have not the reasoning on which the leading case of Bedford v. Backhouse was decided. In Morecock v. Dickins, Amb. 678, lord Camden disapproved the doctrine, and yielded to it only out of regard to the authority of Bedford v. Backhouse, and the course of decision following that case, and from apprehension of the mischiefs that might result in practice, from changing the rule; good reasons to determine his judgment, but not for this court. Cruise disapproves the doctrine, as contrary to the intention of the statutes; Digest, 4 vol. title 32, Deed, ch. 28, § 16, p. 544. Sugden, too, doubts the propriety of the decisions; nay, more, he thinks lord Camden erred in applying the doctrine of Bedford v. Backhouse to Morecock v. Dickins. Law of vend. p. 509. In that case,

Wilson being indebted to Morecock, 373 and having taken a *new lease of lands, it was agreed by deed that the lease should stand as security for the debt due to Morecock; and this deed containing the agreement, was registered: afterwards, Wilson mortgaged the premises to Dickins, and delivered him the lease, Dickins having at the time no actual notice of Morecock's security: Morecock (like Buchanan, in our case) acquired only an equity; and Dickins (like Doswell) had a conveyance of legal estate. Lord Camden reluctantly gave the preference to Dickins; and Sugden says (with good reason) the case would not, perhaps, be deemed authority. And this reluctant and questionable decision is the only authority directly in point, that has been, or perhaps can be, cited for the appellant. If our legislature had taken the policy of its enactments on the subject, from the english register acts, or copied the language of them, it might be reasonable that our courts should look to the settled and known judicial exposition of the english statutes, as a guide in the construction of our own: but as we did not borrow the policy from England, so we never adopted the language of the english statutes. The first act of the colonial legislature on the subject, was passed in the 14th year of Charles II. and the second, in the year 1705, which was the 4th of Anne. 2 Hen. stat. at large, 168, 3 Id. 318. The next act, that of 1734, ch. 6, 4 Id. 397, which explained the act of 1705, and placed the registry of deeds on the principle on which it now stands, was certainly not all copied after the model of the english register acts. The same remark applies to the act of 1748, ch. 1, 5 Id. 408, and to all our subsequent legislation. Let the language of those early statutes, let the language of the revised statute of 1792 (which was the law in force when the mortgage to Buchanan, and the conveyance to Doswell, were executed) be compared with the english register acts; and let both be compared with the register acts of New York: it will be seen, that the language of all our statutes, is very different, certainly as different as that of

374 the New York statutes, from the words of the english statutes. Now, chancellor Kent, in Parkist v. Alexander, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 389, after quoting the language of the New York statute, said—

375 "If it does not mean, that a mortgage duly registered shall be preferred to a subsequent bona fide deed *without notice, it is senseless and idle, and worse than idle; it is delusive, and a snare

*The english statute 2 Ann. ch. 4, § 1, provides "that a memorial of all deeds and conveyances, which shall be made of or concerning, and whereby any honours, manors, lands, tenements or hereditaments, in the west riding of the county of York, may be in any manner affected, in law or equity, may, at the election of the party or parties concerned, be registered—and that every such deed or conveyance shall be adjudged fraudulent and void, against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for valuable consideration, unless such memorial thereof shall be registered as by this act is directed, before the registering of the memorial of the deed or conveyance under which such subsequent purchaser or mortgagee shall claim." The subsequent statutes extend the same provisions to the east and north ridings of Yorkshire, the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, and to Middlesex exclusive of the city of London. 4 Cruise's Dig. tit. 32. Deed, ch. 28.

The words of one of the New York register acts, as quoted by CHANCELLOR KENT, in 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 389, are, "No mortgage, nor any deed, conveyance or writing in the nature of a mortgage, shall defeat or prejudice the title or interest of any bona fide purchaser &c. unless the same shall have been duly registered."

The Virginia statute of conveyances of 1792, ch. 90, Rev. Code of 1794, Pleasants' ed. p. 156, provides, § 1, "That no estate of inheritance or freehold, or for a term of more than five years, in lands or tenements, shall be conveyed from one to another, unless the conveyance be declared by writing sealed and delivered; nor shall any such conveyance be good against a purchaser for valuable consideration, not having notice thereof, or any creditor, unless the same be acknowledged by the party or parties who shall have sealed and delivered it, or be proved by three witnesses, to be his, her or their act, before the general court, or court of that district, county, city or corporation, in which the land conveyed or some part thereof lieth, or in the manner herein after directed, within eight months after the time of sealing and delivering, and be lodged with the clerk of such court to be there recorded."—§ 4. All bargains, sales, and other conveyances whatsoever of any lands, tenements or hereditaments, whether they be made for passing any estate of freehold or inheritance, or for term of years, and all deeds of settlement upon marriage, wherein either lands, slaves, money or other personal thing shall be settled or covenanted to be left or paid at the death of the party or otherwise, and all deeds of trust and mortgages whatsoever, shall be void as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers, unless they shall be acknowledged or proved and recorded according to the directions of this act; but the same as between the parties and their heirs, shall nevertheless be valid and binding."—Note in Original Edition.

to the unwary. No decision of the english courts upon the english register acts, in which there is a variation in the language of the provision, could induce me to change my opinion on the construction of our statute. I had occasion, lately, in the case of Frost v. Beekman, (Id. 288,) to express the same opinion; and with me the point is absolutely at rest." And in both those cases, he held that the registry of a mortgage was constructive notice to all the world. The court of errors of New York, indeed, had already decided the same point in Johnson v. Stagg, 2 Johns. Rep. 510, 524, where Kent said, "The provision in the act that no mortgage, unless duly registered, shall defeat the title of a bona fide purchaser, shews the intent to be, that subsequent purchasers must take notice, at their peril, of all registered mortgages. 'This has been the received construction, and probably, the universal understanding on the subject.' It 'has been the received construction, and probably, the universal understanding' of the law of Virginia, likewise. It certainly was the understanding of the legislature that enacted the revised statute of conveyances of 1819, as is evinced beyond doubt by the new provision then introduced, that 'every title bond, or other written contract, in relation to land may be proved, certified or acknowledged, and recorded, in the same manner as deeds for conveyance of land; and such proof, acknowledgment or certificate, and the delivery of such bond or contract to the clerk of the court to be recorded, shall be taken and held as notice to subsequent purchasers, of the existence of such bond or contract. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 13, p. 365. When the legislature made the registry of an executory contract to convey land, notice to subsequent purchasers, it surely entertained no doubt, and supposed there could be no doubt, that an actual conveyance or mortgage of the equitable estate of land, duly recorded, was notice to subsequent purchasers. Is no man to be safe in taking the mortgage of an equitable 376 estate, while the naked legal title *is outstanding? What more can a prior purchaser or mortgagee do, to warn subsequent purchasers, than to record his deed? How can he give actual notice to every citizen of the state? How can he know who is in treaty with his vendor or mortgagor, for the purchase of the subject? On the other hand, it is the business of every purchaser to search the records. In the present case, Doswell had only to look into the order books and deed books of the courts in which a conveyance of this land might be recorded, under the name of Hopkins, and the incumbrance would have appeared. He was bound to search for incumbrances, from the time Hopkins's possession commenced; for he was bound to know that Hopkins's equitable estate was mortgageable.

Harris's heirs have never yet executed any conveyance in pursuance of the decree of the court of chancery of October 1808, for the part of Bullfield which general Nelson bought of Harris. What part it was, or how much, does not appear. As to it, Doswell can claim only an equitable title; and if it was included in Buchanan's mortgage, the prior incumbrancer must have the preference as to so much.

In answer to the last remark as to the part of the subject purchased by general Nelson of Harris, it was said, the act of limitations perfected the title as against his heirs.

CARR, J. The counsel for the appellees insisted, in the argument, that though Hopkins had no title when he conveyed to Buchanan's trustees, yet, as he afterwards obtained it, he and his alienee were estopped from contradicting the deed. With respect to this, I shall only remark, that this technicality is met and neutralized by another, namely, that the deed contains no clause of warranty, and therefore works no estoppel. A deed of bargain and sale, like a release, passes no title which the bargainor had not at the time, yet if there be a warranty annexed, it will bar. "For albeit (as Coke says, Co. Litt. 265, b.) the release cannot bar the right &c. yet 377 the warranty may rebut, and *bar him and his heirs of a future right that was not in him at the time; and the reason wherefore a warranty, which is a covenant real, should bar a future right is, for avoiding a circuity of action."

Let us next inquire, whether Doswell is a purchaser with notice of Buchanan's equitable lien, and the legal estate in his hands subject to the satisfaction of the debt due to Buchanan's executors? Is the recording of a deed of trust, which gives a lien on the equitable title, such notice to a subsequent purchaser of the legal title, as will bind him? I think not. The enrolment and registry acts of England, and our recording acts, are expressly declared to be made for the benefit of subsequent purchasers; to protect them from secret conveyances. These acts, then, ought not to be turned to the injury of those, for whose benefit they were made, unless it be in obedience to some express provision contained in them. But there is none such. They declare, that all deeds &c. shall be void as to subsequent purchasers, unless duly recorded; but they no where declare, that such recording shall charge the subsequent purchaser with notice of the deed. If not recorded, the deed is void as to him; if recorded, it is only so far valid, that it passes to the bargainee the title it purports to convey, provided the bargainor had that title; if he had it not, the deed cannot pass it, though recorded; nor will the putting it on record affect the conscience of a subsequent purchaser of the legal title, nor, of course, charge that title with the equity which the deed raised between the bargainor and bargainee. The laws had no such intention, nor will their words bear such construction. That this is settled doctrine in England, there are many cases to shew. Ld. Forbes v. Deniston, 4 Bro. P. C. 189; Cheval v. Nichols, 2 Eq. ca. abr. 63, 4, pl. 7; 1 Str. 664. S. C. Beatniff v. Smith, 1 Eq. ca. abr. 357, pl. 11; Wrightson v. Hudson, 2 Id. 609, pl. 7; Bedford v. Backhouse, Id. 615, pl. 12, cited Amb. 680; Hine v. Dodd, 2 Atk. 275; Le Neve v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 646; Sheldon v. Cox, Amb. 624; Morecock v. Dickins, Id. 680; Bushell

378 *v. Bushell, 1 Scho. & Lef. 90, in which last case, lord Redesdale reviews all the authorities with his usual ability. In Wrightson v. Hudson, sir J. Jekyll had decided, that the register act did not create constructive notice by the registry; that it avoided only prior charges not registered; and that though Wrightson might have searched the registry, he was not bound to do so. Upon this lord Redesdale remarks, "Sir J. Jekyll's opinion that the act did not create constructive notice by the registry, appears to be sound. I know of nothing that compels a man to search the registry, more than to search the records of a court of any description." And he concludes his review by saying, "The effect of all these decisions is, that the registry cannot be considered as notice, with all the consequences that would attach upon it as notice; and if it were so considered, it would lead to very mischievous consequences." If we say, that the recording of a deed is constructive notice, it is on the sole ground that it is the duty of every purchaser to search the records, and that if he did so, he must see the deed. Now, suppose a deed put upon the record, without the proof and authentication required by law? We know that this court has, in several cases, declared such deed to be, to all intents and purposes an unrecorded deed; Turner v. Stith, 1 Wash. 319; Currie v. Donald, 2 Wash. 59, 64. Yet it is upon the record, and if the purchaser searched, he would see it, just as certainly as if it had been recorded upon the fullest proof; and to be consistent, we must say, that he purchases with notice of such deed, and therefore is as much bound by it as the parties, between whom we know it is good though not recorded, because this deed, in violation of law, was put upon record. Thus, we dispense at once with a positive provision of the law, pronouncing such deed void as to the subsequent purchaser. This idea is clearly expressed by lord Redesdale, in Latouche v. Dunsany, 1 Scho. & Lef. 157. Speaking of the registry act, he says, "If it be notice, it must be notice, whether the deed be duly registered or not; 379 it may be unduly registered, *and if it be so, the act does not give it a preference; and thus this construction would avoid all the provisions in the act for complying with its requisites." Again in Underwood v. Ld. Coutown, 2 Scho. & Lef. 64, he says, "It seems to me, that nothing would be more mischievous than to hold, that putting any thing on the registry, is notice, within the meaning of the word notice as applied to courts of equity in such cases." In the next page, he says, "There is an important difference between actual notice and the operation of the register act. Actual notice might bind the conscience of the parties; the operation of the act may bind their title, but not their conscience." From these cases, it appears that, for more than a century past, it has been settled law in England, that the mere putting a deed upon the registry, is not notice. Nor has the doubt (it is a mere doubt) thrown out by lord Camden, in Morecock v. Dickins, in 1768, nor the distinction attempted by Sugden, p. 509, tended at all to shake this doctrine.

It is admitted, that where the construction of an english statute has been settled by a series of decisions, and our legislature enacts that statute in totidem verbis, the construction must be considered as adopted along with the statute. To me it seems that this principle applies strongly to the case before us. Our statute is not a literal copy, but surely it must be admitted to have been substantially taken from the english statute 2 Ann. ch. 4, commonly called the register act; which after describing the kind of conveyances to which it extends, and saying that memorials of them shall be registered in the manner directed, adds, "that every such deed or conveyance &c. shall be adjudged fraudulent and void, against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for a valuable consideration, unless such memorial thereof be registered, as by this act is directed, before the registering of the subsequent deed or conveyance." Our statute of conveyances, after directing the mode of recording &c. provided, that "all deeds of bargain and sale and other conveyances whatsoever of lands &c. and all deeds of trust and mortgages, which shall hereafter *be made and executed, shall be void as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers, unless they shall be acknowledged or proved, and recorded, according to the directions of this act." It is impossible to look at these acts, without seeing their exact similarity, as to recording and registering deeds. Our legislature (we must, in decency, suppose) knew that under the english law, the registering a deed had been settled not to create notice: if it had meant, that under our law it should, how easy to have added, that the recording of every such deed, according to the directions of this act, shall be full notice to all subsequent purchasers. It was insisted, however, that the legislature of 1819 believed, that the recording a deed did give notice to all the world; and this was said to be evinced by the 13th section of the revised statute of conveyances, which was added to our law at the late revisal. It directs title bonds and contracts in relation to land, to be recorded; and adds, that such recording shall be taken and held as notice to all subsequent purchasers, of the existence of such bond or contract. If this section proves any thing, it seems to me to prove, that the legislature did not suppose that bare recording (at least of bonds and contracts) would operate a notice; else why add, that such recording should be taken and held as notice? It must have thought these words necessary to give to recording that effect; and if necessary as to bonds and contracts, equally so, assuredly, as to deeds, for there can be nothing in the nature of the instrument, to make a difference. Why it chose to leave the law with respect to recording deeds &c. just as they found it in the former statutes, and to add, in the new section, that recording should be notice as to bonds and contracts, it is not for me to say. We must construe each section according to its actual words. From this review of the statutes, and the cases settling the construction of them, it is clear to me, that there is nothing in them, that imposes on the purchaser the duty of searching the records. Let us look at analogous cases. A private act of parliament, is not notice to a purchaser; Sudd. *law vend. 535, 2 Ves. sr. 480, 3 Bos. & Pul. 578. Decrees of courts of equity are not notice to a purchaser; Sudd. 538. Judgments are not notice, nor is the docketing of judgments of itself notice, to a purchaser; Id. 539.

But, even if it were admitted to have been the duty of Doswell to search the records, how far ought that search to be carried? Assuredly, not beyond the period at which the legal title vested in the vendor. Suppose him to take the advice of counsel; he would call for the chain of title; he would examine the decree of September 1808, directing the title to be made to Hopkins, and the deed made in virtue of this decree of the 2nd December 1810; and seeing that the title of Nelson was by this deed conveyed to Hopkins, he would look from this date down to the time of consultation, to see whether there were any incumbrances. This is all that could, with any shew of reason, be required of him: but this would never lead him to the deed of trust of May 1808, made by Hopkins to Buchanan, and purporting to convey the legal estate, when Hopkins had no such estate in him; and to impute to him a notice of this, because it was put on record, seems to me wholly inconsistent with equitable principles generally, or the particular ground of favour, on which a fair purchaser stands in that forum.

But though we should decide, that the recording the deed of trust, was no notice, it still remains to inquire, whether Doswell has shewn himself a complete purchaser for value before notice. To constitute him such, I consider that the deed must be executed, and the money all paid, before notice. Sugden, p. 530, lays it down broadly, that "notice before actual payment of all the money, although it be secured, and the conveyance actually executed, or before the execution of the conveyance, notwithstanding that the money be paid, is equivalent to notice before the contract." And these positions seem fully supported by the cases (which I have carefully examined). Tourville v. Naish, 3 P. Wms. 307; Story v. Ld. Windsor, 2 Atk. 630; Moore v. Mayhow, 2 Freem. 175; Jones v. Stanley, 3 Eq. ca. abr. 685, *pl. 9; Wigg v. Wigg, 1 Atk. 384. We know, that the plea of purchaser for value without notice, if sustained, is a perfect defence; and that against such purchaser, equity will not take the slightest step, not even to perpetuate evidence against him, or to take from him any advantage the law gives him; Jerrard v. Saunders, 2 Ves. jr. 454. But it is equally clear, that this plea is a complete defence, or no defence at all. "It must aver a conveyance, and not articles merely—it must aver the consideration, and actual payment of it; a consideration secured to be paid, is not sufficient." Mitf. plead. 215, 16. It must also deny notice of the plaintiff's title to a claim, previous to the execution of the deeds, and payment of the consideration. Hardingham v. Nicholls, 3 Atk. 304. A plea averring that the money was paid or bona fide secured to be paid, was overruled. In 2 Newland's equity, 145, and also in Beame's pleas in equity, 347, we have forms of the plea of purchaser without notice, at full length; and they set out the purchase, the sum to be given, the estate purchased &c. and positively aver, that the deed was executed, and the whole sum paid, before notice of the plaintiff's claim. If they fail to do this, the plea is overruled as insufficient; for in pleading, there is the same strictness in equity as at law. If the plea is found to be good in law, issue is taken on its truth, and the defendant must prove the facts, which he has been held to allege; which if he does, the plea is a complete bar; but if he does not, he loses all benefit of the plea. Under this view of the case, I cannot see how a defendant can, in the character of purchaser without notice, avail himself of payment of a part of the purchase money, though paid before notice, and have a decree of the court, that such payment should constitute a lien on the land: it is not at all within the issue: it does not make him a purchaser without notice: and without this, he cannot interfere with the prior lien. Suppose, instead of part, he had paid the whole of the purchase money, but got notice before he had a deed; he would, surely, have as much right to have the whole, as a 383 *part, made a lien on the land; and this being the full value of the land, would wholly disappoint the prior incumbrancer. I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that Doswell must shew, that he had paid the whole consideration before notice, in order to protect his purchase. This I do not think has been so clearly proved as to authorize a dismissal of the bill. And I am finally of opinion, that the decree should be reversed, and the cause sent back to be referred to a commissioner or a jury, to inquire, whether Doswell had paid all the purchase money, before notice of Buchanan's mortgage; the final decree to be governed by the principles laid down.

GREEN, J. If the defence made by Doswell, that he was a bona fide purchaser from Hopkins, without notice of Buchanan's lien, and that he had fully paid the purchase money before he received actual notice of that lien, had been supported by clear proof, I should have thought the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed. In that case, it is not necessary to prove that the purchaser has actually procured a perfect legal title, in order to protect himself against any relief against him in a court of equity, whose maxim is, that it will act in no way against a bona fide purchaser without notice, to expose even his want or defect of title, and, in short, will not permit any inquiry to be there prosecuted in respect to the particulars or lawfulness of his title.

I think it clear, that a recorded deed is no notice to a subsequent purchaser, which can affect his conscience in a court of equity, both upon the authorities cited, and the plain import of our statute. For it adds nothing to the strength of any deed, that it is recorded; but it only takes away the force which a deed would have had, but for the provision of the statute requiring deeds to be recorded, if they be not recorded as required.

If Doswell's defence had been fully supported by proof, it would have protected him completely against the action
 384 *of a court of equity, until the trustees for Buchanan had actually recovered the land conveyed by Hopkins to them, in an action at law; in which case, the impediment to the sale by the decree of the court of equity, would be removed. But the evidence leaves it in some degree of doubt, whether Doswell had paid the full amount of his purchase money, before he received notice of Buchanan's claim. My impression is that he had; but the proofs are not sufficient to justify a judicial decision that he had. And this fact, I think, should be inquired into by a reference to a commissioner before a final decree, and if found to be as alleged by Doswell, the bill dismissed; if not, relief given to the plaintiffs, according to the result of that inquiry.

CABELL, J. I shall not inquire, whether the deed from Hopkins to Doswell, passed the legal estate of the whole of Bullfield to him; I shall proceed upon the admission that it did so. And, then, this case presents the question, never before directly submitted to this court, Whether, as the law was before the late revisal, a person purchasing without notice, and obtaining the legal title, shall be prejudiced by a prior deed of trust or mortgage of the equitable estate, which was duly recorded previously to his purchase? It is admitted, on all hands, that actual notice of a prior deed of trust or mortgage, will bind a subsequent purchaser; and there is, certainly, no difference between actual and constructive notice, in its consequences; Sugd. law vend. 532. The question, therefore, is narrowed down to this: Is the due recording of an equitable deed of trust or mortgage, of itself, constructive notice of that deed, to a subsequent purchaser? After much reflection, I have come to the opinion that it is. Constructive notice, or (as it is sometimes called) notice by construction of law, is defined to be, no more than evidence of notice, the presumptions of which are so violent, that the court will not even allow of its being controverted; per Eyre C. B. in Plumb v. Fluitt, 2 Anstr. 438; Sugd. 533. Thus, notice to an 385 agent, is notice to the *principal.

But there is one kind of constructive notice, which has a very extensive operation: it is, "where the law imputes that notice, which, from the nature of the transaction, every person of ordinary prudence must necessarily have;" and the reason of it is forcibly expressed, "that the titles of other men ought not to be shaken, by creating a title veiled in a third person through his own folly;" per lord Erskine, in Hiern v. Mill, 13 Ves. 120, 121. This principle has been repeatedly recognized, and acted upon. I refer to Ferrars v. Cherry, 2 Vern. 384; Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves. jr. 437; Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves. 152. I think this principle applies to our statute requiring deeds of trust and mortgages to be recorded, and should guide us in the construction of it. The great object of the statute, is the benefit of creditors and subsequent purchasers, by enabling them to know whom to trust, and from whom to purchase. Every man is presumed to know the law; particularly a law made for his special benefit. "Every man of ordinary prudence," about to purchase from another, searches the record, to see whether the property has been previously conveyed or incumbered. It is gross negligence not to do so. He who fails to do it, wilfully shuts his eyes against the truth, and ought not to be permitted to avail himself of his ignorance. So far from having equal equity, with a former bona fide incumbrancer, whose deed is duly recorded, he has no equity at all. In the language of lord Erskine, "the titles of other men ought not to be shaken by creating a title vested in him, through his own folly." I shall only add, that a contrary decision would tend greatly to encourage perjury; for a man may actually have searched the register, and then deny it, without danger of its being proved upon him.

I am well aware, that this principle has not been applied to the register acts in England, and that the registry of a deed there is not held to be constructive notice. I admit also, that I do not perceive any substantial difference between the english

386 register acts and our statute requiring *deeds of trust and mortgages to be recorded; though it is manifest, their phraseology is widely different. Neither the english statute nor our's says any thing, in express terms, as to the effect of registering or recording deeds, while they do declare, in express terms, what shall be the effect of a failure or omission to register or to record. But the question necessarily arises, what is, on general principles, the effect of putting a deed on the register in England, or on the record here? It has been decided in England, as I have just said, that it does not operate as constructive notice. Does it follow, that we must give the same construction to our statute? I humbly think not. We have, it is true, adopted the common law of England, as the law of this country; and there is nothing which I should consider more authoritative evidence of what that law is, than the decisions of the english judges, upright and eminently learned as they unquestionably are. I should also pay the highest respect to their construction of english statutes, which were in force prior to the 4th year of James I. and which were adopted by the convention of 1776, along with the common law. I will go farther, and say, that, when english statutes of a subsequent date, having been expounded by the english judges, in a long course of uniform opinion and adjudication, have afterwards been adopted into our code, in the very words in which they were originally enacted, I should think it wrong in our courts, to give them a different interpretation; because it ought to be inferred, that the legislature, in adopting the very words of an english statute, intended to adopt the interpretation that had been given to them in the country from which it was copied. But that is not the case in the present instance. These statutes are of modern date;

they have not been copied by our legislature; and the correctness of the interpretation given, in England, to the english statutes, has been more than doubted by some of their profoundest judges, and ablest writers. We find that lord Camden, in Morecock v. Dickins, adhered to the former interpretation, in opposition to his own opinion, merely because *it had been so decided, and because it would be mischievous to disturb it, since it had given occasion to a thousand neglects to search the register. It is clear that, in his opinion, the registry of a deed, ought, on general principles of equity, to be constructive notice, notwithstanding the statutes had not, in terms, said so. The reasons assigned by him, were abundantly sufficient to justify, and even to require him, to disregard his own opinions, and to adhere to the interpretation given by preceding decisions. But no such reasons exist here: no former decisions on our statute, have produced neglect in purchasers: no former decisions trammel us in the exercise of our judgments. We may, without injury to any body, pursue general principles to whatever just result they may conduct us. For, the construction of our statute is now directly submitted, for the first time. My opinion upon it, has been stated. I cannot say what has been the general understanding, in Virginia, upon this subject. But I think it manifest, that the legislature at the late revisal, entertained the same opinion that I have expressed, as to the effect of recording deeds of trust and mortgages, under the former law upon that subject: for it adopted the former law as to the recording of such deeds, without saying any thing as to what should be the effect of their being recorded: but, when it introduced the new provision, declaring "that title bonds or other written contracts in relation to land may be proved, certified or acknowledged, and recorded, in the same manner as deeds for the conveyance of land;" it went on to add, that "such proof, acknowledgment or certificate, and the delivery of such bond or contract to the clerk of the proper court to be recorded, shall be taken and held as notice to all subsequent purchasers, of the existence of such bond or contract." Now, it is obvious, that this section was not intended by the legislature to embrace the case of mortgages and deeds of trust, for they had been acted on in the former parts of the act: it related to contracts, not to conveyances, such as mortgages and deeds of trust. This section shews, and in-388 deed expressly *declares, that the recording of a mere contract concerning land, shall be notice of its existence. Yet, when we advert to the sections concerning the recording of mortgages and deeds of trust, we find no provision as to what shall but the effect of their being recorded. Whence this omission? Surely, not because their being recorded ought not to be notice, equally with the recording a mere contract, but solely because the legislature entertained no doubt, that the law was always so, in relation to deeds of trust and mortgages. If it had entertained doubt about it, it would, when speaking of recording mortgages and deeds of trust, have taken care to remove that doubt by declaring in express terms, (as it did in relation to title bonds and contracts), that their being admitted to record, should be notice of their existence, to all subsequent purchasers.

I am of opinion to affirm the decree.

If, however, I had concurred with the other judges, as to the effect of recording the deed of trust, I should then have been of opinion, that Doswell ought to be protected, not only in case of his having paid the whole of the purchase money, before he received actual notice of the existence of the deed, but, in case he had made only partial payments before such notice, that he should be protected to the extent of such payment.

I have only to add, that I regret that a case involving a principle of such vast importance, should have come before a bare court, and that the division of the court should leave the community in doubt, as to what the law is on this interesting subject.

Decree reversed.

389 *Collins's Adm'x &c. v. Janey and Another.

December, 1881.

(Absent TUCKER, P.)

Deed—Assignment of Debts Now Due—Effect—Case at Bar.—T. C. by his will dated 17th May, gives one third of his whole estate to wife for his life, remainder to his two children T. and E. and the other two thirds to T. and E. presently; then, by deed dated 26th May, he assigns "all debts now due to him" to a trustee for his son T.—HELD, this deed assigns all debts due and payable to the donor at the date of the deed, but not such debts as tho' contracted had not become payable at the date of the deed.

Same—Will—Election.—And, it seems, T. may elect to claim, either under the will, or under the deed; he cannot claim the subject given by the deed, and then claim his moiety of two thirds of the estate as the legatee or devisee under the will.

Thomas Collins late of King & Queen deceased, made his last will and testament on the 17th May 1826, whereby he devised and bequeathed one third of his estate to his wife Virginia for life, remainder to his two children Elizabeth and Thomas, to be equally divided between them; and the other two thirds to the two children, to be equally divided between them, with some executory limitations in case either or both of the children should die before attainment to full age or marriage. And the same T. Collins afterwards, by deed dated the 26th of the same month,—reciting, that the deed was made for the purpose of advancing his son Thomas with certain gifts, which it should not be in his power to revoke,—transferred and assigned to Joseph Janey, "all the debts now due to the said T. Collins" [the father] "whether the same be due to him by bond, bill, note, judgment, account or otherwise," "the amount of which debts will appear by a schedule hereto annexed," upon trust to allow T. Collins, the father, to collect the debts and enjoy the interest of the money during his life, and after his death, if T. Collins, the son, should survive him, to hold such money as should have been previously collected, and to collect and hold the residue, and to apply the same to the support, maintenance and education of T. Collins, the son, during his minority, and to pay him whatever "should remain unexpended, if any should remain, so soon as he should attain to full age; and if the son should attain to full age before the father's death, then to pay the whole amount to him at the father's death; with executory limitations to the grantor's daughter Elizabeth, in case the son should die before his father without issue, or after his father, under age and without issue &c. There was no schedule of the debts annexed to the deed. T. Collins, the father, died not long after the execution of the deed. His will was proved and recorded in the county court of King & Queen, at August term 1826; and administration with the will annexed, was granted to his widow Virginia Collins.

Upon a bill exhibited in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, by Virginia, the administratrix with the will annexed, against Janey, the trustee named in the deed of the 26th May 1826, and T. Collins, the cestui que trust, two questions arose; 1. Whether T. Collins, the son, could claim the subject assigned to the trustee for his use by the deed, and at the same time claim under his father's will, one third of his other estate? and 2. Whether he was entitled under the deed, to all debts which had been contracted to his father at its date, as well those which had then become payable, as those which were to become payable at a future time, or only such debts as had not only been contracted but had become payable before and at the date of the deed? in other words, what was the import of the words in the deed, all the debts now due?

It appeared, by accounts taken by order of the court, that there were debts which had been contracted and become payable to T. Collins, the father, before and at the date of the deed of the 26th May 1826, to the amount of about 5000 dollars; that there were debts contracted to him before and at that date, but which had not then become payable, to the amount of about 200 dollars; and that his whole property, real and personal, including debts of both descriptions, was, at the date of his will and of the deed, of the value of about 13500 dollars.

391 *The chancellor was of opinion, and accordingly decreed, that T. Collins, the son, could not claim both under the deed of the 26th May 1826, and under the will of his father; and that, if he should elect to claim under the deed, he was entitled under it, to all the debts which had been contracted to his father before and at its date, as well such as became payable afterwards, as those which were then payable. From this decree, Mrs. Collins, the administratrix, appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant.

Michie, for the appellees.

BROOKE, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The question as to the correctness of this decree, depends on the construction of the words in the deed of the 26th May 1826, describing the subject thereby assigned by Collins to Janey, in trust for his son—"all the debts now due to the said T. Collins" &c. The chancellor thought, that this description in the deed, included all his debts, those then contracted but payable in future, as well as the debts then payable. The words of the sentence are perfectly intelligible. They contain no latent ambiguity, so that a resort to the will, or to any thing else extrinsic of the deed, to explain them, would be improper. If there would be a doubt, whether the words all my debts due would include debts not payable though contracted, debita in presenti solvenda in futuro, the donor has guarded against that doubt, by inserting the word now. All his debts now due, in common parlance, must be understood to mean, debts then payable, not debts payable at a future day. The word now could not have been inserted, to exclude debts that might be afterwards contracted, debts not then in existence, because they would not be subjects of transfer, and could not have been in the mind of the grantor. If he had meant to speak in technical language, he would have omitted the word now. *And even if he had omitted it, there are many examples in which both judges and legislators have interpreted and used the words debts due, in the limited sense of debts payable, not in the broader technical sense, including all debts contracted whether payable or not. Without deciding any thing more in the cause, this court reverses the decree, on this point.

Turnbull, Ex'or &c. v. Claibornes.

December, 1881.

(Absent TUCKER, P.)

Executions—Levy after Death of Plaintiff—Validity—

Case at Bar.—Robertson ex'or of Cole recovers judgment against Claiborne. and sues out execution thereon: before the execution is delivered to the sheriff, Robertson dies: the execution being then delivered to the sheriff, he levies it on property of defendant, and takes a forthcoming bond payable to Robertson ex'or of Cole: HELD, the execution was properly levied, though Robertson was dead before it was delivered, and the forthcoming bond was rightly taken to Robertson as ex'or, and was a good bond.

Forthcoming Bond—Motion on—Case at Bar.—A motion for award of execution on the forthcoming bond was made by Turnbull ex'or of Robertson who was ex'or of Cole: HELD, the forthcoming bond belonged to Cole's estate, and Turnbull was entitled to the motion, and to award of execution on the bond as the representative of Cole, not as the representative of Robertson.

Robertson executor of Cole recovered judgment against P. Claiborne administrator with the will annexed of R. Claiborne, in the circuit court of Dinwiddie, and sued out a writ of fieri facias thereon, and delivered the process to the sheriff. The sheriff levied the execution on property belonging to the estate of R. Claiborne, in the hands of the defendant, his administrator; who gave a forthcoming bond with surety, payable to Robertson executor of Cole, for the delivery of the property to the sheriff, at the day and place appointed for the sale thereof to satisfy the execution.

The bond was returned "forfeited."

393 The plaintiff Robertson *died after the execution was delivered to the sheriff, but before it was levied, and, consequently, before the forthcoming bond was executed. Turnbull, being the executor of Robertson who was executor of Cole, made a motion in the circuit court, for award of execution on the forthcoming bond; but, the fact of Robertson's death before the levying of the fieri facias and the execution of the bond being proved, the court not only refused to award execution on the bond, but quashed both the bond and the fieri facias. Turnbull applied to this court for a super-deas to the judgment, which was allowed.

Allison and Leigh for plaintiff in error. Johnson for defendants.

CABELL, J. The first question is, whether the sheriff could properly proceed to levy the execution after the death of the plaintiff Robertson? In Clerk v. Withers, 2 Ld. Raym. 1072, 1 Salk. 322, 6 Mod. 290, it was decided, that a sheriff having levied an execution might go on to sell, notwithstanding the subsequent death of the plaintiff. The principles on which that case was decided, have been uniformly considered as authorizing the sheriff to levy, after the plaintiff's death, an execution which had issued before. At common law, a fieri facias bound the goods from its teste; and though a subsequent statute declared, that it should bind only from the time it was delivered to the sheriff, yet it was held, that that was for the benefit of purchasers for valuable consideration, and did not change the rights of the parties. The plaintiff, therefore, so far as the defendant was concerned, acquired a lien on the property, from the date of the execution; and as the sheriff derived his authority from the writ, and as the execution is an intire thing, the sheriff might proceed to levy and sell, notwithstanding the death of either party. 2 Bac. Abr. Execution, C. 4, p. 716; Tidd's prac. 916; 1 Archb. prac. 260.

394 *If the sheriff was right in levying the execution, he was, of course, bound to receive the forthcoming bond. And I conceive it perfectly clear, that if he is to take the bond, he ought to take it payable to the plaintiff, although he may be dead. To whom else could it be taken? for no person may have qualified as his executor or administrator. Besides, if it be not taken to him, it will not conform either with the execution or the judgment. If there could, formerly, have been any question as to the validity of a bond thus taken, all doubts are removed by the statute of 1819-20, ch. 28, § 2, Seas. Acts, p. 24, which, after mentioning particular bonds, declares that "all other bonds and obligations, given for a good and valuable consideration, shall be as good and available in law, though the obligee, or obligees, or part of the obligees therein mentioned, be dead at the time of the execution thereof, as if such obligee, or obligees had then been in full life."

The only remaining question is, as to the person who is entitled to move for judgment on the forthcoming bond; whether it be the personal representative of Robertson the obligee, or the personal representative of the estate of Cole of whom Robertson was the executor. The statute (Tate's Dig.

*Executions.—See monographic note on "Executions" appended to Paine v. Tutwiler, 27 Gratt. 440.

†Forthcoming Bond.—The principal case is cited in Van Winkle v. Blackford, 28 W. Va. 660. See monographic note on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107.

Executions, p. 225, 6), provides, that motions on forthcoming bonds, are to be made, "in behalf of the obligee or obligees, their executors or administrators." A literal construction of this act might, probably, require the motion, in this case, to be made by Turnbull in his character of representative of Robertson, and not in his character of representative of Cole. But the court is of opinion, that the law ought not to receive that construction. The judgment in this case, was in favour of Cole's estate; and if no execution had issued, the judgment could have been revived by no person but the personal representative of Cole's estate. Now, the forthcoming bond adds nothing to the force of the former judgment. It has itself only the force of a judgment, and is not an administration of the assets.

This bond, then, is still the property
395 of Cole's estate: that estate *ought to be considered the obligee in the bond, and it ought to be proceeded on by the person entitled to the assets; namely, the representative of Cole's estate. That has been done in this case; for the motion was made by Turnbull as representing Cole's estate.

The judgment is to be reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiffs in error, awarding execution on the forthcoming bond.

Allen and Others &c. v. Cunningham and Others.

December, 1831.

Executors and Administrators—Bond—Right of Administrator d. b. n. to Bring Action on—Case at Bar.—M. H. adm'r of R. H. recovers a judgment against E. B. adm'r of R. B. for debt due plaintiff's intestate, and sues out a fi. fa. thereon, which is returned nulla bona: then, M. H. the plaintiff, dies; and administration de bonis non of R. H.'s estate is granted to A.—Held, the action of debt on the administration bond of E. B. against her and her sureties, lies at the relation of A. the adm'r de bonis non of R. H. and not at the relation of the representative of M. H. the first adm'r of R. H. upon the construction of the statute of 1813-14, ch. 13, § 2; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 63.

Same—Same—Same—Necessity for Sci. Fa.—And the adm'r de bonis non need not, in order to entitle himself to put the administration bond in suit, bring sci. fa. or action of debt on the judgment recovered by the first adm'r.

Same—Same—Same—Statutes—Retrospective Effect.—The fi. fa. sued out by M. H. the first adm'r, was sued out and returned before the statute of 1813-14 was passed; yet Held, the statute applies and gives the action in such case, being retrospective as to the issuing and return of the execution, as well as the recovery of judgment.

Judgment—Return of "No Effects"—Sufficiency.—A fi. fa. on judgment against an adm'r, is returned "no unadministered or unincumbered effects found" &c. Held, this is a return of nulla bona, to entitle the plaintiff to an action on the administrator's bond.

Debt, in the circuit court of Buckingham, by Allen and others, justices of the county court of Buckingham, at the relation of Anderson administrator de bonis non of Hill, against Cunningham and others, sureties of E. Burton administratrix of R. Burton deceased, upon the administration bond given by her to the justices of the county court, with condition (in the form prescribed by law) for her due administration of her intestate's estate.

396 *The declaration, after alleging the execution of the bond, and setting out the condition in hæc verba, assigned the breach thereof, in substance, thus—that Robert Hill, in his lifetime, brought an action of debt against E. Burton administratrix of R. Burton, upon a bond of her intestate to him, but died pending the action, and Moncrief Hill, his first administrator, revived it, prosecuted it to judgment, and sued out a writ of feri facias; on which the sheriff made return, that he could find no unadministered or unincumbered effects to levy it on (which execution was so sued out and returned in the year 1813); and Moncrief Hill, who, as the administrator of Robert, had recovered the judgment and sued out the execution thereon, having since died, administration de bonis non of Robert's estate, was committed to Anderson, the relator, the judgment remaining still in full force and wholly unsatisfied; yet there came to the hands of the administratrix, assets of her intestate's estate sufficient to satisfy the debt, which she wasted; by reason whereof, and of the statute in such case made and provided, action accrued to the plaintiffs, the justices, at the relation of Anderson the administrator de bonis non, to demand the penalty of the bond &c. Upon general demurrer to the declaration, the circuit court held, that the law was for the defendants, and gave them judgment accordingly. From this judgment the relator took an appeal, in the name of the justices, to this court.

Michie, for the appellant. The circuit court sustained the demurrer, probably, because it thought the action did not lie at the relation of Anderson the administrator de bonis non of Robert Hill, but only at the relation of the representative of Moncrief Hill, the first administrator of Robert, who recovered the judgment against Burton's administratrix. But the debt was due to Robert Hill's estate, not to Moncrief's; for, though the judgment for it was recovered by the first administrator, thought, that it was by virtue of that statute. He says: "Where a new person, who was not a party to the judgment, derives a benefit by, or becomes chargeable to, the execution upon it, there must be a scire facias to make him a party to the judgment." 2 Wm. Saund. 6, note 1, 72 e. note 8. At common law no scire facias would issue on a judgment except in real actions. In all personal actions, where the lapse of time or the change of parties had been such as to prevent the taking out execution, the party entitled to the judgment was obliged to bring an action of debt on it, 2 Inst. 260. To remedy this inconvenience the statute of Westminster 2, 1 Ed. I. ch. 45, gave a scire facias in personal actions."

See monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

Executors and Administrators—Bonds—Action.—In State v. Hall, 40 W. Va. 463, 21 S. E. Rep. 792, it is said: "Barton, in his Law Practice (volume 1, p. 166), in speaking of fiduciary bonds, says: 'The action of debt may be maintained upon bonds executed by fiduciaries, such as executors, administrators, guardians, committees, trustees, and receivers, which are made payable to the commonwealth, and conditioned for the faithful performance of their several duties by the various officers who execute them. The suit is brought in the name of the commonwealth at the relation of the claimant; but the relator must be the party having the legal right to the debt.'—citing Allen v. Cunningham, 3 Leigh 395." See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6; also, monographic note on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107.

Judgments—Execution—Revival.—In Holt v. Lynch, 18 W. Va. 572, it is said: "It seems at one time to have been much doubted, whether this right to a scire facias in such case was a right at common law or by virtue of the statute Westminster 2. In Allen v. Cunningham, 3 Leigh 401, JUDGE CARR seems to have yet, having been no wise satisfied in his time, the judgment, and the money 397 due upon it, remained *assets of his intestate, unadministered and unconverted by him, which, therefore, devolved to the administrator de bonis non. The scire facias to revive the judgment, or the action upon it, lay for the administrator de bonis non. He was the person injured by the devastavit committed by the administratrix of Burton's estate; in other words, by the breach of the condition of her administration bond. Therefore, he had the right to put the bond in suit; he was the only proper relator. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 21, 63, p. 380, 390; Dykes v. Woodhouse, 3 Rand. 287; Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. 51; Turnbull, ex'or v. Claiborne, just decided (ante, p. 392).

The attorney general, contra. The action upon the bond of an executor or administrator, is given by the statute; therefore, it lies only at the relation of the party to whom the statute gives it. It had been decided, that no action lay on such a bond, to charge the sureties, till after the executor or administrator had been convicted of devastavit, by judgment in an action against him, and an execution and return of nulla bona; Braxton v. Spotsylvania justices, 1 Wash. 31; Gordon's adm'r's v. Frederick justices, 1 Munf. 1; King William justices v. Carter's ex'ors, 2 Munf. 24; Hairston v. Hughes &c. justices of Henry, 3 Munf. 568; Spotswood v. Dandridge, 4 Munf. 289. The decisions on this point, gave occasion to the statute of 1814, acts of 1813-14, ch. 13, § 2; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 63.*

398 *Now, 1. to whomsoever the debt belongs, this statute clearly gives the action to the person who recovers the judgment and his representatives: if the judgment has been recovered by an administrator for his intestate's estate, against the executor or administrator of the debtor, and the plaintiff dies before the judgment is satisfied, and the judgment and the money due upon it belongs to the administrator de bonis non, yet the remedy upon the administration bond, is given only to the representative of the first administrator, the person who recovered the judgment; and, if the administrator de bonis non may pursue this remedy, he must at least do so, in the name of the representative of the first administrator. The language of the statute is explicit; there is no ambiguity,

*This statute provides, that "when any person or persons shall have heretofore recovered or shall hereafter recover, any judgment against executors or administrators, in their representative character; and, upon execution issued upon such judgment, it shall be returned, that there are not found, in the possession of the said executors, or administrators, sufficient assets of the testator or intestate, to pay and satisfy the whole or any part of such judgment (costs excepted): such person or persons recovering such judgment, his, her or their executors or administrators, may, upon such return of the execution as aforesaid, immediately commence and prosecute his, her or their action against such executors or administrators, and their sureties, or against either of them, or the executors or administrators of either of them, upon the bond given by them, for the performance of the duties of such executors or administrators: in which action, the defendants may plead any plea or pleas, and in support thereof, offer any evidence, which would be legally admissible, in any action against executors or administrators suggesting a devastavit."—Note in Original Edition.

no room for construction. 2. The provision of the statute, is prospective: it gives the action on the bond, in cases of such devastavit as shall be ascertained after the enactment; in cases, where the execution against the executor or administrator, which fixes the devastavit, "shall be returned" nulla bona. But here, the execution against Burton's administratrix, was returned in 1813, before the statute was passed. 3. Here, there was no such return of nulla bona on the execution against the administratrix, as the statute requires, to found the action on her bond. The return was, that the sheriff could find no unadministered or unincumbered effects on which to levy the execution. Now, there might have been effects unadministered, though incumbered; assets, which though incumbered, might yet be sufficient to pay the debt; assets incumbered for debts far short of their value.

Michie, in reply. The statute first speaks of judgments theretofore recovered or thereafter to be recovered, and then proceeds,—if execution on such judgments, shall be returned *nulla bona &c. The future tense as to the returning of the execution, has relation to the fact of the judgment having been recovered, not to the date of the statute. The return upon the execution was a substantial return of nulla bona. If there were effects incumbered, yet sufficient to satisfy the debt, they could not be taken in execution; for they could only be incumbered by pawn or gage; which divested the administratrix of the legal estate; and, then, no execution could be levied on them. 2 Wils. Gwill. Bac. Abr. Execution, C. 4, p. 715, and the cases there cited. The statute in question is a remedial one, and ought not to be strictly construed so as to embarrass the remedy, but liberally, so as to advance the remedy for the party injured.

CARR, J. Besides the points made by the attorney general, to sustain the judgment of the circuit court, another occurred to us in conference; namely, whether this suit can be maintained at the relation of Anderson the administrator de bonis non, without his having first made himself a party to the record of the proceedings of the first administrator by scire facias? I shall first dispose of the attorney general's objections to the action.

His first objection was, that the statute does not give the action at the relation of the administrator de bonis non. In the construction of states, it is the meaning of the legislature we must seek for: this constitutes the essence of the law: its words are our main guide, but we must not shut our eyes to every thing else, and stick exclusively to the letter. The context, and the subject matter must be looked to; the mischief and the remedy. This court by a series of decisions, had settled it as the law, that, before an action could be brought on the bond of an executor or administrator to charge his sureties, there must have been, 1. a suit against the representative to establish the demand, and 2. a suit to fix the devastavit. The legislature, thinking this intermediate suit unnecessary, passed a statute in 1814, dispensing with it: this statute, in the revision of 400 1819, forms *the 63rd section of the statute of wills, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, p. 390. It is seen, at a glance, that the sole object of that statute was to take away the necessity of the second action. The legislature never dreamed of changing, or even of explaining the existing law, as to the person who might sue on the bond; whether, in a case like this before us, the representative of the administrator who recovered the judgment, or the representative of the intestate: it merely intended to declare, that the person entitled to the action, might, immediately on the return of nulla bona, sue on the bond. This court has determined after much deliberation, that the person thus entitled, in a case like the present, is the administrator de bonis non. The reasons of that decision, and the mischiefs of a contrary one, may be seen at large in Dykes v. Woodhouse and Wernick v. M'Murdo, and will not be repeated here.

The attorney general's second objection is founded on the following words of the statute—"Where any person shall have heretofore recovered, or shall hereafter recover, any judgment &c. and upon execution issued &c. it shall be returned, that there are not found" &c. He insisted, that these words are wholly prospective, and that, whenever the judgment was obtained, an execution must issue after the passing of the statute, in order to authorize the action it gives. I cannot see the force of this objection. The object of the statute was to give the action on the bond of the executor or administrator, immediately on the return of nulla bona. It clearly takes in judgments obtained before the enactment: why not the issuing and return of the execution also, which are mere ministerial acts? When its object was to prevent delay and expense, can it be supposed, that it would put the parties to the useless delay and expense of issuing another execution, when one had already been returned nulla bona? Besides, to make such issue of a second execution, a pre-requisite to the action on the bond, would, in all cases where the plaintiff in the first execution had died since, be a denial of the action, without an intermediate 401 *proceeding by scire facias; whereas the law says, the suit may be brought immediately on the bond. In the case before us, for instance, the first administrator who obtained the judgment and issued the execution, died; no second execution could issue in his name. Nor do I think the words shall issue, must of necessity be taken to mean shall issue after the passing of the statute, but shall issue after obtaining the judgment. I cannot think there is any weight in this objection.

The objection, which I have mentioned as having occurred in conference, was founded on the general rule, that where a new person, who was not a party to the judgment, derives a benefit by, or becomes chargeable to the execution upon it, there must be a scire facias to make him a party to the judgment. 2 Wms. Saund. 6, note 1, 72, e, note 3. At common law, no scire facias could issue on a judgment, except in real actions: in all personal actions, where the lapse of time, or the change of parties, had been such as to prevent the taking out execution, the party entitled to the judgment, was obliged to bring an action of debt on it; 2 Inst. 269. To remedy this inconvenience, the statute of Westm. 2, 1 Ed. 1, ch. 45, gave a scire facias in personal actions: but "this statute (as my lord Coke says, 2 Inst. 472), is in the affirmative, and therefore it restraineth not the common law, but the party may waive the benefit of the scire facias given by this act, and take his original action of debt by common law." In Proctor v. Johnson, 1 Ld. Raym. 669, 670; 2 Salk. 600, S. C., which was a scire facias on a judgment in ejectment; and demurrer, upon the ground, that a scire facias lay not on a judgment in ejectment, for, at common law, it lay only in real actions, and the statute gives it only in personal; and 2 Inst. 469, was cited and relied on: lord Holt said, "that Coke's meaning was, that a scire facias would not lie, at common law, for debt or damages, but here it sounded in the reality:" he said further, "it is absolutely necessary, that a scire facias should lie in this case, 402 because there is no other means, to execute *the judgment, if the parties die or are changed; but, in judgments for debt or damages, the judgment might have been executed at common law, by action of debt on the judgment." It is clear, then, that the action of debt on the judgment existing at common law, was not taken away by the statute; and, I presume, that, in the case before us, even without the aid of our statute, the administrator de bonis non could resort to it. In truth, it differs but little in its nature from the scire facias, as the declaration gives a history of the case, and shews how the plaintiff is connected with it.

I think the judgment must be reversed.

CABELL, J., concurred.

BROOKE, J. I see no difficulty in the construction of the statute of 1814, now the 63rd section of the statute of wills, 1 Rev. Code, p. 390. The legislature cannot enumerate all the cases, to which the principle intended to be established will apply; it is enough, if it gives an example of its application: the court must follow it out, by applying it to cases of a like nature. The object of this statute was to dispense with a second suit against an executor or administrator, in order to establish a waste of the assets, before a suit could be maintained on the administration bond against the sureties, to charge them. In words, it only provides for the case in which a person or persons recover a judgment, in his or their own right; but the remedy it prescribes is equally applicable to a case, in which the judgment is obtained by an executor or administrator, in right of his testator or intestate. The same mischief is to be prevented: the second suit to establish the waste of the defendant executor or administrator, before any suit could be brought to charge his sureties, was as much intended to be dispensed with, in such case, as in the case in which the first judgment was obtained by any person in his own right. In the last case, the party obtaining the judgment, is authorized, 403 *upon such return of the execution as is prescribed by the statute, immediately to commence a suit against the executor or administrator and his sureties, or either of them, to establish the waste of the assets; and, if the party entitled to the fruits of the judgment, in such case, is entitled to bring the suit, then, unless we disregard the decisions in Dykes v. Woodhouse, and several others in this court, the administrator de bonis non of the intestate for whose estate the judgment was recovered (in the case before us) is the proper party relator, to bring this action.

I think the attorney general's criticism too nice,—that though the statute is retrospective as to the judgment, it is prospective as to the execution issued upon it. The language, on examination, seems clearly to comprehend any execution issued on such judgments as were previously mentioned in the section.

As to the doubt which has been suggested, whether the administrator de bonis non must not make himself a party to the judgment, by an action of debt on it, or by scire facias, before he can sue on the administration bond; cui bono should he bring debt, or sue a scire facias on the judgment? He could have no new execution on the judgment he would obtain in either case, after the return of nulla bona on the execution, or the return equivalent to it, in the case before us. At common law, he might have the scire fieri inquiry, directing the sheriff to inquire by a jury, whether waste of the assets had been committed by the executor or administrator; and, on the return that waste had been committed, he would have an execution de bonis propriis, to the extent of the waste found by the inquest: but the action of debt suggesting the waste, was found to be a more efficient mode of ascertaining the devastavit, and has in fact, superseded the scire fieri inquiry, and rendered it obsolete. That action is now dispensed with by our statute: and to compel the administrator de bonis non, or any other representative, to resort to the scire fieri inquiry, would produce all the delay intended to be avoided by the statute;

404 *and still greater delay, if he must first make himself a party to the judgment by an action of debt, or a scire facias, before he could have the scire fieri inquiry, or the action of debt suggesting the devastavit, and thereby convict the executor or administrator of waste, before he can commence his action on the administration bond, to charge the sureties. In England, where the assets of the deceased person were administered under the eyes of the ordinary, no bond with surety was required of executors or administrators; and the scire fieri inquiry, on the return of the execution nulla bona, or the action of debt suggesting the waste, gave all the relief that could be required. But here, it was thought necessary to lay the foundation of the suit on the bond to charge the sureties, by bringing the action of debt suggesting the devastavit, before resort was had to the suit on the bond. That is now dispensed with by the statute in question; and a suit on the bond, is given against the executor or administrator, and his sureties, or either of them; in which as broad a defence may be made against the charge of waste committed by the executor or administrator, as before, on the action of debt suggesting the waste.

TUCKER, P. In deciding this case, I shall take the case of Dykes v. Woodhouse to be unquestionable. Certainly, it ought not to be questioned except by a full court; and I should regret to see it disturbed, because it is better that the question of practice should be considered as settled, particularly, as the decision is in perfect conformity with the rights of parties and the convenience of suitors. By that decision it is declared, that an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, may maintain an action of debt on a judgment obtained by the executor of his testator; which accords with the doctrine of Brudenel's case, 5 Co. 9, that the executor of an administrator who recovers a judgment, is not entitled to have execution of that judgment: and the converse of the proposition is equally true, as to the administrator of an executor. Now, in this

405 case, *the original judgment having been obtained by Moncrief Hill administrator of Robert Hill, his executor or administrator could not enforce the judgment. This, I think, is conceded by all the authorities. For, anterior to the statute of 17 Car. 2, ch. 9, § 2, though it was decided, that the administrator de bonis non could not enforce the judgment, yet it was admitted, that the debt belonged to him, and not to the executor in whose name it was obtained, and that he might begin de novo, and recover it. Hence it was that the defendant in the judgment, was, in that state of things, entitled to his audita querela to be discharged from the execution of the administrator of the deceased executor. From these positions it is clear, that, in this case, the executor or administrator of Moncrief Hill the first administrator, could not enforce this judgment, or bring debt upon it. He, of course, could not have brought an action of debt suggesting a devastavit, against the administratrix. But our statute which gave the action on the administration bond at once, without the necessity of the intervention of an action of devastavit, was obviously designed merely to substitute the former for the latter. It is very certain, that it did not design to give the action on the administration bond to one who was not entitled to bring debt for the devastavit. And I think it equally clear, that it designed to give this action on the bond to all, who had a right to bring debt suggesting a devastavit on the original judgment. If it were not so, then, while the administrator of the executor was proceeding on the bond according to the construction of the statute contended for, the administrator de bonis non would be proceeding in debt for the devastavit, according to the decision of Dykes v. Woodhouse. Thus, two suits for the same demand would be in a course of prosecution by different persons. This, it seems to me, is a complete reductio ad absurdum; and compels us to abandon Dykes v. Woodhouse, or to give an equitable construction to the statute. The latter is, certainly, to be preferred; since the legislature can scarcely be presumed to have intended 406 to *refuse the remedy to him who had the right, and to give it to him who had it not. It is admitted, indeed, that the executor or administrator of Moncrief Hill is expressly within the words of the act; "the executor or administrator of the person who recovered the judgment;" and, on the other hand, the administrator de bonis non is not so. But as the statute obviously meant to give the remedy to the executor or administrator of the person entitled to the judgment, it is doing no great violence to its language (when we further its intention) to refuse the remedy to the person not entitled to the judgment, and to give it to him who is. Therefore, I am of opinion, that there was no error in the institution of the action at the relation of the administrator de bonis non.

Nor do I think the objection valid, that the issue and return of the execution was anterior to the enactment of the statute. The statute is clearly retrospective as to the judgment, as well as prospective. I see no reason for any difference, in this regard, as to the execution; and I do not perceive any absolute necessity for construing the words prospectively only. The construction of the statute concerning citizens (in Barzizas v. Hopkins, 2 Rand. 276,) shews, that the present term are, shall be interpreted may be, so as to embrace future cases. But a like freedom is not necessary here: for the words, "and upon execution issued it shall be returned" seem to me to refer rather to the fact of the existence of such return, than to the time when it may have been made.

The last objection must also be overruled. The sheriff returned that he could find "no unadministered or unincumbered effects." He could find neither one nor the other. How then from this negation as to both, can we infer the affirmative as to either? If we cannot; then the return is equivalent to a general return nulla bona.

Judgment reversed.

Executors—Settling Accounts—Interest—Case at Bar.—Testator devises, that his lands shall be sold, and the proceeds invested in bank stock, or in such other property as his ex'ors shall think most advantageous to his children; the ex'ors sell the land, but do not invest the proceeds in bank stock, and afterwards account for the proceeds in money: HELD, they ought to be charged with interest on the balances in their hands annually, and their

*He was related to one of the parties.

†Executors—Settling Accounts—Interest.—In Handly v. Snodgrass, 9 Leigh 490, and note. It is said, by TUCKER, P. in the discussion of the question of charging the executor interest: "As to the charge of interest upon interest from 1827. If this charge were wrong, still it is obvious that had the account been properly settled, the balance against the executor would exceed the sum now reported to be due. Carter v. Cutting and Wife, 5 Munf. 238; Burnley v. Duke, etc., 1 Rand. 108. For by the will the estate was directed to be put out at interest, and according to the decision in Garrett, etc., v. Carr, etc., if the executor did not choose to do so, he is to be considered as a borrower, and should be annually charged with interest, and the interest and disbursements for the maintenance of the children, and on all other accounts, ought to be defrayed out of the interest accruing on the balances.

Same—Accounts—Bill to Surcharge and Falsify.—Presence of Legatees at Settlement No Objection to Bill.—Ex'ors' accounts are audited before commissioners of the county court, the legatees being present at such settlement thereof; these accounts are returned to the court, approved and recorded: HELD, the presence of the legatees at the settlement, is no objection to a bill in chancery to surcharge and falsify the accounts so settled.

Same—Same—Specification of Items—When Not Necessary.—Upon a bill to surcharge and falsify an ex'or's account, though plaintiff is held to specification of items of surcharge and falsification, yet it is always competent to him to shew that the account is erroneous upon its face, and (without controverting the items themselves) to shew, that they have been so arranged as to produce results injurious to him.

Appellate Practice—Bill against Two Executors—Decree against One—Correction of Error in Both Accounts.—Upon a bill and supplemental bill against two ex'ors there is a decree against one of them, on one of the grounds of complaint in the original bill, and the original bill as to all things else dismissed, and the supplemental bill reserved for future consideration: the ex'or against whom the decree is, appeals: the plaintiff does not appeal from the residue of the decree dismissing the other ex'or from the court as to the matters in the original bill: the court of appeals, finding errors in the decree, injurious to the appellee, both as to the ex'or who appealed, and as to the ex'or as to whom the original bill was dismissed, and that the transactions of the two ex'ors are indissolubly blended with each other, will correct the errors as to both ex'ors, especially as the decree is interlocutory.

Richard Allen, late of Albemarle, died in 1805, and by his last will and testament directed, That all his land and other property, except slaves, should be sold at auction, on twelve months credit, and the proceeds of sales laid out in stock of the bank of Virginia, or in such other property
 408 *as his executors should think most advantageous to his children; that as his children should marry or come of age, such of them as should marry or come of age, should, at that time, have his or her part allotted off, until which his estate should be kept together; and that his debts not the principal should be applied to the disbursements. A settlement upon this principle, even without holding him to strict account for his large profits made by usury, would have made the balance much larger; and moreover, that balance would have been principal, as the interest and not the principal would have been absorbed by the disbursements. Moreover, the transactions of the estate were closed in 1827, at latest. They should have been considered as closed soon after the testator's death. According to the case of Garrett, etc., v. Carr, etc., the balance should have been struck after a reasonable time allowed for payment of the debts. The balance should then have been charged against him as a borrower; and from that time until the distribution, the account should have been adjusted as an account between ordinary debtor and creditor."

Also on the question of the settlement of the accounts of executors, the principal case is cited in Anderson v. Thompson, 11 Leigh 458; Garrett v. Carr, 1 Rob. 196, and note; Strother v. Hull, 23 Gratt. 663; Martin v. Fielder, 83 Va. 460, 4 S. E. Rep. 603; Anderson v. Piercy, 20 W. Va. 301, 327.

‡Same—Accounts—Bill to Surcharge and Falsify.—For the proposition that, in a bill to surcharge and falsify an executor's account, though the plaintiff is held to the specification of items of surcharge and falsification, yet he may show that the account is erroneous on its face, and without controverting the items themselves, show that they are so arranged as to be injurious to him, the principal case is cited in Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 438. Also on this question, the principal case is cited in Radford v. Fowlkes, 85 Va. 846, 8 S. E. Rep. 817; Green v. Thompson, 84 Va. 594, 5 S. E. should be paid out of the proceeds of the sales. He appointed three executors; two of whom Dabney Minor and Alexander Garrett proved the will in the county court of Albemarle, and took upon them the execution thereof. The testator left two children Mary and James, both in early infancy: Mary afterwards married James Carr; and after the marriage, Carr (it seemed) was appointed guardian for James, who was still an infant. It appeared, that no guardian had been before appointed for either of them, but the executor Minor had acted as guardian for both.

The executors made sale of the testator's estate in pursuance of his will. But they did not invest the proceeds of the sales in stock of the bank of Virginia, because (as they said) they thought such an investment injudicious: they collected part of them, as they fell due, and part they suffered to remain in the hands of the purchasers, upon interest, for several years, and finally accounted for the whole of the proceeds in money.

After the marriage of the testator's daughter Mary with Carr, and after the appointment of Carr guardian for the son James, the executor's respective accounts of administration were audited and settled by commissioners appointed by the county court for the purpose. Carr and his ward James were both present during the settlement of the accounts by the commissioners, and were repeatedly desired to state any objections that occurred to them, to any part of the accounts, but they made none: however, neither of them was present when the accounts were closed, and the results ascertained and stated. The accounts of both executors, thus audited and settled severally, were reported to the county court; and, no exception being taken to them, were approved and ordered by the court to be recorded.

409 *It appeared by these accounts, that the testator owed only one debt. In the account of the executor Garrett, he was credited with the sum of 2000 dollars paid to Carr after his marriage, the justice of which credit was afterwards contested, but the controversy in respect to it, depended on the peculiar circumstances of the transaction, and involved no question of law. In the accounts of both the executors, balances were struck on the 31st December in every year; each executor was debited with the funds of the estate that came to his hands during each year, and credited with the disbursements of the same year for the expenses of administration, against the principal by him accounted for. In the account of the executor Minor, who (as has been said) acted as guardian of the infant legatees, the disbursements made by him for their maintenance and education, during each year, were in like manner credited to him against the principal by him accounted for. So that, in the accounts of both the executors, the annual balances due from them, respectively, (and they were considerable), were balances of principal. And at the close of the transactions, interest accounts were stated, in which the executors were charged with interest on the annual balances found due from them, respectively. In the course of the transactions, it appeared, that the executor Garrett sometimes transferred moneys of the estate, which had come to his hands, to his co-executor Minor; which of course were debited to Minor, and credited to Garrett: One of the sums thus transferred by Garrett to Minor was 2000 dollars; and this sum was credited to Garrett, as having been so transferred to Minor, on the 31st December 1810, so as to reduce the balance due from Garrett at the end of that year, by that amount; but the same sum was debited to Minor on the 2nd January 1811, and so compose part of the balance struck against Minor at the end of the year 1811; from which last date, Minor was charged with interest on the balance then struck: the consequence was, that one year's interest of this sum of 2000 dollars was lost to the estate. It did 410 not appear whether *Garrett was credited for this transfer to Minor too early, or Minor charged with it too late: Garrett insisted, that the credit was given to him at the proper date: Minor said, he did not recollect the date, and could not explain the inconsistency between the account of his co-executor and his own.

About six months after the executors' accounts settled by the commissioners of the county court, had been returned, approved and recorded by that court, Carr and wife and James Allen (who was now of full age) exhibited their bill against the executors Minor and Garrett, in the superior court of chancery of Staunton, to surcharge and falsify the accounts settled by the commissioners, and to have them corrected. In this bill, they complained of the neglect of the executors to invest the proceeds of the sales made by them, in bank stock; whereby, they said, considerable loss had been sustained, which, they insisted, the executors ought to make good. They alleged, that the accounts of the executor Minor were incorrect in several particulars; over charges, improper charges, and omissions of just credits to the estate: and they complained, especially, of the loss of one year's interest of the 2000 dollars transferred by Garrett to Minor, in consequence of the credit therefor being given to Garrett at the end of the year 1810, and of the sum not being brought to Minor's debit till the beginning of 1811. And, as to Garrett's accounts, they complained, that the credit allowed him for the 2000 dollars paid to Carr after his marriage, was unjust (and this, indeed, was the main point of the controversy). They made no objection to the general principles on which the accounts were settled by the commissioners of the county court, to the manner in which the interest account was stated, and interest brought to the debit of the executors at the close of the transactions, or to the application of the executors' disbursements to the principal of the moneys by them received respectively and accounted for.

411 *The plaintiffs afterwards filed a supplemental bill, touching matters not mentioned in the original bill, and not necessary to be further noticed here, since they were not a subject of inquiry in this court.

The executors answered severally, each setting up such matters of defence as appertained to his own part of the case.

And upon the hearing, the chancellor was of opinion, that the plaintiffs had no just ground of complaint against the executors, for their failure to invest the proceeds of their sales in bank stock; that the plaintiffs had failed to establish any of the errors they complained of, in the executors' accounts settled by the commissioners of the county court, excepting the credit allowed to Garrett for the payment of 2000 dollars to Carr; that that credit ought not to have been allowed Garrett: therefore, he decreed that Garrett should pay the plaintiffs, the 2000 dollars with interest, and all their costs of suit, and he dismissed the original bill as to all other matters therein alleged; but he retained the supplemental bill for future consideration, so that this decree was interlocutory.

Garrett appealed from the decree to this court; but the plaintiffs did not appeal from so much of the decree as dismissed their bill as to Minor.

Johnson and Leigh, for the appellant.

Stanard, for the appellees.

TUCKER, P., after examining the question, upon the evidence, as to the credit claimed by Garrett for the 2000 dollars paid by him to Carr, and shewing the reasons why this court held the chancellor's decree clearly erroneous, in disallowing that credit and adjudging that Garrett should pay that sum to the legatees, proceeded—

With respect to the other part of the case, I think there is yet less doubt, that the decree is erroneous. The bill was filed by the children of Richard Allen against 412 his executors, *for the purpose of scrutinizing before the court of chancery, one of those ex parte accounts, which, instead of settling disputes among the members of a family, most generally prove the proximate cause of discord and litigation. It charged the accounts with incorrectness, and surcharged and falsified them, in several particulars. It was not a stale and antiquated transaction, raked from oblivion by some speculating busy body and maintainer of suits, but an appeal for redress of their supposed wrongs, by two young people but recently arrived at maturity, and within six months after the recording of that account, which they assailed as derogatory from their rights. They were then entitled to be heard, if they could shew any just ground of complaint. It is proved, indeed, that Carr, the husband of one and the guardian of the other infant, attended the settlements, and was repeatedly invited to object to what he thought amiss. In answer to this, it is sufficient to say, that that attendance, if it had continued during the whole of the settlement, would not have been conclusive of the rights of the parties. But it may be added, that neither of the distributees nor the plaintiff Carr were present during the whole time, and particularly at the last meeting which was most important, and presented the results of the examinations of the commissioners; and moreover, though present, if they were without counsel, this court would not necessarily infer, that they were competent to the detection of the errors, which, in the settlement of an executor's account, may escape even the most practised eye.

The question before the chancellor as to this matter, was, Whether the proceedings in the cause presented a case for the reference of the accounts to a commissioner for settlement, upon the ground, that they were surcharged or falsified, by the bill and the evidence adduced by the plaintiff. The chancellor thought not. Let us inquire into it.

Passing by the small items for managing the estate, and for board, in which the plaintiffs have not succeeded, there is one item in the account obviously mis- 413 stated, besides the *2000 dollars for which Garrett claimed credit which was rejected (improperly as I have already shewn) by the chancellor. I speak of the 2000 dollars paid over by Garrett to Minor in December 1810, and not credited by Minor until January 1811. By this means one year's interest was lost, as interest was not calculated upon that sum but from December 1811. For this interest the executors are beyond question liable: but who can say upon which of them the burden ought to fall? To the plaintiffs, indeed, it is immaterial, provided they get their right; but the chancellor has not given it to them, although the falsification was distinctly set forth in the bill, and palpable upon the accounts of the parties. This error so undeniable, and yet so inexplicable that Minor frankly says he cannot explain it, of itself demanded that the accounts should be remodeled. Occurring as early as 1811, it affected the results of the subsequent transactions, and moreover it was a matter which ought to have been settled before the bill was dismissed as to Minor.

But the account was not only erroneous in this glaring particular, but it was grossly erroneous upon its face, in its principles and its details. In examining it, it must be observed we exercise no other than our legitimate appellate jurisdiction. The chancellor has said no new account was necessary. In reviewing this opinion, we must place ourselves in his situation, and do what he should have done. Now, I take it, wherever a case is presented before a court of chancery to surcharge and falsify an executor's account, though the plaintiff is held to a specification of items of surcharge or falsification, yet it is always competent to him, or to his counsel, to shew to the chancellor, that upon its face the account is erroneous; that it is stated upon principles in conflict with the rules of the court, and subversive of the rights of the parties. Not controverting the items themselves, he may shew that they have been so arranged, as to produce by the magic of figures, results the most fatal to his rights. In this case, I think, 414 we find an instance of *such an operation. But to understand the injury done to the plaintiffs in its full extent, we must advert first to the will of the testator.

Richard Allen by his will directed his lands and other property, except slaves, to be sold, and the amount of sales to be laid out in Virginia bank stock, or in such other property as his executors should think most advantageous to his children. Admitting the discretion here vested in the executors, in its largest scope, and admitting (what, by the way, the evidence decidedly negated) that the investment in bank stock as directed, would not have been judicious, the question recurs as to the course the executors ought to have pursued. Their great and avowed anxiety to meet the wishes of the testator, to do what they think he would have done, was highly meritorious. They have speculated, in their answers, on the different modes of employing the capital in their hands, but have not succeeded in shewing what, besides the bank investment, the testator probably wished. But though it may be difficult to devise what he did wish, except so far as that wish is evinced by directing a bank investment, there can be no difficulty in saying what he did not wish. He could not have wished, to sell his lands and other property, the natural fund for the support and education of his children, and to invest the proceeds in such a way that the maintenance and support of those children should, like a consuming moth, eat up the principal of his estate, and leave the interest, during a long minority, a barren fund in the hands of his executors, producing no profit and meeting no expenditure. He could not have wished to pursue a system, the inevitable effect of which was to sink a great part of an estate, the annual profits whereof would have amply met all demands for maintenance and education, and left an accumulating balance. Why did he sell the land, in the stability of which he might safely have confided? Because he confided not less in the faithful promotion of his views by his executors; and because those views were to convert a sluggish into 415 an active *capital. Hence he directs an investment into bank stock, the dividends of which would be applied, with the hires of his slaves, to the maintenance and education of his children, and the balances to reinvestments. The effect of this operation would have been, to have accumulated, at this day, no trifling sum, instead of that which they have received. But the executors, in the exercise of their discretion, have declined taking bank stock, and the chancellor has considered them as justified in that course. If, however, they did not choose to pursue the direction of the testator, it was proper that they should come as near to it as might be, and that the court at least should take care, that, in the exercise of their discretion, the testator's views and intentions shall not be utterly frustrated. They might have vested the funds as they were received (and it was the natural course of things) in loans to good borrowers, securing the payment of interest regularly, to meet the expenses of the children, and to be reinvested as occasion might serve. They have not done this, except as respects that portion of the funds which were permitted to remain in the hands of Watson (the purchaser of the lands) who sometimes paid the interest, which was then converted into principal. A similar course as to the residue of the estate, would have produced very different results from those now exhibited. Indeed, it would seem by Garrett's answer, that they deemed it best, that the money should lie in the hands of responsible and punctual men upon simple interest. If this, then, was the course to be pursued, it should appear that the money was so let out upon loan; unless we are to understand them as meaning, that it was safer for them to retain the money themselves. If they did so, then they must be considered as retaining it as borrowers; and not holding it as executors merely, chargeable with interest upon the principles applicable to such fiduciaries. In this view, they should, in this account, have been annually charged with interest, for such would have been the effect had the money been lent to others; and that interest should have been 416 applied to the *disbursement of expenses, and the excess reinvested in an interest bearing capital. For, in this case, the ordinary principles which govern the accounts of executors, do not apply. Quoad this matter, they are not to be treated as executors. They are ordinary debtors—borrowers of this money—which they admit should have been put out and improved at interest in the hands of punctual men. The case of Granberry v. Granberry, 1 Wash. 246, does not govern their case. The court, there, forbade a certain mode of stating executors' accounts, because it said, "though right in the ordinary case of debtor and creditor, it would be hard in the case of an executor." Here, the executors substituting themselves as borrowers, the ordinary principles of debtor and creditor, have strict application.

But it is not for these reasons only that the account should be otherwise stated. In this case the estate owed but a single small debt. Did that justify the protraction of the executorial account from 1805 to 1824? By no means. Executorial accounts should always be brought to a close as soon as the debts are paid, and the transactions permit. Payments to legatees, and advances to children or other distributees, should never enter into the general account, both to prevent confusion, and because the accounts with them are not to be adjusted upon the principle of the general account. For, after the balance of the general account is struck, and the portions of the several legatees or distributees ascertained, the account between them and the executor is strictly an account between debtor and creditor. When such balance is struck, the portion of each should be carried to a separate account with him individually. The executors in this case, indeed, would still have held the funds in their hands by virtue of the will, until the marriage or maturity of the children. But the accounts of the fund so held by them, would not have been adjusted on the principle of an executor's account. They would have been treated rather as guardians, who are never permitted to pay the infants' expenses out of the principal 417 of their estate. *One of the parties seems to have been the actual, though not indeed the legal guardian of the children; and he who so acts, ought to be charged as such. Whoever enters upon an infant's estate, is treated as his bailiff or guardian, and charged accordingly. Bennet v. Whitehead, 2 P. Wms. 644; Dormer

v. Fortescue, 2 Atk. 288; 3 Id. 124, S. C. Much more, where an executor undertakes to fulfil the duties of guardian, instead of having a guardian appointed according to law, he must be treated as such, in his transactions with the infant. Indeed, even were it otherwise, it is absurd to suppose, that he can be justified in doing that which ever the legal guardian cannot do. It is absurd to suppose, that he can lawfully waste the principal of the infants' estate, when the lawful guardian would not be permitted to do it. Nay, it is for his own benefit to consider him as sustained in his acts, as quasi guardian. If he be not, then all these payments and disbursements for the wards would be in his own wrong. Hence, in tenderness to him, and because he has only done that which benevolence required for an unprotected child, he is justified in doing what the guardian might do; but upon no principle is he justified in doing more. His disbursements, therefore, must be charged to the interest, and not to the principal, of the wards' estate. And herein this account is wrong ab ovo usque ad mala.

If the executors were themselves fairly borrowers of the funds, in the execution of their trust, I do not know that the distributees could complain of any profit they may have made. If they were borrowers of the funds, substituting themselves for, and to account as, other borrowers would, if they held the funds as debtors of the estate, and were accountable as ordinary debtors, then they had a right to make what profit they could from those funds.

It is unnecessary to pursue this subject farther. I will only add, as to the dismissal of the bill, that the original bill was dismissed as to both the parties, in relation to all matters except the sum of 2000 418 dollars decreed against Garrett. *Garrett having appealed from the decree for the 2000 dollars, and the decree as to that being reversed, and the court perceiving also error in the record against the appellee, is bound, according to its rules, to consider the whole record, and to correct that error also, as if the appellee had appealed. It struck me, at first, that as Minor was out of court by the dismissal of the bill, this court could only correct errors as against Garrett. But one of the errors is the dismissal of the bill as to all other matters except the 2000 dollars. This dismissal, therefore, as to Garrett, must be set aside. But as the order of dismissal was intire, embracing both,—the reversal of that order must be a reversal as to both. Indeed, the two executors are so connected in the transactions, that this seems inevitable: and the case thus comes within the distinction, as I understand it, taken by the court in Tate v. Liggett, 2 Leigh, 107, 8.

The other judges concurring, the decree was reversed, and the cause remanded, in order that the executors' accounts might be remodeled and corrected, according to the principles indicated in the opinion of the president.

*Pratt v. Taliaferro.

February, 1832.

(Absent BROOKE,* J.)

Husband and Wife—Personal Property of Wife—Right of Husband to.—Testatrix devises land to be sold by her ex'ors. and the proceeds of sale to be equally divided between her daughter F. A. and her grand daughter L. T. H. but if her daughter, when of age or married, shall choose, she may take the land in fee, on paying half the value thereof to the grand daughter, according to valuation to be made by two of the ex'ors on oath: F. A. the daughter, marries while yet an infant: at the instance of her husband two of the ex'ors value the land; the husband pays half the value to the grand daughter, takes the land, and sells it as his own; the daughter never exercises, or attempts to exercise, the right of election given her by the will, and dies leaving her husband her surviving, and issue:

Lucy Alexander died in the year 1781, and by her last will and testament, devised and bequeathed as follows: "I give and devise the land and plantation whereon I now dwell, consisting of 800 acres more or less, to my executors hereafter mentioned, that they my executors, or the survivors or survivor of them, may sell and convey the same for the best price that can be got—and my will and desire is, that the produce of the sale be equally divided between my daughter Frances Alexander and my grand daughter Lucy Thornton Hooe—but if my daughter Frances, when married or of age, should choose, she may take the land in fee, on paying half the value of the said land to my grand daughter Lucy Hooe, such valuation to be ascertained by the executors, or any two, on oath." (The land which was the subject of this devise, was called Dunn's.) The testatrix named George Thornton, Seymour Hooe, Joseph Jones, Alexander Rose and John Taliaferro, her executors; the last of whom, Taliaferro, alone qualified, and took upon him the execution of the will. Her daughter Frances married Lawrence Brocke, in 1782; and he, soon after his marriage, called 420 on *Jones and Rose, though these had not qualified as executors of Mrs. Alexander, to make a valuation of the land, in order that he might determine, whether he would take the land at valuation, and pay one half the estimated value to Miss Hooe, or require a sale thereof to be made, according to the will. They estimated the land, on oath, at 20 dollars per acre; upon which Brooke elected to take the land, and to pay one half of the value thus ascertained, to Miss Hooe, and he afterwards paid the same to her. It appeared, that Mrs. Brooke was no wise party to this election made by her husband; and that she herself never, in any way, during her life, exercised, or attempted to exercise, any election on the subject. Brooke afterwards made an exchange of this land for other lands, with John Taliaferro the elder, the only acting executor of Mrs. Alexander. Taliaferro was also the guardian of the legatee Lucy T. Hooe; and he had been a witness to the valuation made by Jones and Rose. Brooke made a conveyance of this land to Taliaferro, but his wife did not join in the conveyance; and Taliaferro conveyed to Brooke, the lands he had agreed to give him in exchange. Subsequently to this transaction, Mrs. Brooke died, leaving four daughters, her heirs at law, and her husband surviving. Brooke sold and conveyed the lands he had received from Taliaferro, in exchange for the land in question, to John Pratt and George Hamilton; and then, as was alleged, died insolvent.

In a suit in the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg, between John Taliaferro the younger, and Pratt, Hamilton and the heirs of Mrs. Brooke, the title which Brooke acquired in the tract of 800 acres of land, called Dunn's, devised by Mrs. Alexander's will to be sold by her executors &c. became a material subject of examination and inquiry, all the other questions in the cause, depending on the resolution of the question in respect to it. The chancellor was of opinion, that Brooke had title to only a life estate in one moiety of this land; that his election to take it at the valuation, whether made with or 421 without the "concurrence of his wife, operated to vest the title thereof in the wife; and that, as Mrs. Brooke did not join in the conveyance to Taliaferro the elder, and as no sale of the land was ever made by the executors of Mrs. Alexander under her will, and as Mrs. Brooke never made any election to take the subject as money, it remained land, and descended to her heirs at law. And he made an interlocutory decree founded on this opinion as to the nature of Brooke's title: from which Pratt appealed to this court.

CARR, J. The first question in this cause, and that on which every other question depends, is, Whether the disposition contained in Mrs. Alexander's will, of this land called Dunn's, is to be construed as a bequest of personality to her daughter Frances, or as a devise of land? Has the testatrix impressed on this land the character of money, or is it still land? In Fletcher v. Ashburner, 1 Bro. C. C. 497, the master of the rolls says, "Nothing is better established than this principle, that money directed to be employed in the purchase of land, and land directed to be sold and turned into money, are to be considered as that species of property, into which they are to be converted; and this in whatever manner the direction is given. The owner of the fund, or the contracting parties, may make land money, or money land. The cases establish this rule universally." Seeing then, that the testatrix had the perfect power, we are to inquire what has she done? She devises the land, to her executors, that they may sell and convey it, and her will is, that the produce of the sale be equally divided between her daughter and grand daughter. Here is a complete sentence; a perfect disposition of the subject; the land devised to the executors to sell and convey, the proceeds bequeathed to the legatees: thus, clearly and defini-

422 tively, "impressing upon it the character of money. No body could have doubted this for a moment, if the will had stopped here. Is there any thing which changes this purpose so plainly declared? any thing which, if the daughter Frances had died an infant, would have made this a devise of land? The testatrix proceeds: "but if my daughter Frances when married, or of age, should choose, she may take the land in fee, on paying half the value of it, to my grand daughter." Here are three conditions precedent? three events which must happen before she can take the land: 1. she must come of age or marry: 2. she must, on either of these events, choose; she can't do it before: 3. on paying half the value, after age or marriage, she may take the land. How can this bare power, thus clogged with three conditions precedent, operate to change the disposition so clearly and absolutely expressed in the sentence immediately preceding? In wills, the meaning of the testator, we are told, is the polar star. Can any body believe, that the testatrix here intended by the second sentence to change the nature and effect of the first? Such an interpretation, it seems to me, would violate common sense, as well as grammatical construction. Her settled intention, undoubtedly, was, that the land should be sold, and the money divided: but as her daughter would not need this money till she came of age or married, and as possibly she might then prefer to take the land, and pay half the value, she gave her the power, by making this election and paying the money, to change her money legacy into land; but, surely, until this change happened, until these acts were done, it remained, to all intents and purposes, a money legacy. This was the character decisively impressed upon it; and in Ashby v. Palmer, 1 Meriv. 300, the judge tells us in so many words, that "land once impressed with the character of money, must remain so impressed until some person elects to take it in its original character as land." All would agree, I repeat, that this was a money legacy, if the power had not been superadded of 423 taking the land; and *yet, what is this, more than the law itself gives? But expressio eorum quæ tacite insunt nihil operatur. Suppose land directed to be sold, and the money given to A. he may elect to take the land, and no body can say him nay; but if he do not elect, it remains money; the character impressed upon it, is not affected by the right of election, unless that right be exercised. In our case, the testatrix gave the land to her executors to sell, and the proceeds to the legatees. Suppose she had stopped here: both the legatees would have had the power to elect to take the land; and if they had exercised it, the whole land, which was directed to be sold, would have remained in specie; but it was not the less a money legacy. So here, the daughter, by electing to take the whole, and paying half the value, might have land instead of money; but until she performed these conditions precedent, it remained a money legacy.

Many cases were relied on in the argument, to shew, that the character of money was not definitively and imperatively impressed upon this property; but, in my mind, they are clearly distinguishable. Thus, where it was uncertain in what manner the owner intended the property to descend, or where a conversion was directed for a special purpose; or out and out, but the produce to be applied to a particular purpose; when the purpose fails, the intention fails, and equity regards the owner as not having directed a conversion. Thus, in the case of lands directed to be sold to pay the debts of the testator, if the debts are paid without a sale, it remains land; or if sold, as nothing but the payment of debts was intended, all beyond will remain real estate. All the cases cited may be referred to one or other of these principles; or else, to that doctrine of lord Roslyn, in Walker v. Denne, 2 Ves. jr. 170, 176, that the property shall be taken as it happened to be at the death of the party from whom the representative claims; a doctrine, which has been clearly overruled by many later cases; I refer among many others to Wheldale v. Partridge, 8 Ves. 235; Thornton v. Hawley, 10 Ves. 129; Biddulph v. Biddulph, 12 Ves. 424 *161; Kirkman v. Miles, 13 Ves. 338; Ashby v. Palmer, 1 Meriv. 296; Craig v. Lesslie, 3 Wheat. 563, 583. In Ashby v. Palmer, the daughter, for whose benefit the land was devised to be sold, became a lunatic before she attained to full age, and continued so till her death many years after: no part of the real estates was sold under the trusts in the will: and the question was, whether the land was converted by the will into personal estate, or remained real? The master of the rolls said, that "when the daughter arrived at twenty one, the land being unsold, she might, if she had been competent, have elected to take it as land; or, if she had kept it unsold, being competent to elect, she might have been presumed to have so made her election; but here, she was manifestly incompetent to make any; and it is, as if she had died before the time arrived at which she could have elected." Upon the most careful view I have been able to take of the subject, I am of opinion, that Mrs. Alexander's will impressed upon the land in question, the character of money, which must remain until the daughter complied with the conditions on which alone she could take the land.

Has she ever done this? She was married, we are told, before she attained to full age: could she after she was a feme covert make the election? I doubt it, exceedingly. If a simple act of election had been all that was necessary, perhaps equity, notwithstanding the husband's marital rights, might have aided her. But here, she was not only to choose to take the land, but she could only take it on paying the value of the half of it. How was a married woman to do this? She has no funds, no money; can she make the choice, and thereby not only prevent her share of the legacy from going to her husband as personalty, but also saddle him with a large debt for land, the fee of which would go to her and her heirs? Surely, no court of equity would aid her in such an enterprise. But if she could elect, she never did. It is said, her husband has elected for her, by taking the land at valuation, and paying the half

425 value. *It is clear that he has taken the land, and paid for it; but by no means so clear, that he has done this for his wife. On the contrary, I think the whole res gestæ shew, that he took, and held, and dealt with the land, as his own exclusive property. To be sure he calls it, in some recitals, the land he and his wife held under Mrs. Alexander's will, and the land he got by his wife; but these are loose expressions, and rather used to describe the manner in which he acquired the land, than the nature of the title by which it was held. But in all the essentials denoting property, he and those with whom he dealt, unquestionably, acted as if they considered him the fee simple owner. He conveyed it to Taliaferro in fee; and Taliaferro, intimately acquainted with the whole transaction, the acting executor of Mrs. Alexander's will, the guardian of Lucy T. Hooe the co-legatee, the witness of the valuation and election, seemed perfectly content with Brooke's conveyance. Indeed, we never hear a hint of any defect, till the original bill was filed in this cause. If Brooke had thought he was selling his wife's land, why did he not take the conveyance of the lands he took in exchange for it, to her? It was said, that under the will, unless the land was taken by the daughter, it was to be sold by the executors, and if taken by her, to be valued by two executors; and that Brooke's having it so valued, shewed he meant to take for his wife. We are told, however, that the valuation was merely to ascertain, whether he should elect to take land at all; that is, that he might ascertain the money value of the subject. Now, if he could elect he must ex vi termini, have the power of deciding whether he would take the money or the land. Having this power, can we hesitate to conclude, that he would say, "I prefer taking this as money, whereby I gain half the value to myself, jure mariti, to taking it as land, whereby I lose, not only the moiety I should have gained, but also the other moiety, which I shall have to pay, making a difference with me of the whole value?" If he concluded to take it as money,

426 still the land being valued by the executors, and its price *settled, might he not very probably argue thus—"I own half of this price: I will pay the other half to Lucy T. Hooe, and take the whole land?" If he had a right to choose to take money, no body could object to this but Miss Hooe, so far as it might affect her legacy; and we hear of no complaint from that quarter. True, this would not be following the will, and Brooke may not have gotten the legal title; but it is clear to me, that it was never in his wife, nor in her heirs, nor could they ever get it. They could never have disturbed Taliaferro in his possession of Dunn's, or justified the filing this bill.

My opinion on this part of the case, striking at the root of the plaintiff's claim, renders it unnecessary to discuss at large the other points in the cause. The decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

CABELL, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. The question which lies at the foundation of this case, is, Whether Brooke had a good title to the tract of land called Dunn's, sold by him to John Taliaferro the elder in 1789? a question, which depends upon the construction and effect of Mrs. Alexander's will, and what has been done, and omitted to be done, under it. Brooke married Frances the daughter of the testatrix. There is no evidence of any election made by Mrs. Brooke herself, under the will of her mother, though it is contended, that her husband elected for her, to take the land, and pay the value of one half to her niece, and that she was thus invested with the fee simple estate, which he could not pass without her concurrence, by deed duly executed according to the ceremonies prescribed for conveyances of femes covert. It is also contended, that, even if his act or election could not bind her, or enure to her advantage, yet, if there was no election, the land continued to be real estate. and as such vested in her, and could not be conveyed by him to Taliaferro, without her deed executed with the solemnities of a *privy examination. On the other hand, it is said, that the character of personality was imperatively fixed upon the property; that the transactions of Brooke detailed in the proceedings, were for his own benefit; and, as the right to the money vested in him as husband, he had a right to elect, and do elect, to take the estate to himself, which he afterwards conveyed to Taliaferro, as he had a right to do.

This view of the contest between the parties, presents, at once, the necessity of adverting to the doctrines of equity on the subject of the conversion of land into money, and money into land. The rule is, perhaps, as clearly stated by the master of the rolls in the case of Fletcher v. Ashburner, 1 Bro. C. C. 499, as in any other authority. He observed, "that nothing was better established than this principle, that money directed to be employed in the purchase of land, and land directed to be sold and turned into money, are to be considered as that species of property, into which they are directed to be converted, and this in whatever manner the direction is given; whether by will, by way of contract, marriage articles, settlement or otherwise, and whether the money is actually deposited or only covenanted to be paid, whether the land is actually conveyed or only agreed to be conveyed. The owner of the fund may make land money or money land. The cases establish this rule universally. If any difficulty has arisen in any case, it has been from special circumstances."

It is indeed most true, that however well the rule is established, difficulties have arisen in many cases, and have much perplexed the judges. Of this a most conspicuous instance is afforded in the opinion of lord Eldon, in the case of Wheldale v. Partridge, 8 Ves. 233. These difficulties have arisen, sometimes, from failing to distinguish cases falling within the principles above mentioned, from cases where a sale of land has been directed, and some part of the disposition failing, a trust has resulted to the heir. But I think they have sprung mainly, from following too closely the phraseology of the judges in the 428 different cases, instead of *bringing each case to the test of the principles out of which the rule has grown. These principles are,

1. That the owner of the fund may make land money or money land; 1 Bro. C. C. 499; 1 Meriv. 300. Cujus est dare, ejus est disponere. The will of a testator, if not in collision with the law of the land, is the law of his property. He has an absolute right to say what shall be done with it; and if he directs trustees to sell it and turn it into money, and pay it over to the legatee, that direction must be obeyed. If literally and strictly obeyed, the legatee can only receive personality, and will not receive realty; and if he dies before the conversion, it will go to his personal representative as money, since he himself would have taken money; for,

2. Equity looks upon things which ought to have been done, as done; and if the trustee ought to have made the conversion, and has failed to do it, the property will pass to those who would have had the beneficial interest in it, had he pursued the directions of the trust.

3. The rule, is however, modified by this principle, that where money is directed to be turned into land, or vice versa, the person entitled may elect in which way he will take, whether as money or land; and very slight evidence by acts done, will be sufficient. 5 Munf. 122; Amb. 229, 242; 2 Ves. jr. 176; 1 Bro. C. C. 500. But this right of election is of itself modified or subject to exceptions. For an infant cannot elect, 2 Bro. C. C. 56, though a court of equity may elect for him, 2 Rand. 404. Nor can an alien elect; 5 Munf. 127. And where land is directed to be sold, and the money divided among several, all must unite in an election to take the property in its original condition, or the conversion must be made; 1 Bro. C. C. 500. For the rule, which admits of this election, we are truly told, is "a rule of equity not affecting the nature of the estate, but founded in the convenience of the parties. Why encounter the expense and trouble of a sale, and oblige the cestui que trust, if he wishes to hold the land, to purchase it in? It is to avoid this circuitry, that courts of equity permit him at once *to elect to hold the land." But where the party cannot elect, or if he does, his election is void, the property must then pass "as land or money, according to the stamp which was placed upon it by the will. It remains personal, in this case, until the time of election. If the legatee dies intestate the day after the testator, leaving a husband, and a child, the husband as her personal representative would take the bequest as personality; but having thus acquired a right to the money, he comes in, and elects to pay debts &c. and keep the land"—"it then, and not till then, becomes real estate, and that after having passed, in the first instance, as personality." Per Coalter, J., 5 Munf. 127, 8. Such is the clear and forcible language in which a former eminent judge of this court has stated the doctrines of the courts, in reference to these principles. It remains to observe upon this head, that a feme covert can only make a valid election under a commission from the court of chancery, directing her privy examination separate and apart from her husband; by analogy to the solemnities attending the levy of a fine in England, or the privy examination of a feme covert in Virginia. 1 Ves. jr. 512; 2 Ves. sen. 174. This subject however must be hereafter more closely examined, in its connexion with this case.

Such are the general principles of the rule in question. They are to be traced back to a respect for the will of the donor or testator, who has imposed upon his own property, in the distribution of his bounty, the character which seemed to him fit. Whatever that be which he has stamped upon it, that it must bear, until it is changed by the election of a party invested with the right, and capable of exercising the power, of election. To use the language of the cases, whatever character he has imperatively fixed upon it, that it must bear until changed. It was, indeed, at one time, decided, that there was no equity as between the heir and personal representative of the legatee, to change it after his death, from its actual state at that time; Walker v. Depne, 2 Ves. jr. 170, 176.

But that case was soon questioned, 430 *and has been since repeatedly overruled. And it is now distinctly understood, that where the character is imperatively fixed by the will, that character it must retain, unless some party having a right to elect, either expressly or by his acts, evinces a design to hold it in its original state.

Where, indeed, the change is not imperatively required, the property is permitted to retain that character which it actually has at the legatee's death. Thus, if lands are directed to be sold and the proceeds laid out in personality or in other lands, the conversion into personality is not imperative, and the discretion vested in the trustee preserves the estate (until an actual sale has been made) in its original character of real estate.

After these views of the principles which are invoked as governing the case at bar, let us proceed to consider this case more particularly.

I am of opinion, that the will of Mrs. Alexander contains such an imperative direction to her trustees to sell the tract called Dunn's, as fixed imperatively upon that property, in the event that has happened (the failure of Mrs. Brooke to make the choice given her by the will) the character of personality. What did the will direct? That the land should be sold, and the money divided; but that if her daughter when married or of age, should choose, she might take the land in fee. If then, her daughter did not choose to take the land, the direction of the will, and the design of the testatrix, required that the conversion should be made. She commands it to be done, unless the daughter should elect otherwise. If she did not elect, it was the trustee's duty to sell, and particularly, if (as I think) her right of election was determined by her marriage. Upon what principle of equity, could their delay to fulfil the trust by selling the land, and paying over the money to the husband and niece, divest the former of his rights, and make that land, which they ought to have converted into money? There was none; on the contrary, the principles of equity assure to the party his rights, notwithstanding the breach of *trust, by treating the property, though retaining its original form of land, as personal estate.

Such appears to me to be clearly the state of the case, unless Mrs. Brooke did, by herself or her husband, make the election, which by the will she was impowered to make. That she did not elect, at any time, in her own person, is obvious. The contrary is not pretended. Whether her husband could elect for her, and did elect for her, are, therefore, the important questions to be examined.

He could not elect for her—1st, Because, according to the true construction of the will, the election was to have been made by her, at the time of her marriage. I concur with the appellant's counsel, that the terms when married, designate the time when the election should be made, and not the situation in which she might be. There was nothing in the situation of coverture, that was peculiarly calculated to fit her for election; since her will would then be under the influence of another, and she could not without the concurrence of that other, make an election, which would fix upon her, and by consequence upon him, a heavy charge. The election after marriage, would, in effect, have been a contract by which she would have assumed a personal responsibility (and he would of course have been also bound) for one half the valuation, however extravagant, to Lucy T. Hooe; and Brooke, by this act of his wife, would not only have been deprived of his wife's fortune in one half of the land, but have been charged with Miss Hooe's fortune in the other half. Moreover, if the words when married, do not designate the time, but the condition, then she had time during the coverture to decide; and, in the interval, Miss Hooe's interest in the estate would have been suspended, except as to the receipt of a portion of the rents; which never could have been designed, since her interest, at least, was explicitly made personal in every event. On the other hand, it was very natural that the mother, while providing that her daughter ter's estate should be converted into money, as best suited for the fortune of a female, should allow her the privilege of judging for herself, when of a proper age, and of taking the land, if she preferred it. What period was it natural to fix upon? Maturity or full age, in the first place; but, as her young and richly provided child might marry before that period, prudence also required, that she should have power at her marriage, to make an election changing her interest from money, which would go into the pocket of her husband, into lands which would be secure to herself, an election, which if demanded by prudence, it might confidently be supposed, her friends would urge upon her, before the right should be terminated forever by her marriage. 2ndly, If we suppose that the right to his wife's interest in this property, did not vest in Brooke, immediately upon the marriage, by virtue of his marital rights, and that her right of election continued in her after marriage, that right could not have been exercised by him for her, but must have been exercised by herself under a commission from the court of chancery. 1 Ves. jr. 512; 2 Ves. sen. 174. A husband cannot elect to make the property of his wife, real or personal at his pleasure. If, for instance, money is directed to be laid out in land for the wife, the husband cannot elect to take the money, though she may do it under a commission, as has been already remarked. It seems to be supposed, indeed, that he might elect to take the interest as laid, since that would be for her benefit. But, as has been well said, "it is no power of election, if he could elect but one way." Election implies choice; choice supposes more than a single object, either of which may be chosen. It is absurd to attribute to the husband a right of election in behalf of his wife, between two things, if he is only permitted to take one of them. He must have a right to take which he pleases, or he has no right of election at all. But he has no right, as has been decided, to make her property real or personal at pleasure, and therefore he has clearly, in her behalf, no right of election at all. 3rdly, Even though, in ordinary cases, this right existed in the husband, of electing for his wife, it might well be questioned *here. For, by this election, while he would take for her the fee simple in the land, he would, eodem flatu, have charged it with a heavy incumbrance, which, according to a very ordinary course of events, might have swallowed up the whole. This, I apprehend, cannot be pretended to have been within his power.

In the view I have taken of the subject, it is quite unnecessary to grope through the equivocal testimony in the cause, to discover, whether he acted for his wife or for himself, in the transaction with the executors. The taking the conveyance of the lands which Taliaferro gave him in exchange, to himself, proves his intention to act for himself, when that conveyance was made. Be this as it may, if the right was in her, no election by him could affect it, if it was in him, no mistake of his right could forfeit it. It remains only to see, what was the effect of Mrs. Brooke's failure to make an election.

1. By the will, the legal title was devised to the executors in fee, subject to be divested by her election to take the land, upon which the legal title would have immediately shifted and been vested in her in fee. One only of the executors, John Taliaferro the elder, qualified as such; and in him all the rights and duties given by the will to the executors, were concentrated, by the operation of the statute 21 Hen. 8, ch. 4, which continued in force till January 1787, when our own statute of 1785, which superseded the english statute, took effect. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 52, p. 388.

2. Mrs. Brooke having failed to elect to take the land at the time of her marriage, I am of opinion, that the election given by the will, expired upon the marriage. From that moment, the direction to sell and convert the land into money, was imperative and unconditional, and irreversible by her. The character of money was given to her interest. It was personalty, and devolved on her husband, as a portion of his marital rights. And, though by the english law, if he had found it necessary to resort to equity to enforce the execution of the trust in his favour, he might have been compelled to make a settlement, yet that could only have been required upon the supposition that it was personalty, 1 Eq. ca. abr. 64, pl. 3, and in compliance with a rule which never has yet been acted on in Virginia, and about which I do not wish to be considered as giving an opinion. 1 Rand. 372, 385. By the marriage, then, without an election by Mrs. Brooke to take the land, the right vested absolutely in her husband.

3. Brooke being thus invested with the right to the proceeds of one half the land, and having paid to Miss Hooe her portion, being the value of the other half, had a clear equity to the whole proceeds of sale, and, by consequence, a right to elect to take the land itself, in which he had thus acquired the intire interest, instead of having it sold, and being compelled to encounter the expense and trouble of a sale, and upon that sale to buy it in." He did so. Whatever may have been the views and opinions of those who managed the transaction, it is sufficiently clear, that he, with the full possession of the equitable title, has, by an arrangement the fairness of which is not impeached, passed over that equitable title to the person having the command of the legal estate, and thus, by uniting the two, has vested in him a complete and valid title to the land.

To test this, let us see whether Brooke's children have title, either legal or equitable. Their title is not legal, for I have shewn that the legal title could only vest in their mother, upon her election to take the land, which election was never made. Nor have they any equity; for the right to the money passed to their father, as a marital right, which they can never question. And this consequence would equally follow, it would seem, even though Mrs. Brooke's right of election was only determined by her death. For, in that case, as she made no election in her lifetime, her interest, upon her death, would have devolved upon her husband as personality, and his children would have had no title to demand it. The form of an administration might in 435 deed *have been necessary to consummate his legal rights, but, in substance, he would have been entitled to this interest as part of the personality of his wife; and, at this late day, this court would not disturb the title for want of an adherence to such form.

Having thus arrived at the conclusion, that there is no valid objection to the title of Taliaferro under Brooke, to the Dunn's tract of land, it is I think sufficiently obvious that an examination of the other questions made in the cause, can in no wise be necessary.

The decree is to be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

Wills—Acknowledgment—Sufficiency*—Case at Bar.—Testator's will is written for him by R. P. who testifies, that he also signed testator's name thereto, in the presence and at the request of the testator, and then subscribed his own name as a witness in the testator's presence; and another witness, B. H. testifies, that some years afterwards, the witness being at testator's house, it was suggested to testator, that that was a favourable time to have that will witnessed; testator assented; the paper in question was produced; witness took it near to testator and inquired whether he acknowledged it; testator said he did; upon which, this witness subscribed as a witness in testator's presence: Held, the acknowledgment of the paper by testator to the second witness, was a recognition of the signature thereto as his own, and evidence from which a court of probat may well infer, that the testator's signature to the will was written by his authority; and so here are two witnesses to the execution of the will, as required by the statute; dissentiente BROOKE, J.

inferiour courts, which saw and heard the witnesses examined, decided correctly.

A paper purporting to be the last will and testament of Gwin Dudley, late of Franklin, was offered for probat in the county court of Franklin, by Lewis and Gwin Dudley, and the probat was contested by Thomas and Levi Dudley. The county court was of opinion, that the paper was the true last will and testament of the deceased, and ordered it to be recorded, generally; that is, as a will both of real and personal estate. Thomas and Levi Dudley appealed from the sentence, to the circuit court of Franklin, which affirmed it; and then they appealed to this court.

At the hearing in the circuit court, the court, at the instance of the appellants, ordered the whole of the evidence to be reduced to writing, and made part of the record; which was as follows:

The will in question, bore date the 6th January 1818. There were four subscribing witnesses to it; namely, 437 Robert *Pasley, Bernard Hendrick, Phoebe Maxey and Sally Pasley; and it appeared by the attestation, that the first two wrote their names themselves, and the other two made their marks, their names being written for them by some other person.

1. Robert Pasley testified, that he wrote the will, and signed the testator's name thereto, in the presence and at the request of the testator, and that he subscribed his name as a witness, in the testator's presence. That the testator was of sound mind at the time. That, after the will was written, the testator was apprehensive he had not secured a slave in the will mentioned, to one of his daughters and her children, and asked the witness if the will could be altered so as to effect that end; the witness told him it could, and altered the will, by erasing a part and inserting the alteration; but the witness could not say when the alteration was made.* That he wrote Phoebe Maxley's name as a witness to the will, in her presence; he did not recollect, whether she made her mark or he made it for her; but she was present, and he would not have put her name to the paper, unless she had been present, and in the presence of the testator.

2. Bernard Hendrick testified, that he being at the testator's house in the spring of the year 1825, one of the appellees remarked loud enough to be heard by the testator, "that that was a favourable time to have that will witnessed;" the testator assented; and a paper was produced, which was the will in question. That the witness took it near to the testator, and inquired whether he acknowledged it; the testator said he did; and the witness subscribed the paper in the testator's presence. The testator was, at the time, of sound disposing mind and memory; he was above eighty years old.

3. Phoebe Maxey testified, that she could not write; her name might have been put to the will, but she did not make her mark, and had no recollection that she requested Pasley *to write her name.

That the testator's wife came to the kitchen where she was, and said she wanted her to go to the house, and witness a will; that she (Mrs. Dudley) would talk for her. That the witness went in, but objected to witnessing the will, unless it was read to her; Pasley refused to read it. That the testator told the witness, afterwards, that she must go to court, and testify that it was not his will, and she promised him she would never bear witness in support of it. That the testator said, that when he executed the will he was out of his senses: he always said, that it was not his will, that his wife had won the victory, and that his household was managed "not by whom it should be." That the witness Pasley, altered the will in the testator's absence, during the summer after the execution of it. And that Pasley had threatened, that if she came to court, he would have her ears cropped, but if she did not go, he would protect and befriend her.

The other subscribing witness, Salley Pasley, was not examined; why, did not appear.

4. There were two witnesses, who testified, that the witness Robert Pasley told the witness Maxey, he had heard, that she charged him "with writing on Dudley's will," and that she denied she was a witness to the will; she avowed both; upon which Pasley told her, that if she said that on oath, she would swear to a lie, and would be put in the stocks, and have her ears cut off, or, that he would have her ears cut off.

5. There were three witnesses who testified, that the witness Pasley was esteemed a man of truth and respectability.

6. One witness testified, that, about the year 1823, in conversation with the testator, the witness asked him whether he had a will? and he answered, that his wife had a will for him, but he did not intend to die and leave that will; that the law made a good will, and he intended the law should make his will.

Johnson for appellants. 1. The testimony of the subscribing witness Pasley, is directly contradicted and impugned 439 *by that of another subscribing witness, Maxey. It cannot be doubted that the testimony of Pasley is essential to the due proof of this will. Whether a will ought to be established upon the strength of testimony thus contradicted and impugned, is submitted to the court. But even Pasley does not say, that, after he wrote the will, it was read to the testator before it was executed. 2. Supposing credit given to Pasley, there is but a single witness to the will. Hendrick does not prove the execution of it as a will of real estate. He says, the testator acknowledged the paper, and he attested in the testator's presence; but the testator's signature was put to it by Pasley; and Hendrick does not say, that the testator declared that he had authorized Pasley to sign it for him; nor is it proved, that Pasley signed the testator's name by his direction and in his presence, as the statute requires, by any evidence but that of Pasley alone. His signing for the testator by his direction and in his presence, is an essential requisite to the due execution; and every fact essential to the due execution of a will of lands, every material requisite of the statute, must be proved by two witnesses. Burwell v. Corbin, 1 Rand. 131, is directly in point to this case. And two witnesses are necessary also, to prove a will of personal estate. Redford's adm'r v. Peggy, 6 Rand. 316.

Leigh for the appellees. 1. The first question is, simply, which shall be believed, Pasley or Maxey? They were examined in open court, both in the county and in the circuit court; and the justices of the county court (who probably knew them), and the judge of the circuit court, concurred in giving credit to Pasley. This court, reviewing the sentence of those courts, upon the written depositions of the witnesses, will, as it always has done in such case, give intire confidence to the concurring opinions of the county and circuit courts. 2. If it were necessary, I should ask the court to reconsider the points decided both in

Corbin came before the court on a special verdict; the court could infer nothing, intend nothing. In this case, the court is sitting as a court of probat; its province is, like a jury, to draw the natural, fair and just inferences of fact from the evidence. The distinction was taken in Smith v. Jones, 6 Rand. 33, and approved in the recent case of Boyd v. Vass, ante, 32. This will had been signed for the testator, long before Hendrick attested it; and to Hendrick, the testator acknowledged the will so signed. He thus acknowledged the signature to be his; and no matter when or by whom it was put to the will, the clear inference from the testator's acknowledgment, was, that it was duly put there. There are, then, two witnesses to the due execution of this will in all respects.

CARR, J. This is a question of probat. There is a direct clashing of evidence in two of the subscribing witnesses to the will: both cannot have sworn truly. The county and circuit courts, having these witnesses before them, have given credit to the witness in favour of the will. Taking him to have spoken the truth, I think his evidence, with that of Hendrick, establishes this as a good will of lands. It was said, in the argument, that the point in this case, is decided by Burwell v. Corbin; that the distinction taken in Smith v. Jones, between a court of probat acting upon evidence, and a court of chancery, acting on a special verdict found on an issue of devisavit vel non, would not reconcile the cases; and that we must overrule Burwell v. Corbin, if we sustained the will here. For myself, I must say, I think that case went too far. Yet there is, surely, a sound distinction between a court of probat acting upon evidence, and a court deciding the law upon the facts found by a special verdict. Upon this distinction, the court, in Smith v. Jones, meant to leave Burwell v. Corbin undisturbed: and I am not disposed, at present, to inquire, whether, on the strict and narrow ground of a special verdict, it may not stand: but, certainly, I can never consent that it shall govern a 441 *court of probat, in deciding upon evidence. I am for affirming the sentence.

CABELL, J. This is a controversy as to the probat of the will of Gwin Dudley, as a will of lands. It was established by the concurrent sentences of the county and circuit courts of Franklin; and the evidence for and against the will, having been spread upon the record, the case now comes before this court, on an appeal from the sentence of the circuit court, upon that evidence. There are four subscribing witnesses to the will. One was not examined at all. Another, Phoebe Maxey, so far from supporting the will, deposes to facts, which, if true, would invalidate it, and would shew that R. Pasley the first subscribing witness is totally unworthy of credit. This would leave but a single witness in support of the will. But it is manifest that both the courts below disbelieved Maxey, and gave full credit to Pasley. There is nothing in this record sufficient to destroy the credit of either of these witnesses, except it be the testimony of the other. The credibility of witnesses depends on a variety of circumstances, which may be seen and known by those who are present at their viva voce examination, but which cannot be transmitted through their written testimony, to an appellate court. On a mere question of credibility, therefore, when there is nothing in the record to throw light on the subject, this court will always presume, that the inferior court, that saw and heard the witnesses examined, has decided correctly.

This will, then, depends on the sufficiency of the testimony of R. Pasley and Hendrick.

I shall first inquire as to the sufficiency of Hendrick's testimony. In the case of Smith v. Jones, judge Carr, speaking for the court, draws a distinction between a case where the court is deciding upon a special verdict, as in the case of Burwell v. Corbin, and a case like the present, where the court has to decide, as a 442 court of probat, on the *evidence given for or against a will: in the former case, we are limited to the facts as stated; we can deduce no inference from them: in the latter, we may infer every thing from the evidence, that a jury might fairly infer. I sat in Burwell v. Corbin. It is due to candor to admit, that I did not proceed on any such distinction as that taken in Smith v. Jones. My opinion would not have been different, at that time, had the case stood on a statement of the evidence, and not on a special verdict. But I have had occasion to reconsider, with great attention, the case of Burwell v. Corbin, and I have come to the conclusion, that the decision can be justified, only on the ground that it was on a special verdict; and that, even in that aspect of the case, it ought to have been sent back for a more perfect finding of the facts.

Proceeding then on the principle, that it is competent to this court, to infer from the evidence, whatever a jury might fairly infer from it, let us see what is proved by the testimony of Hendrick. I will premise, however, that the only requisites to a will of lands, are, that it shall be in writing, and signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction; and, if not wholly written by the testator, that it shall be attested by two or more credible witnesses, in his presence. But the statute does not prescribe the kind or degree of proof, by which the fact of signing, whether by the testator or some person for him, shall be established. It is not necessary, that the witnesses shall see the signing. Proof of an acknowledgment of the signature by the testator, is as sufficient to prove the signature, as proof by the witnesses that they saw the act of signing. Grayson v. Atkinson, 2 Ves. sr. 454; Ellis v. Smith, 1 Ves. jr. 11. In like manner, an acknowledgment, that a writing to which a man's name is signed, is "his will," is proof that he signed the will. Westbeeck v. Kennedy, 1 Ves. & Beam. 362. Now, the writing in controversy, purports to be the will of Gwin Dudley, and his name is signed to it as the testator; and Hendrick deposes, that this very paper was acknowledged by Dudley, and that 443 he subscribed *his name, as a witness, in his presence. It is true, he does not expressly say, that Dudley's name was or was not signed to the will, at the time it was acknowledged. But it is not usual for men to acknowledge papers, either as deeds or wills, and to call on others to attest them, before they are signed. Such a thing may happen; and when it is proved to have happened, the acknowledgment and attestation will be disregarded. But, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, the acknowledgment and attestation give rise to an irresistible inference, that the instrument had been previously signed. A contrary course would defeat a vast number of deeds and wills; for it may often happen, and frequently does happen, that a witness, not only does not remember to have seen the signature, but he does not remember the acknowledgment or the attestation; but when he sees his name subscribed by himself, as a witness, and knows that he would not have witnessed a blank or unacknowledged paper, he feels no more doubt of the due execution of the paper, than if he distinctly recollected all the circumstances. We must take it, therefore, that this will was signed, when it was acknowledged before the witness Hendrick. That acknowledgment is proof, prima facie, that it was signed by the testator himself. But if the signature was, in fact, by some other person, then the acknowledgment is a ratification of the signature; and from that ratification we may fairly infer, that the signature was made in his presence, and by his direction. Therefore, I am of opinion, that the testimony of Hendrick is full and ample.

As to the testimony of Pasley, he says, that he wrote the will, and signed the testator's name, in his presence, and at his request, and that he subscribed his name as a witness in the presence of the testator. This testimony was objected to by the counsel for the appellants, because it did not state that the will, after having been written, was read to or by the testator. But I think we may fairly infer from the testimony, as it now stands, that the will was written according to instructions given by the testator, and that as it was 444 written *in his presence, he was sufficiently acquainted with its contents.

I think this sentence should be affirmed.

BROOKE, J. The case for Burwell v. Corbin (which has been much commented on, and, in my opinion, not correctly understood) was a case of an anomalous character; but the principle decided by it, was, I think, intirely correct. It was an issue of devisavit vel non out of chancery; and, by the acquiescence of the parties, if not by their express consent, the jury which tried it, was permitted to find such evidence as it gave credit to. The verdict was not found as a special verdict; if it had been, it would have been sent back, that the facts and not the evidence of facts, might be found. It, therefore, left the inquiry as to the validity of the will, as open as if the case had stood on an appeal from the sentence of a court of probat. And the case was so treated here, as may be seen by a reference to the opinions of all the judges. The material inquiry in the case, was, whether the factum of signing the will, by the authority of the testator, must be proved by two witnesses under our statute? In examining the testimony found by the jury on that point, the first question was, whether, one witness having proved the signing of the will by Corbin, at the request of the testator, his acknowledgment to a second witness, who did not see the signing, that the paper produced was his will, was proof to witnesses, that it was signed by Corbin, by the testator's direction, at his request and in his presence. I said, that the question, whether the factum of signing must not be proved by all the witnesses, had been much discussed by the judges in England, from the case of Lemayne v. Stanley, down to the case of Grayson v. Atkinson, and (I might have said) to the case of Westbeech v. Kennedy. In Grayson v. Atkinson, lord Hardwicke calls the acknowledgment of the testator, that it was his signature, proof of the factum of signing by him, in some sense; and explains what he meant, by the 445 example *he put of the obligor of a bond acknowledging to the witness that it was his signature. In this case, then, the acknowledgment by the testator, that the signature was his, was deemed equivalent to proof, that the witness saw him sign the will, as seems to have been before required, and was much stronger evidence of the factum of signing the will by the testator, than the bare acknowledgment by the testator that it was his will. And in Westbeech v. Kennedy, it is very clear, that the bare acknowledgment by the testator, that the writing was his will, was not held to be equivalent to proof of the factum of signing by the testator. There, two witnesses having proved the will according to the statute, the question turned on the evidence of the third witness, Henry Boys: his testimony may be seen by turning to the case. The testator did more than acknowledge to the witness, that it was his will: he also sealed the will in his presence; which was said by the counsel, sir S. Romilly and Mr. Parker, to be a recognition by the testator of his signature; but it was not said or pretended, that the bare acknowledgment that it was his will, or the publication of it as his will, to the witness, in the absence of the fact that he had sealed it in his presence, was a recognition of his signature. And I have seen no case, in which the bare acknowledgment of the will to a witness, in the absence of all proof that it was signed at the time by the testator, or by some one for him by his direction, was held to be a recognition of his signature, equivalent to proof of the factum of signing by him or some one for him. As to the latter, in the case of Ellis v. Smith, the acknowledgment of the signature by the testator, was held to be sufficient proof of the signing by him: but lord Hardwicke said, "it has been hinted, that this decision would lead the way to farther deviations from the statute, and, by consequence, would allow a testator's declarations, that another signed for him, to be good: but authority given by a testator, is a collateral thing, and a thing that ought to be proved; consequence is not to be built on con-446 sequence:" he does not say *how proved: but can it be doubted, that he meant proved according to the statute, or by some equivalent proof, which the acknowledgment of the testator was not? This of itself would justify the decision in Burwell v. Corbin. But it is said, that, in that case, we had the testimony of Scrimger, the first witness, that Corbin had signed the will for Burrell, by his direction &c. and we should have taken it to have been signed, when Burwell acknowledged it to be his will, to Braddick, the second witness. In Westbeech v. Kennedy, there were two witnesses who had proved the signature of the testator, before Henry Boys, the third witness, was called; yet the acknowledgment of the testator, that it was his will, would not have been held a recognition of his signature, if he had not sealed the will in his presence; an act which naturally follows, and does not precede, the act of signing, and was of itself a recognition of the signature. It must be admitted, that a paper attested before it is signed, is not a will under the statute; that the statute requires the attestation of two witnesses, after it is a perfect will. If all the witnesses die, or are out of the jurisdiction of the court, then, of necessity, proof is admitted of their handwriting, and is all that can be required to identify the paper attested by them. But if they are present, all must identify the paper attested by them. In such case, the statute requires that two witnesses shall prove the factum of signing by the testator. Suppose he acknowledge the will only, before both of them, and before it is signed, as was the case in Burwell v. Corbin, 1 Rand. 131, as to one of the witnesses; would such an acknowledgment be a compliance with the statute? The witnesses, in such case, by looking at their signatures, might identify the paper they attested; but they could not say, that it was a will executed by the testator by signing his name to it. This would open the door to fraud: a paper not signed by the testator, but afterwards by another, might be palmed upon a court for a will. I have seen no case, in which the acknowledgment of the testator, that the paper was his will, in the absence of 447 all proof that it *was signed by him at the time the acknowledgment was made, has been held a recognition by the testator of his signature.

In Smith v. Jones, the point in Burwell v. Corbin was not involved. The ground we went on, was, that one witness having proved the signature, and it not appearing that Pendergast, the other witness, was dead or out of the power of the court, we would not, as in case of his death or being out of the jurisdiction of the court, admit proof of his handwriting; and we reversed the judgment, and sent the cause back, that his testimony, if to be had, might be adduced. What was said by the judge who reported the opinion of the court, of the case of Burwell v. Corbin, was certainly not relied on, as making any part of the opinion of the court in the case, as it was unnecessary to the judgment pronounced.

I shall not repeat the evidence in the case now before us. I am inclined to think that it is insufficient to establish the will, and, therefore, that the sentence ought to be reversed.

TUCKER, P. The county and circuit courts having coincided, in this case, in giving credit to the witnesses in support of the will, though contradicted by a witness against it, we are bound, by reason and authority, to follow their judgment in this regard.

Taking then for true, as I shall do, the testimony of Pasley and Hendrick, I cannot hesitate in affirming the sentence. The former explicitly states, that he wrote the will, and subscribed it as a witness, at the request and in the presence of the testator. It was objected, indeed, that it is not proved that it was dictated by, or read over to, the testator. But if, as the witness says, it was written by the request and in the presence of the testator, we might fairly presume, that the testator did dictate the will which was written. But the proof of that fact has never been deemed necessary, where the testator has duly executed the 448 *will by signing and acknowledgment.

Innumerable wills, written by third persons and signed by testators, are attested without any evidence whatever of the circumstances under which they were drawn. The recognition of them by execution, is sufficient. It can never be fairly presumed, that a testator performs so solemn an act, without having dictated or understood it. Where, indeed, in the case of personal property, the will is not executed, it must be shewn, that it was written as dictated by the testator, or was approved after having been read. In this case, if the execution be regular, according to the statute, we must take it, that the testator was aware of the contents of the paper, before he executed it; and the rather as it bears date so many years before his death; as his fears of having pretermitted a daughter evinces a general knowledge of its contents; and as the witnesses against the will, if they are to be believed, themselves establish the fact of his having spoken of the will he had made with disapprobation, which could not well have been if he was ignorant of its contents.

The execution of the will seems to me to have been sufficient. Pasley proves the signing it by himself at the request of the testator, and attesting it in his presence. Here, then, is one complete witness to the will. Hendrick also proves, that the testator acknowledged the will in his presence, and he attested it accordingly. It is objected, that this acknowledgment is not sufficient, according to the statute, and the authority of Burwell v. Corbin. That case is not exactly in point; and though I shall certainly not disregard its authority where it is so, yet I am sustained by the case of Smith v. Jones, in saying that it affords no binding precedent in this case. The case of Burwell v. Corbin was decided on a special verdict rendered upon an issue devisavit vel non. This case is before a court of probat. In that, the court was, perhaps, tied down to the facts as found; in this, it discharges the functions, not only of judges, but of jurors; having the power to 449 infer a fact from the evidence *before it. In this case, therefore, I think myself entitled to infer, that when the testator acknowledged the will produced to Hendrick, as his will, he did acknowledge thereby the signature also. For Hendrick says the paper produced at the trial was that which was acknowledged, and we must therefore presume, it was signed as we see it, in the absence of proof to the contrary. Although, therefore, I do not contest the necessity of two witnesses to the recognition of the signature, since the case of Burwell v. Corbin demands them, yet I think that recognition may fairly be inferred here.

If these views are right, then the will was duly executed in its original form, to pass real estate. What then was the effect of the alteration?

1. What was the alteration? It was to provide, for a daughter, and upon the face of the will not a particle of real property is given to a daughter. We may, therefore, fairly infer, that no part of the will devising real estate was then inserted; and, indeed, that no such part was erased, though even this would not have affected the residue. The will, then, is unimpaired as a will of realty.

2. How as to the personalty? The alteration having been made, and reduced to writing, in the testator's presence, and by his direction, I think the reasons very strong for sustaining it without Hendrick's testimony. But it is clear, that the alteration and his attestation were made about the same time. To suppose that the alteration was first made, will account for the desire to have a new witness to the will, seven years after it was first executed. To suppose the contrary, would leave that matter very obscure. If the alteration was first made, and then the will was acknowledged before Hendrick, there can be no doubt it is good as to the personalty in toto.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that the sentence should be affirmed: to which opinion I incline more readily, as the parties may, (if they please to pursue this matter further) prosecute their objections to the will, by bill in equity, and "have its validity determined by an issue devisavit vel non; whereas if we, as a court of probat, decide against the will, the decision may, perhaps, be conclusive on the rights of the parties.

Sentence affirmed.

The principal case is also cited at pp. 426, 430, 433. To the same effect, see, citing the principal case, Roy v. Rowzie, 25 Gratt. 608.

In Hill v. Bowman, 7 Leigh 657, TUCKER, P., says, it is agreed on all hands that the words "any other person or persons who may be in distress," are too vague and uncertain, and that the declaration of trust as to such persons is altogether inoperative and void, citing Gallego v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450. To the same effect, see, citing the principal case, Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 310; Com. v. Levy, 23 Gratt. 40.

In Stonestreet v. Doyle, 75 Va. 364, it is held that, a devise of land to certain persons as trustees to build a school house for the purpose of a free school, the testator not contemplating that a charter shall be obtained for it, is null and void at law on the grounds of the uncertainty of the beneficiaries intended, citing Gallego v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in foot-note to Kinnaird v. Miller, 25 Gratt. 107; Kelly v. Love, 20 Gratt. 130. And in Literary Fund v. Dawson, 1 Rob. 418, it is said the seminaries of learning which the testator sought to endow by the provisions of the 16th clause of his will were not in existence and could only be created by an act of incorporation, therefore a devise to or for them was inoperative and void upon the principles decided by the supreme court of the United States in Baptist Association v. Hart, 4 Wheat. 1, and by this court in Gallego v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450. See Literary Fund v. Dawson, 10 Leigh 147, and note. But a devise of a charitable trust to a corporation thereafter to be created, may be enforced as an executory devise. Literary Fund v. Dawson, 10 Leigh 147; Kinnaird v. Miller, 25 Gratt. 107; Stonestreet v. Doyle, 75 Va. 364.

And a bequest to a corporation capable to take is, and always was, valid as a charitable gift. Wilson v. Perry, 29 W. Va. 188, 1 S. E. Rep. 316, citing Gallego v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450.

In Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 309, 318, the principal case is cited as holding that the courts of Same—Statute of 43 Elizabeth—Repeal of.—The english statute of charitable uses (43 Eliz.) having been repealed in Virginia, the courts of chancery have no jurisdiction to decree charities, where the objects are indefinite and uncertain.

Wills—Case at Bar.—Testator, having by his will, bequeathed legacies to amount of $60,000, directs, the whole residue of his estate, real and personal, shall be sold by his ex'ors, and out of the proceeds of such residue, he bequeaths 26 pecuniary legacies to 26 legatees, amounting to $114,000; and he charges on the same funds, such other legacies as he shall bequeath by any codicil; and gives the residue of the fund to residuary legatees; then, by codicils, he bequeaths other pecuniary legacies to amount of $47,550; as to one of the legatees mentioned in the will, he directs the legacy "to be paid as soon as possible, knowing the legatee is in need," and as to another, that it be paid, "if possible as soon as it may be convenient for the legatee to receive it;" by one codicil he "leaves it to the judgment of his ex'ors to begin paying the legacies to those legatees they "may think most in need;" and by another codicil, "he desires his ex'ors to use their best judgment in making sales of his real estate (on which the legacies are charged) without hurrying the sales, which might cause sacrifices, and be to the detriment of his residuary legatees, he thinking the chancery have no jurisdiction to enforce devises and bequests to religious societies and congregations. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Carskadon v. Torreyson, 17 W. Va. 83. But in Protestant Episcopal E. Soc. v. Churchman, 80 Va. 763, it is said, no decision in this state has gone to the unreasonable extent of holding that a charity for religious uses is for that reason void; even Gallego v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450, stops far short of deciding that. An examination of all the Virginia cases will show that whenever a charitable trust, though for religious uses, has been declared void, it has not been because religious in its character, but because it was too indefinite to be executed by the courts.

And in Protestant Episcopal E. Soc. v. Churchman, 80 Va. 718, the principal case is discussed on pp. 767, 769, 774, 776, 777, 780, and overruled, and the court approving the decision in Vidal v. Girard, 2 How. 127, holds that, at common law, courts of chancery had jurisdiction to enforce bequests for charitable uses, and the statute of 43 Elizabeth did not confer such jurisdiction, but only created an auxiliary remedy. Such statute was local, and never enforced here, but if it was general in its operation in some respects, it was not repealed by the act of 1792, but in those respects it was preserved by the saving clause of that act. In any event ch. 77, Code of 1873, clearly validates and makes enforceable all gifts for such purposes, subject to certain restrictions therein contained. Also, in Trustees v. Guthrie, 86 Va. 126, 10 S. E. Rep. 318, the principal case is discussed at pp. 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, and overruled, and the Churchman case followed. But in Fifield v. Van Wycke, 3 Va. Law Reg. 209, 94 Va. 657, the two preceding cases are overruled and Gallego v. Attorney General followed. In this case (Fifield v. Van Wycke) it is said, so much of the opinions in Episcopal Education Soc. v. Churchman, and Trustee v. Guthrie, as discussed the jurisdiction of courts of chancery over charities at common law, how far, if at all, 43 Elizabeth was in force in this state, and the decision of Gallego v. Attorney General, and the cases which followed it are recognized, and reiterated the principles of that case as to indefinite charities, except so far as they have been changed by the legislature, were wholly unnecessary to the decisions of those cases, and therefore must be regarded as mere obiter dicta and not binding upon the court, which is unwilling to hold that a line of decisions running back over a period of more than fifty years was thus overturned. If further changes are necessary or desirable upon the subject, the legislature, and not the courts, should make them.

In West Virginia the rule laid down in the principal case and those cases which follow it has been followed as will be seen from Bible Soc. v. Pendleton, 7 W. Va. 87, where it is held that, these indefinite charities, however it may be in other states, have in Virginia been held invalid at common law and since the repeal of the statute of 43 Elizabeth been held incapable of execution. The want of clearly recognized grantees or beneficiaries constitutes the indefinite character of these charities and renders them void at common law. This doctrine is clearly set forth by JUDGE TUCKER in Gallego v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450. To the same effect the principal case is cited in Knox v. Knox, 9 W. Va. 120, 142, 144, 145, 147, 149; Carskadon v. Torreyson, 17 W.

time unfavorable:" owing to depreciation of the property, the fund proves inadequate to pay the amount of the legacies charged thereon, without any fault of the ex'ors; the ex'ors, before any deficiency of the fund was apprehended, paid some of the legatees, whom they thought most in need, the whole amount of their legacies: Held.

Joseph Gallego, late of the city of Richmond, died in July 1818, seized and possessed of a large estate, real and personal: and by his last will and testament,—after bequeathing 50,000 dollars to his executors, John Richard and Peter J. Chevallie, in trust for certain relations in Spain; and devising and bequeathing to P. J. Chevallie a merchant manufacturing mill with its appurtenances, a lot in Richmond, all his slaves not otherwise disposed of, and 15,000 dollars, and after emancipating his slaves Rachel, Elsey and her daughter Cora, Nancy and her three children, and David, James, Aaron and Joe, and bequeathing to Rachel 2000 dollars, to Elsey, Nancy, Cora and Mary, 500 dollars, each, and to David, James, Aaron and Joe, 150 dollars each,—

In Morris v. Morris, 48 W. Va. 430, 37 S. E. Rep. 573, it is said, "I know that in the creation of a trust by will or deed the beneficiary must be a definite, certain, ascertainable person, natural or corporate; else the trust is not enforceable. Brown v. Caldwell, 23 W. Va. 187, 193; Association v. Hart, 4 Wheat. 1, 4 L. Ed. 499, cited in Pack v. Shanklin, 43 W. Va. 304, 27 S. E. Rep. 369; Gallego's Ex'rs v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh 455; Carskadon v. Torreyson, 17 W. Va. 43. But it does seem to me, as this bequest is not to the congregation, but to trustees appointed by the will, and the pastor of the Methodist Protestant Church at Morgantown is a church officer placed in charge and pastorate of a definite church by the legitimate authority of that church, such trustees could have no difficulty in ascertaining the beneficiary, because he is no other person than the incumbent of the position of pastor of that church." See 3 Va. Law Reg. 537.

Same—How Enforced.—To the point that the attorney general or one of the trustees may exhibit a bill asking the aid of a court of equity to compel the due execution of a trust, whether charitable or otherwise, the principal case is cited in Clark v. Churches—Incorporation.—In Powell v. Dawson, 45 W. Va. 783, 32 S. E. Rep. 216, the principal case is cited to the point that the incorporation of churches is contrary to the constitution of Virginia.

he devised and bequeathed all the residue of his estate, real and personal, not specifically disposed of by the will or any codicil thereto (this residue comprised far the greater part of the testator's estate, and consisted, chiefly, of real property in the city of Richmond) to his executors

Richard and Chevallie, upon trust to take possession of the moneys, to collect the debts due him, to sell the visible property of all kinds, and to apply the whole, as follows: To pay funeral expenses, and to pay themselves a commission of 6 per cent. for their trouble; and then to pay, 1. to Mrs. C. Currie, 2. to Mrs. M. A. Lambert, 3. to Mrs. J. M'Kenzie, 4. to Mrs. S. Gray, 5. to Mrs. C. Thornton, and 6. to Mrs. H. Reubell, a legacy of 8000 dollars, each; 7. to Mrs. S. Hancock, 8. to Miss J. Pascault, 9. to Miss E. E. Robert, 10. to Miss E. Lindaay, 11. to Miss Susan Duval, 12. to Mrs. M. C. Gilliat, and 13. to M. B. Poitiaux, 4000 dollars, each; 14. to Miss E. O'Donal, and 15. to Andrew Sweeny, 1000 dollars, each; 16. to J. R. G. Scott, 3000 dollars; 17. to Mrs. Fisher, 5000 dollars, "to be paid as soon as possible knowing she is in need;" 18. to Miss E. Gibbon, 19. to Miss M. Gibbon, 20. to Miss M. Pickett, 21. to Miss E. Pickett, 22. to Miss V. Pickett, 23. to Miss R. Dixon, and 24. to W. M'Kenzie for Rosalie Poe, 2000 dollars, each; 25. to the children of W. Conyers, 4000 dollars; 26. to the testator's brother Francisco, 10,000 dollars, to be paid him, "if possible, as soon as it may be convenient for him to receive the amount;" 27. to pay any legacies which should by any codicil be directed to be paid out of the residuary estate; and 28. to divide the residuum into six equal parts, and to pay one sixth part thereof to each of the five children (naming them) of the testator's sister Antonia, and the other sixth part to the two first born children of his brother Emanuel's daughter. And he added, "I am sorry it has not been in my power to be as generous to my friends mentioned in my will, as I should have wished, and to shew my regard and good wishes towards some others, as I had done in some former wills; but the distressed situation into which my relations in Spain have fallen of late, and a probability of a fall in the price of property, which will of course reduce the amount that my estate would have produced, compels me to refrain from doing more than what I have done, at least for the present—and should circumstances alter, and become more favourable, I shall not forget them."

453 *The will was dated the 13th May 1818, and the testator added eleven codicils to it, the last of which was dated the 28th June following.

1. By the first, he directed his executors, out of the general residue of his estate (on which the twenty-six pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the will, to Mrs. Currie and others, were charged), to pay his nephew Henry Grivegne, 10,000 dollars; which should not affect his rights as one of the residuary legatees. (This legatee was one of the children of the testator's sister Antonia.) And he added, "With respect to the legacies left by my foregoing will, or part of my residuary estate, I leave to the judgment of my executors, to begin paying those that they may think are more in need."

2. By the second codicil, he bequeathed (out of the same general residue of his estate) to P. J. Chevallie, 5000 dollars—to Mrs. Currie, Mrs. Lambert, Mrs. M'Kenzie, Mrs. Gray, Mrs. Thornton, Mrs. Reubell, and J. R. G. Scott, 2000 dollars, each—and Mrs. Hancock, Miss Pascault, Miss Robert, Miss Lindsay, Miss Duval, Mrs. Gilliat, and M. B. Poitiaux, 1000 dollars, each,—in addition to the legacies bequeathed to those legatees, respectively, by the will. He bequeathed, to Miss F. and Miss A. Leiper, 2000 dollars, each; and to J. Royle, 1500 dollars. And he directed his executors, "if the roman catholic chapel should be continued at the time of his death, to pay 1000 dollars towards its support; and if the roman catholic congregation should come to the determination to build a chapel in Richmond, to pay 3000 dollars towards its accomplishment."

3. By the third codicil, he desired his executors to pay Paul 50 dollars.

4. The fourth was in these words: "I desire my executors to use their best judgment in making the sales of my real estate, without hurrying the sales, which might create sacrifices, and be to the detriment of my residuary legatees—I think the time is unfavourable."

454 *5. By the fifth codicil, he bequeathed to his freed-woman Rachel, in addition to what he had given her by his will, 50 dollars per annum.

6. By the eighth, he emancipated his slave Jack, and bequeathed to him an annuity of 150 dollars for life.

7. By the tenth, he directed his executors to lay by 2000 dollars, to be distributed among needy, poor and respectable widows.

8. The eleventh codicil was in these words: "I direct that my lot of land in Richmond, number 630, shall be divided by an east and west line into two equal moieties; and I give and devise one of the said moieties to J. Richard, P. J. Chevallie, M. B. Poitiaux, and A. Lemosy, their heirs and assigns forever, (directing that they shall have choice of the said two moieties of the said lot of land); upon trust to permit all and every person and persons belonging to the roman catholic church as members thereof, or professing the roman catholic religion, and residing in the said city of Richmond at the time of my death, to build a church on the said moiety of the said lot of land, for the use of themselves, and of every other person and persons of that religion who may hereafter reside in the said city of Richmond."

The sixth, seventh and ninth codicils were specific bequests of wines, plate, furniture &c. to the testator's friends.

The preferred pecuniary legacies, bequeathed by the will, amounted to 69,600 dollars. The pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the will, and charged on the general residue of the estate, amounted to 114,000 dollars; and the legacies bequeathed by the codicils, charged on the same fund, amounted to 47,550 dollars, besides the annuities of 50 dollars bequeathed to the freed-woman Rachel, and of 150 dollars bequeathed to the freed-man Jack: so that the amount of the legacies charged on the general residue, exceeded 161,550 dollars.

455 *The attorney general exhibited a bill and information, against the executors, Richard and Chevallie, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, setting forth the bequests, contained in the second codicil, of 1000 dollars to the roman catholic chapel existing at the testator's death, and of 3000 dollars to aid the roman catholic congregation to build a chapel in Richmond—the devise contained in the eleventh codicil, of a moiety of the lot number 630, to Richard, Chevallie, Poitiaux and Lemosy, to hold in trust for the roman catholics residing in Richmond, to build a church on—and the bequest contained in the tenth codicil directing the executors to lay by 2000 dollars, to be distributed among needy and respectable widows: that the roman catholic congregation had determined to build a chapel in Richmond; and that he (the attorney general) had been applied to and requested by the president and trustees appointed by the roman catholic congregation in Richmond, to assert their claims to the benefit of the bequests and devise to their church: and praying a decree, declaring and enforcing the execution of the trust of the moiety of the lot number 630; directing the executors to pay the two legacies of 1000 and 3000 dollars to the president and trustees of the roman catholic congregation, or to such other trustees as the court should appoint, to be applied to the charitable uses to which the money was destined by the testator; directing the executors to pay to trustees to be appointed by the court, the 2000 dollars bequeathed to be distributed among needy and respectable widows; and directing the administration of this charity, according to the benevolent intentions of the testator,—and general relief.

And William Lambert and Mary Anne his wife, James Currie and Caroline his wife, M. W. Hancock and Sophia his wife, and Elizabeth Gibbon, also exhibited a bill against the executors, in the same court; praying that the executors should be compelled to render accounts of their testator's estate, and of their administration thereof; and a decree for the legacies bequeathed to Mrs. Lambert, Mrs. Currie, Mrs. Hancock and Miss E. Gibbon, respectively.

456 *The executors, in their answers to these bills, submitted the questions to the court, whether the roman catholic congregation, or the president and trustees it had appointed, or the attorney general for them, were entitled to demand and receive the legacies they claimed, and the execution of the trust as to the moiety of the lot number 630? and whether the bequest of 2000 dollars to be distributed among needy and respectable widows, could be enforced, and if so, to whom it should be paid, and how applied and administered? And they said, that they had paid such of the testator's debts as had been made known to them: and that, soon after the testator's death, believing (erroneously as they now feared) that his estate would be more than sufficient to satisfy not only all the preferred legacies amounting to 69,600 dollars, but all the pecuniary legacies charged by the will and codicils on the general residue, amounting in all to above 161,550 dollars,—they had proceeded to pay some of the legatees of the second class, the whole amount of their respective legacies, under circumstances that rendered it proper, in their opinion, that they should do so; but they now found, that the proceeds of the estate would fall far short of the amount of the pecuniary legacies of the second class; and they insisted, that the legatees whose legacies they had paid off in full, should be made parties defendants, in order that they might respectively be compelled to refund to the unsatisfied legatees, so much as had been paid them over and above their just rateable dividend. That their testator having cautioned them to use their best judgment in making sales of his real estate, without hurrying the sales, which might lead to sacrifices, and be detrimental to his residuary legatees, and real property having begun to depreciate about the time of his death (as he was aware) and still continuing to depreciate, they had forbore to make sale of the greater part of the property at the low prices of the times, hoping a more favourable period would arrive, and had applied the rents and profits as they accrued, to debts and legacies.

And that they still thought, that, if sales of the *subject should be precipitated, it would result in great loss to all the legatees.

In the progress of these suits, the executors, under orders of the court, rendered accounts, from time to time, before one of its commissioners, of all their transactions, and of the funds that came to their hands; and they proceeded, with all convenient despatch, to make sales of the real estate, the proceeds of which, as they were collected, were brought to the credit of the estate; and the accounts were reported to the court. It turned out, in the event, that the whole proceeds of the estate, after discharging the amount of the preferred legacies (69,600 dollars) sufficed to pay the legatees of the second class (those whose legacies were charged on the general residue by the will and codicil, amounting to 161,550 dollars) only a rateable dividend of fifty three cents eight mills in the dollar. It appeared, that the executors had paid to the following legatees, the full amount of their respective legacies; namely, Mrs. Fisher, Miss M. Gibbon, Miss Robert, W. M'Kenzie for Rosalie Poe, Miss Duval, Miss Pascault, Mrs. Reubell, and A. Sweeny. But the commissioner, without regard to the payments to these legatees of the full amount of their legacies, charged the executors, in account with the unsatisfied legatees, respectively, with the rateable dividends of the whole fund, 53 cents 8 mills in the dollar; placing the legacies to the charities on the same foot with the rest, that is, making them abate in proportion, and allowing them their rateable dividends; and ranking all the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the codicils, with the second class of pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the will.

The executors excepted to the report, 1. Because the commissioner had not given them credit for the full amount of their payments to Mrs. Fisher, Miss M. Gibbon, Miss Robert, Miss Poe, Miss Duval, Miss Pascault, Mrs. Reubell, and A. Sweeny; since, by the express terms of the will, the legacy to Mrs. Fisher was to be paid immediately, and it was the duty of the 458 executors to pay it, so soon as *funds sufficient came to their hands; as to the payment to Mrs. Reubell, it was effected by the application thereto of a debt due the estate, so doubtful, that perhaps, it could no otherwise have been made an available fund, and, in this instance, the executors took a refunding bond; and as to the others, the will gave the executors authority to judge of priority among the legatees; and the deficiency of the estate, which, at the time these payments were made, was thought equal to the payment of all the pecuniary legacies, having arisen from causes not foreseen, without any fault in the executors, who were instructed by the will not to hurry the sales, they ought not to bear the loss which the other legatees have sustained, but these should have recourse against the other legatees whose legacies had been satisfied in full, to compel them to refund what they had received over and above their just proportion. And 2. Because the legacies bequeathed by the codicils, were ranked with the legacies of the second class bequeathed by the will; whereas, they insisted those bequeathed by the will, were entitled to preference, and those given by the codicils could only rank on the surplus; for the legacies bequeathed by the codicils, were given by the testator, only because he supposed there would be a surplus after satisfying those given by the will, sufficient to pay them.

It was agreed, on all hands, that the testator, at the time of making his will and the codicils to it, supposed, and had good reason to suppose, that the general residue of his estate, upon which he charged the pecuniary legacies of the second class bequeathed by the will and codicils, was much more than sufficient to pay all those legacies, and that a large surplus would be left for his nephews and nieces, the residuary legatees; that, though the real estate in Richmond, had begun to depreciate before the testator's death, and afterwards continued to depreciate, yet the executors, when they paid Mrs. Fisher and the other seven legatees their legacies in full, supposed, and had good reason to suppose, that the fund would prove more than equal 459 to the payment *of all the legacies: that the depreciation, however, was greater, and continued longer, than any body anticipated, or could have foreseen: that the executors, in forbearing as they did, to make early sales of the real property, and waiting for a change in the state of the market, acted with perfect good faith, and though it turned out unfortunately, not imprudently; in short, that their conduct throughout, was faithful, just and blameless; and that the executors were entirely solvent, and able to make the amounts due, according to the commissioner's report, to all the legatees.

The chancellor declared, 1. That the bequests to the charities were good, but that they should abate in proportion, like the other pecuniary legacies of the second class; and that the devise of the moiety of the lot number 630, to trustees for the use of the roman catholic congregation, was also a good devise. 2. That the twenty-six pecuniary legacies of the second class, bequeathed by the will, and all the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the codicils, stood on the same foot, and ranked equally on the fund on which they were charged, and, in the case which had occurred, of a deficiency in the fund, should all abate proportionably. 3. That there was nothing in the will to justify the executors in paying the whole of any of these legacies to any of the legatees, to the prejudice of the others. And 4. that, the fund having eventually proved insufficient to pay all, the unpaid legatees were entitled to look to the executors themselves, for their rateable proportions of the fund, and could not be turned round to demand of the satisfied legatees, that they should refund the excess they had received above their just proportion. And made an interlocutory decree accordingly. The executors appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Stanard and Johnson, for the executors, by Daniel and Nicholas for the charities, and by Taylor and Leigh for the unsatisfied legatees.

The points debated, were—

460 *1. Whether the bequests of 1000 dollars for the support of the roman catholic chapel existing at the testator's death, of 3000 dollars to aid in building a chapel for the roman catholic congregation in Richmond, and of 2000 dollars to be distributed among needy and respectable widows, or either of them, were good and valid bequests? and whether the devise of the moiety of the lot number 630 to trustees for the use of the roman catholics, as a scite for a church, was a good devise?

II. Whether the legacies bequeathed by the will were preferable to those bequeathed by the codicil? if not, Whether the executors were warranted by the will, in paying any of the pecuniary legacies of the second class bequeathed by the will and codicils, in preference to the others? Whether they were not warranted at least in paying the legacy bequeathed to Mrs. Fisher, in full, as soon as sufficient funds came to their hands? Whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the unsatisfied legatees could have recourse against those whose legacies had been paid in full, to compel them to refund the excess paid them above their just proportion? And if they could, whether they ought not to have recourse and exhaust their remedy against 461 them, before they *could call upon the innocent executors to make good the loss?

CARR, J. This case involves several very important questions, which I shall consider in the order they were discussed at the bar.

First, then, as to the charities. The attorney general filed an information and bill, to have them applied to the objects for which they were bequeathed, and to enforce the execution of the trusts in respect to them; and the chancellor considering them good and valid, decreed them. It was contended in the argument that this decree was erroneous, because the devise and bequests were vague and indefinite, and therefore void. Let us examine this. The pecuniary legacies of 4000 dollars are, in effect, given to the roman catholic congregation, but for the building and support of a chapel; and the ground is given to trustees to permit the roman catholics to build a church on, for the use of themselves, and all persons of that religion, residing in Richmond. The bare statement seems sufficient to shew, that under the general rule, as applicable to ordinary legacies, these would be void. Who are the 462 beneficiaries? the *roman catholic congregation residing in Richmond. And who are they? Suppose you name them to-day: are those the same persons who constituted the congregation yesterday? Or who will constitute it to-morrow? Will none remove from, or come to Richmond, to reside? Will none be converted to or from the roman catholic religion? For it is to the roman catholic congregation for the time being, that the legacies are given. This however is a point which need not be pressed; for it was not pretended, that they could be supported, as legacies to individual persons. But it was strongly insisted, that as charitable legacies they were entitled to the aid and protection of a court of equity; and the practice of the english courts, in similar cases, was referred to in proof of the position. The course of decisions in England was admitted on the other side, but it was contended, that they rested intirely on the statute of charitable uses, 43 Eliz. and did not at all belong to the ordinary powers of a court of equity. This was the only serious question. I certainly shall not discuss it; for I find 'this completely done to my hand, by chief justice Marshall, in the case of The Baptist Association v. Hart's ex'ors. The cases cited and examined, and the reasons given by him, prove, conclusively to my mind, that in England, charitable bequests, where no legal interest is vested, and which are too vague to be claimed by those for whom the beneficial interest was intended, cannot be established by a court of equity, either exercising its ordinary jurisdiction, or enforcing the prerogative of the king as parens patriæ, independently of the statute 43 Elizabeth; and as that statute, if ever in force here, was repealed in 1792, I conclude that charitable bequests stand on the same footing with us, as all others, and will alike be sustained, or rejected, by courts of equity. I think the bill of the attorney general must be dismissed.

We come now to the other questions arising between some of the legatees and the executors. There can be no doubt; that the specific legacies are first to be delivered. 463 *Next in order, are the legacies of 50,000 dollars to the testator's spanish relations, 15,000 dollars to P. J. Chevallie, and the legacies given to the slaves emancipated by the will. The legacies of this class amount to 69,600 dollars. The testator, then, after directing all the residue of his estate to be converted into money, directs his executors to pay, out of it, his funeral expenses, and their own commission; then, twenty six legacies to as many legatees, amounting to 114,000 dollars, and all legacies which he should bequeath by codicil; and lastly, he creates another residuum, which he bequeaths to residuary legatees. Then come eleven codicils, giving pecuniary legacies to an amount exceeding 47,550 dollars. I think the twenty six legacies bequeathed by the will, out of the first general residue, and the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the codicils, stand all on the same footing. From the passage directing that Mrs. Fisher should be paid her legacy as soon as possible, knowing she was in need, and another in the first codicil, saying that as to the payment of the legacies left by his will, he directs his executors to begin to pay those that they think most in need, and a similar direction as to his brother Francisco's legacy, it was contended, that the testator meant to place Mrs. Fisher, and those who should be thought by the executors most needy, on higher ground than the other legatees, and to authorize the executors to pay them in preference to the others, in case of a deficiency: and this was said to be rendered more clear, by that clause in the fourth codicil, by which he "desires his executors to use their best judgment in making the sales of his real estate, and not to hurry them, as it might create sacrifices." But I do not think that the testator ever intended such preference, or dreamed of such deficiency. He believed that the fund would be abundant for all the legacies; and only feared, that to hurry the sales at an unfavourable time might injure his spanish relations, who were to have the residuum. He wished this residuum as large as possible, and therefore cautioned the executors; but he never thought about exclusive 464 *preferences among the second class of legatees. The executors however have gone on to pay some of the legatees intirely, others partially; and it is now discovered, that the fund will fall far short of paying all the claims upon it. In this state of things, the unsatisfied legatees insist, that the executors are liable to them, for their fair and equal proportion, of the whole fund; while the executors contend, that they must be credited by the full amount of all legacies, or parts of legacies paid, leaving the unpaid legatees to make those who have been overpaid, account to them for the excess. I have the fullest confidence, that the executors have proceeded honestly in this business; but, assuredly, most incautiously. They had the fund in their hands; the will for their guide; and the best counsel at their call: they could have secured themselves, either by paying pari passu, or by taking bonds to refund, or by bringing the whole affair under the control of the chancellor. The legatees could do nothing to prevent improper disbursements: their claim was against the executors alone; and they have made it by suit. Would it not now be most cruel injustice to tell them, the executors, to be sure, ought to have paid you your proportion of the fund; but they have, by mistake, paid it to other legatees; and your only remedy, now, is to seek them over the face of the earth, and call them to account? I can never agree to tell them so. I think it but simple justice to give them a decree against the executors for their fair proportion of the whole fund, and let the executors if they can (a question which I pass by, as it is not before us) recover from the over-paid legatees. It was also contended, that the defect of assets resulting from the general and rapid fall in the value of property, presents a case, where equity will relieve executors from the effects of what the law would call a devastavit: and the cases from 11 Vin. abr. 430, and 1 Chan. Ca. 190, are cited. In one, the property was consumed by the great fire in London; in the other, it was taken away by the restoration: these were cases in which no vigilance or prudence of 465 the executor *could have protected him. But the case before us is different; safety was perfectly in the executors' power.

CABELL, J. I concur in the opinion just delivered, and in the decree which is to be entered; but, so far as it charges the executors, I own, with much reluctance. For I am quite sure, that they have acted with the utmost good faith, and that they were betrayed into the excess of payments to some of the legatees, over and above their just proportion, by a delusion as to the value of the subject on which the legacies were charged, not peculiar to themselves, but as universal at the time, as it has proved to have been great.

TUCKER, P. It cannot be denied, that the principal question in this case, is one of the deepest interest and importance. It is worthy of the diligent research and great ability which have been devoted to the discussion of it, and will justify the enlarged view which may be found necessary in the decision: I mean the question as to the charities. *

It is contended, on the one hand, that these several bequests are void and ineffectual, for uncertainty as to the beneficiaries who are to take under them: and, on the other, that they are good as bequests to charitable purposes, which the law will support, and which the court of chancery, upon the general principles of its equitable jurisdiction, will enforce at the instance of the attorney general.

There is no principle supposed to be more perfectly settled in reference to conveyances, than that every deed must have sufficient certainty as to the grantee who is to take under it. If there be such uncertainty as to the grantee, that it cannot be known distinctly who is to take by the grant, it is ipso facto void, for that uncertainty. This, it would seem to me, was not merely a principle of common law, but the dictate of common sense; and hence this defect is equally fatal, whoever may be the grantor; for it is a defect, not of power in him, but growing out of the utter impossibility of effectuating the grant, by reason of 466 the undefined *character of the grantee. The absurdity of such a grant cannot be better exposed, than by an attention to its operation in this very case, if it could be supposed to be valid. It is obvious, that the bequest here, though for building a church, is a bequest to the roman catholic congregation in Richmond; and it is equally obvious that the testator designed no individual benefit to the members of that congregation: yet, as the society or congregation is not incorporated, it may well be asked, who are to be regarded as the beneficiaries entitled to the advantage of this bequest? Who can present himself as a claimant of this aid designed for the roman catholic religion? If membership of the congregation is to be the test of right, then the title will be in a continual state of flux. What belongs to A. today, will by his removal from Richmond, or apostasy from the church, cease to be his tomorrow; whereas B. by removal to the city, or conversion to the church, might, by the converse of the principle, acquire tomorrow, a right which he has not today. Moreover, who would be the legally constituted triers of the fact of conversion or apostasy, whereby one man is to gain, or another is to lose, the interest in the property? Who, indeed, constitute the society? Whom does the law recognize, or the testator designate, as having the power to decide this essential question? Are all who have been baptized in the church, within the operation of the will? or those only who are received as partakers of its most solemn ordinances? These, and a multitude of like difficulties, present themselves to the notion of any grant or conveyance to a religious society, or to trustees for their use. For, in the eye of the law, the intervention of a trustee does not remove a single difficulty. There is not more necessity for a properly defined grantee, in a deed, than for a cestui que trust capable of taking, and so defined and pointed out, that the trust will not be void for uncertainty. In short, there cannot be a trust without a cestui que trust; and if it cannot be ascertained who the cestui que trust is, it is the same thing as if there was none.

467 *These principles, it is confidently believed, are the general principles of the common law upon this subject. If there are exceptions to these principles, those exceptions may without doubt be shewn. A diligent search has led me to the conviction, that there was no case at common law, in which a bequest or a trust of this indefinite character, could be supported; and the learned counsel on both sides, have acknowledged, that they have been unable to discover any case anterior to the statute 43 Elizabeth, in which the validity of such bequests or trusts has been distinctly recognized by the courts. It ought, therefore, perhaps, to suffice to rest the argument here; since, if under the general principle the bequest would be void, it is incumbent upon those who claim to be protected by an exception, to establish that exception. Accordingly, it is contended, that gifts for charitable uses, furnish an exception: and when it is answered, that indefinite charities received their whole force and efficacy from the statute 43 Elizabeth, it is confidently replied, that charities existed, and were recognized by law, anterior to that statute; that the statute itself affords evidence of the fact; that it ought not to be regarded as an enabling statute, or as creative of an original power not before existing, but as affording new and additional facilities for the administration of charities of a particular description. It is, indeed, further contended, that, by the common law, the king, as parens patriæ, had the general superintendence of all charities, which he exercised by the keeper of his conscience the lord chancellor; that, whenever it was necessary, the attorney general, at the relation of some informant,* filed an information in the court of chancery, to have the charity established; that the exercise of this jurisdiction by that court, was by virtue of its general judicial functions, and of its extraordinary equitable jurisdiction, which has been transferred to the courts of equity in Virginia; that this authority, 468 *of the king, as parens patriæ, is inherent in all governments, and therefore vested in this; that it embraces the protection of infants, lunatics and idiots, and the execution of charities; and that this inherent authority is devolved upon the courts of chancery in Virginia, the nature of whose jurisdiction and powers are peculiarly adapted to its judicious and faithful exercise. In this general, and, I own, very imperfect view of the outlines of the argument for the charities, it is sufficiently obvious that there are many grave and important questions involved. A hasty review of some of them, however, must suffice here.

That charitable gifts were known and recognized by the law anterior to the statute of Elizabeth, it is not necessary to deny. It is not doubted, that many charitable gifts were so known and recognized. Charitable gifts for meritorious purposes, not within the statutes of mortmain, were doubtless held good and enforced, where the beneficiary or grantee was a person, whether natural or artificial, capable to take. Thus, a bequest to a corporation capable to take, is and always was valid as a charitable gift. So, in England, a bequest to the church of such a parish, was a good bequest to the parson and his successors; because the parson is a corporation sole, capable to take. But it behoves those who contend for the existence of an exception to the general rule, which reprobates indefinite bequests, to shew, that indefinite charities as well as those where the beneficiary was certain and defined, were sustained anterior to the statute 43 Elizabeth. To do this, resort is had to the language of the statute itself. From that language I draw the opposite inference; the grounds of which I shall presently state. At present, I will remark, that various dicta have been quoted, in which very conflicting opinions have been expressed, as to the existence of recognized charities of this description, anterior to the statute of charitable uses. Among these dicta, stands, I think, pre-eminent, the opinion of chief justice Marshall, in the case of The Baptist association v. Hart's ex'ors. That opinion is 469 entitled to no less weight *than the great authorities of lord keeper Henley and lord Macclesfield, if we look to the intelligence of the source from which it flowed; and to much greater, when it is remarked, that their opinions were incidentally expressed, upon a matter of no consequence in the english tribunals, but vital to the question which was so ably investigated by the chief justice. No opinion can be more entitled to the respect and consideration of this court. It is not indeed authoritative, whether it was strictly upon the point on which that case ultimately turned, or not. And even though it were extrajudicial, yet it was so carefully weighed, and so cautiously made up, as to entitle it to much more consideration than many a decision hastily pronounced upon the very matter in question. I do not, however, consider it as extrajudicial. The question discussed fairly arose, and was properly decided, after having been laboriously examined; and the case is conclusive of this, so far as any decision of that tribunal can influence a decision here. The devise was not more indefinite than this devise; it was, like this, for religious purposes; and it was pronounced void for its uncertainty. I refer to it, therefore, as presenting a much stronger argument than any I can offer, in support of the position, that these indefinite bequests for charitable purposes, could only be sustained under the statute 43 Elizabeth. Let us, however, look to the language of that statute ourselves, and see what inference is fairly to be deduced from it.

It recites, that "Whereas lands, tenements, rents, annuities, profits, hereditaments, goods, chattels, money, and stocks of money, have been heretofore given, limited, appointed, and assigned, as well by the queen's most excellent majesty, and her most noble progenitors, as by sundry other well disposed persons; some for relief of aged, impotent and poor people; some for maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners, schools of learning, free schools and scholars in universities; some for repair of bridges, ports, havens, causeways, churches, sea banks, and highways; some *for education and preferment of orphans; some for or towards relief, stock or maintenance, for houses of correction; some for marriages of poor maids; some for supportation, aid and helps of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen, and persons decayed; and others for relief or redemption of prisoners or captives, and for aid or ease of any poor inhabitants, concerning payments of fifteens, setting out of soldiers, and other taxes; which lands, tenements, rents, annuities, profits, hereditaments, goods, chattels, money and stocks of money, nevertheless, have not been employed according to the charitable intent of the givers and founders thereof, by reason of frauds, breaches of trust and negligence, in those that should pay, deliver and employ the same; for redress and remedy whereof, Be it enacted" &c. It would seem, then, that previous to this statute, there had been various instances of charitable donations, which had not been carried into execution, by reason of the frauds, breaches of trust and negligence, of the trustees. And this being the evil, what was the remedy to be applied? That depended precisely upon the state of the law and jurisprudence of the country at the time. If the law had provided a remedy for the evil; if there was a tribunal open to the injured for their redress; if, as is clear, all beneficiaries whose interest was definite and certain, might enforce their own rights before the ordinary tribunals; and if, as is supposed, in the case of vague and uncertain charities, the king, as parens patriæ, was bound to interfere, through his attorney general, for their protection; then, the defect was not in the law, but in the execution of the law. Instead of passing a new law, constituting a new tribunal, to enforce what the ordinary tribunals were fully adequate to enforce, if such vague legacies were good at all, all that was necessary, was, to stimulate the diligence of the attorney general, and other officers of the crown, to enforce these charities, in the manner now pursued in the chancery of England. This must be particularly obvious in relation to the queen's own charities, which, like others, were negligently 471 and fraudulently administered. *To suppose that the queen's own charities would not have been enforced, if the doors of her own chancery were open to enforce such charities as these, would be, I think, a groundless conjecture. It is far more reasonable to conclude, that, as these vague dispositions were certainly against the general principles of the common law, this new statute was enacted for the purpose of giving them validity, and enforcing them, by a scheme, clumsy enough, it must be admitted, and therefore affording strong evidence that the commodious remedy in equity was unknown, but yet obviously designed for that purpose, as I shall presently shew.

But though we cannot account for the statute of charitable uses, upon the supposition, that there was a remedy for indefinite charities, yet is the statute very easily explained upon the contrary supposition. The common law, whose system of rules was often technical and unbending, recognized the validity of no gift or bequest, where the beneficiary was not ascertained, and could not be ascertained by any thing upon the face of the instrument itself. Yet, in process of time, the impulses of charity, the spirit of superstition, a devoted zeal for the public interests, and the pride of adding one's name as patron to great public institutions, doubtless gave rise to many attempts to convey or settle estates to such purposes. The character of queen Elizabeth very naturally impelled her to build up and sustain these benevolent establishments of the well disposed, how uncongenial soever they might be to the rules of the common law. But this rule of the common law was founded on the intrinsic difficulty, that, as the grantee or beneficiary was uncertain, it was impossible that any person could present himself in a court of justice, upon the ordinary principles of the common law, with any claims to the execution of the charity in his behalf. This was the mischief. The remedy was, to create a commission whose duty it should be "to inquire, as well by the oaths of twelve lawful men as by all other lawful ways and means, of all such gifts, limitations, appointments &c. and of the abuses, 472 breaches of *trusts, negligences &c. in respect to them;" "and upon such inquiry, hearing and examination thereof, to set down [i. e. make] such orders, judgments and decrees, as that the said lands &c. may be duly and faithfully employed, to and for such of the charitable uses, and intents (before rehearsed) for which they were given." These commissioners published a general notice to the parish, calling upon all persons grieved to come forward with their complaints; and, under their very general powers, they heard the complaint of any person coming within the description of the beneficiaries however general; Duke, p. 10. They then issued a writ to the sheriff, commanding him to summon a jury, who made an inquest finding the facts. The party interested was summoned and heard; and then the commissioners decreed. They had power to remedy the defects of assurances, and where they were uncertain, to give them certainty, as far as possible; Id. 28, 109, 113, 114. Even where void at law, they could make them good; Id. 78, 79, 80, 81, 119. And when the objects were general, they decreed feoffments and other assurances to be made, and renewed from time to time, to keep up the number of feoffees for the charitable use;

Id. 63, 67. By these proceedings, the two obstacles to the execution of these charities, were removed—1. The want of a certain beneficiary, who might call upon the trustees to fulfil the trust, was remedied by appointing as many several commissioners throughout the kingdom, as the chancellor of England, or the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, might think necessary, in their respective jurisdictions, whose ex officio duty it should be to inquire into such breaches of trust. 2. After inquiry, the respective commissions were authorized "to make such orders, judgments and decrees as that the said lands may be duly and faithfully employed" &c. This clause without question gave, and was intended to give, a full power to the commissioners (subject to the correction) of the chancellor, to render that certain by their orders and decrees, which before was indefinite and vague. It clothed them with author- 473 ity to give *the direction to the charity of the donor; to fix upon and prescribe the course of its administration; to compel its execution in favour of the object jointed out, if one was so designated, though still too vague to be held good at common law; and, where no object was distinctly declared, to make such a scheme of the charity, as might be nearest the avowed wishes of the donor or testator. In this clause, as interpreted, we find, I think, the germ of the principle of administering charities cy pres, and, indeed, of the various other principles now prevailing in the courts; principles (particularly the cy pres principle) which are utterly without foundation in reason or justice, unless they can be traced to some imperative command, or ample authority conferred by parliament itself. Does it not strike the most common understanding as an invasion of right, to give an estate which is devised to a Roman Catholic charity, to a charity of the church of England, on the principle, that the first was void at law, and the next is cy pres the testator's intention, when nothing in the world could have been farther from his intention? In the case for instance, of the Attorney General v. Baxter, 1 Vern. 248, A. by will, gave £600. to Mr. Baxter, to be distributed among sixty ejected ministers, and £20. to be laid out in his book, entitled Baxter's Call to the unconverted. He and the sixty poor ejected ministers were non-conformists, and for that reason, most probably, the objects of the testator's bounty. Yet, because they were non-conformists, the use was declared void as to them; but it was said, that the money being given for religious charity, must be disposed of in charity, and that this being intended for ejected ministers, ought to go amongst the clergy; whereupon it was decreed to go to maintain a chaplain (a conformist) in Chelsea hospital. And this upon the doctrine of cy pres, though it is obvious that the non-conforming testator never could have intended such a disposition of his estate. Though this decision was reversed, it shews the spirit in which the statute was administered. Such extravagant pretensions in the courts, 474 can only be accounted for *upon the idea already suggested, that the broad powers conferred by the statute of Elizabeth, laid the foundation of this jurisdiction, which otherwise would have been an unauthorized invasion of private right.

Before I pass from these views of the subject, it may be proper to remark, as the foundation for a conclusion hereafter to be drawn, that the broad and comprehensive language of this statute, gives reason to believe, that, if there was any common law doctrine about indefinite charities, that doctrine was completely covered by the provisions of the statute. For, it was not a mere act organizing an inquisitorial commission, but its provisions were construed, and rightly construed, to give validity to charitable bequests, which were held void at the common law. 1 Ch. Ca. 134, 195; Hob. 136; Finch, 221; Ch. Ca. 267.

Having thus deduced from the statute of charitable uses, that before its enactment, indefinite legacies were not considered as susceptible of being enforced, though for charitable objects, it may next be observed, that the scanty cases to be found in the early reporters, afford no ground for a contrary opinion. It is obvious, indeed, from Porter's case, 1 Co. 23, that the ingenuity of professional men had been taxed to invent some mode of making good these charitable bequests. In that case, Gibbon devised real estate to his wife, upon condition that she should grant it for the maintenance of a free school and of certain alms-men and women. Instead of so applying it, she leased it for forty years. The heir entered for the condition broken, and conveyed to the queen. The court was of opinion, that the condition was broken, and the entry of the heir lawful. Here, then, seems to have been a case as late as the 34th of Elizabeth, in which, instead of seeking to enforce his charitable trust, by a bill in chancery at the instance of the attorney general, the awkward expedient was resorted to, of conveying to the queen, who, I presume, was to see to the distribution of the charity. For, it is justly remarked by chief justice Marshall, that, in that case, "no question arose concerning *the possibility of enforcing the execution of the trust. It was not forbidden by law, and therefore the trustees might execute it. On failing so to do, the condition was broken, and the heir might enter; but it is not suggested, that the cestui que trust had any remedy." After the entry of the heir, there was clearly none; for the entry for the condition broken, utterly defeated the estate; and the trust which grew out of it, if it was ever available, was defeated also. "In the argument of Porter's case" (says the chief justice) "the only mode suggested for insuring the school the benefit intended, was by an act of incorporation and a letter of licence." And I intirely concur with him in the opinion, that upon reading this case, which was conducted by lord Coke and other able counsel, it is impossible to resist the conviction, that the court of chancery had not, at that time, the power to afford a remedy for such indefinite trusts. It was, indeed, impossible it should. There was no individual beneficiary, who could have presented himself before the court, and identified himself as the person intended to take under the will. Nor could the attorney general, at that day, have instituted proceedings for the purpose of enforcing the charity; for not only is there no instance of any such proceeding, I think, but, even after the statute, it was held that no bill could be filed by the attorney general at the relation of an individual, unless for a charity under the statute; 2 Vern. 387. If, then, no individual could sue, claiming to be the identical beneficiary, and if the attorney general could not sue by relation, it is difficult to imagine what suit could have been instituted, before the statute, to enforce the charity. Indeed, from a view of all the cases, I incline to think that the agency of the attorney general arose after the statute. Certain it is I can find no information anterior to it.

Upon the whole, I am well satisfied, that the whole of the doctrine of the english courts in reference to indefinite charities, springs from the statute of 43 Elizabeth, which is not in force in Virginia.

476 Whether that statute ever was in force here, has been made a question in the cause. I incline to think it may have been, at least according to the construction which was given to it, and which considered it not as merely constituting a commission for inquiring into breaches of charitable trusts, but as greatly enlarging, if not as opening an intirely new field for the exercise of benevolence. Though local in its provisions in some respects, it was general in its operation in others. If it ever was in force, however, it was repealed in the year 1792, in the general repeal of english statutes. That repeal was no rash or unadvised act. By an act of the session of 1789, ch. 9, followed by the act of 1790, ch. 20, a commission, consisting of six gentlemen of the most distinguished acquirements, was appointed, whose duty was, among other things, "to prepare bills upon the subject of such english statutes, if any there were, which were suited to this commonwealth, and had not been enacted in the form of Virginia laws." The committee of revisors proceeded to the discharge of the duty confided to it, and the result was the act of 1792, by which all english statutes then in force, were declared to be repealed; the legislature reciting that, at that session, it had specially enacted such of them as appeared worthy of adoption. The repeal of this statute must, therefore, be looked upon as an advised act of legislation, and in the same light as if it had been specially repealed by its title.

I have already taken occasion to remark, that, if there were any recognized charities of an indefinite character at common law, the broad language of the statute of Elizabeth comprehended them. In so far as it did comprehend them, it reduced only to the form of a statute, what was law before the statute; and our legislature, in repealing it, must be regarded as having repealed not its mere naked words, but the principle which they involved. Although, therefore, it should be admitted that certain indefinite charities were recognized at common law, yet as the statute also comprehended them, and was itself repealed, the common law was repealed eodem flatu with the statute. In this aspect of the *case, it is unnecessary to decide, whether, if an english statute prior to the 4 James I. which repealed the common law, be itself repealed, the common law is thereby revived; notwithstanding the provision 1 Rev. Code, ch. 41, § 2, and notwithstanding the common law principle so repealed, was not at the settlement of the colony, nor ever since, the law of Virginia.

If I have been correct in this course of argument, there can be no pretence for the enforcing of the charities under this will of Mr. Gallego, as they were void at common law, and are not entitled to the protection of the statute of the 43 Elizabeth. Be this as it may, I must have argued to little purpose, and chief justice Marshall must for once have been also singularly unfortunate, if what has been said has not at least shewn, that it is a matter of very serious doubt, whether the power to enforce charities ever did exist independent of the statute. If it be a matter even of doubt, to what conclusion must we come? I am deliberately of opinion, that in that case, a just respect to the policy of the legislature, in relation to religious charities especially; a prudent caution on our part, in assuming doubtful powers; a due sense of the infinite difficulty and embarrassment, which must attend the search after the common law doctrines anterior to the statute of Elizabeth; and a just view of the danger of reviving those obsolete doctrines;—must determine us to leave the subject to the wisdom of the legislature itself. A few remarks on these topics, will close this part of my opinion.

No man at all acquainted with the course of legislation in Virginia, can doubt, for a moment, decided hostility of the legislative power to religious incorporations. Its jealousy of the possible interference of religious establishments in matters of government, if they were permitted to accumulate large possessions, as the church has been prone to do elsewhere, is doubtless at the bottom of this feeling. The legislature knows, as was remarked by the counsel, that wealth is power. Hence, the provision in the bill of rights;

478 *hence, the solemn protest of the act on the subject of religious freedom; hence, the repeal of the act incorporating the episcopal church, and of that other act which invested the trustees appointed by religious societies with power to manage their property: hence too, in part, the law for the sale of the glebe lands: hence the tenacity with which applications for permission to take property in a corporate character (even the necessary ground for churches and graveyards) have been refused. The legislature seems to have been fearful, that the grant of any privilege, however trivial, might serve but as an entering wedge to greater demands. Nor did this apprehension of the dangers of ecclesiastical establishments, spring up for the first time with our republication institutions. The history of ages had attested the prones of such establishments to vast accumulations of property, and the statute book of England is loaded with statutes of mortmain, which were rendered necessary by the rapacity of the clergy, at least in the early periods of the church. So long as there have been church establishments, with power to receive and accumulate property, so long has the tendency to such accumulation been manifested distinctly. The history of the papal see, and of the religious houses under its dominion, is but a history of the cupidity of monks and devotees, veiled under the sacred garb of our holy religion. The vast domains of the clergy acquired by the catholic establishment of France, are known to us all. From this fatal source, among others, sprung a revolution, which deluged the fairest country in Europe in blood, and, in its horrible progress, spread desolation over adjoining states, and shook the civilized world to its centre. And in protestant England, fenced around as it has been with mortmain acts, we see a church establishment possessed of over-grown wealth and power, less devoted to the cause of genuine religion, than to pamper the luxury and indolence of the high dignitaries of the church. With these examples before our eyes, it is not wonderful that our statesmen have been cautious.

They have been wise in their caution. 479 The *evil has not sprung from particular creeds, or the peculiarities of a confession of faith. It grows out of the very nature of the thing. The church, if made capable to take, while it is continually acquiring, from the liberality of the pious, or the fears of the timid, or the credulity of the ignorant, never can part with any thing; and thus, like those sustaining powers in mechanics, which retain whatever they once have gained, it advances with a step that never retrogrades. The natural cupidity of the human heart, is watched by the devotee himself, with the less jealousy in his pursuit after acquisitions for the church, since he believes it to be purified from the dross of selfishness, and sanctified by the holy object of his ambition. Thus it is, that however humble in its beginning, accumulation is the natural result of the power vested in any religious society to acquire property. The same influence which enables it to gain from the state its first insignificant privileges, will secure to it, from time to time, new though apparently inconsiderable accessions; until, at last, the power will be acquired which legislative jealousy has apprehended. Property, indeed, it need not ask of the legislature. The power to take and accumulate, alone, is necessary: all time has shewn, that the influence of feelings of devotion will do the rest. I speak of those feelings which exist without any undue influence from the pastor of the society. But, if we go farther, and suppose it possible, that those abuses which once have existed, may exist again, the progress will be more rapid, though not more certain. "What (says the accomplished sir Samuel Romilly) is the authority of a guardian, or even of a parent, compared with the power of religious impressions under the ascendancy of a spiritual adviser, with such an engine to work upon the passions; to inspire (as the object may be best promoted) despair or confidence; to alarm the conscience by the horrors of eternal misery, or support the drooping spirits, by unfolding the prospect of happiness which is never to end."

480 *Such, I conceive, are the general grounds, upon which rests the legislative policy, in relation to the power of acquiring and holding property by religious societies. We have seen, too, a similar policy evinced as to charities generally, in striking at the root of them all, by the repeal of the statute of Elizabeth. It is not (to use the language of one of the counsel) that charity is banished from Virginia. Its benign and salutary influence may warm and animate every heart, and lead to a generous munificence, as the daily habit of our lives, without exposing the state to the evils which have always flowed from what are called conveyances in mortmain. It is not necessary here to detail those evils. But it is relevant to observe, that conveyances in mortmain to corporations, were not more calculated to produce a pernicious locking up of property, than charitable bequests of this indefinite character. A corporation may be dissolved, and the property may be again taken up into the general circulation, by reverting to the donor. But these charities never die. There is no means of putting an end to them in the lapse of ages; for according to this celebrated doctrine of cy pres, if the original object should fail, the attorney general and the master in chancery go to work to digest another scheme, cy pres the original intention of the donor. Such was the case with the charity to William & Mary college. Experience justified these complaints, and accordingly about one hundred years ago, the parliament of G. Britain found itself compelled to pass the statute 9 George 2, which, in important particulars, repeals the statute of 43 Elizabeth. It is at this moment, when the country whose laws we have adopted, has partly receded from the wretched policy of permitting the whole property of society to be swallowed up in the insatiable gulph of public charities, that we are called upon to reanimate the pernicious principle, which they now deprecate, and which with us has been sleeping in inaction, for nearly two centuries and an half. And this too, when we have put off the panoply of the mortmain acts, by the general repeal of 481 them in 1792. *It is said, indeed, that the legislature may pass the necessary laws for regulating these charitable gifts, and thus prevent the evils that might flow from the unlimited permission of them. But I think, under the existing doubts which hang around the subject, and after the lapse of centuries, during which the law respecting charities, if it ever existed here, has been silent and quiescent, it behoves the judiciary to leave to the legislature, the duty of waking it into life.

This leads me to remark, lastly, that the occasion calls for a prudent caution on the part of the judiciary in the assumption of this jurisdiction. We have already seen, that no cases are to be found, no guide is afforded, as to the course pursued by courts of equity in respect. to charities antierour to the statute of Elizabeth, if they ever took cognizance of them. But it is said, that the king as parens patriæ, from the earliest times had the power to superintend and enforce charities: that this power was exercised by him through the lord chancellor, the keeper of his conscience: that it was so exercised, not under a specially delegated authority, but by virtue of his general judicial functions or extraordinary jurisdiction in matters of equity: that this authority of the parens patriæ is inherent in all governments, and therefore in this; and is devolved upon the court of chancery, here, whose jurisdiction is general over all matters in chancery, and is peculiarly adapted to the judicious administration of the law of charities. I shall content myself with referring to the conclusive argument of the chief justice, 4 Wheat. 47, for the position, that the jurisdiction of the chancellor of England over charities, is a branch of the prerogative, and not a part of the ordinary powers of the chancery court, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction. The authorities to which he refers are entirely satisfactory upon the point. If this be so, it is sufficiently obvious, that the act which established the court of chancery in Virginia, cannot have transferred to that court this branch of the prerogative. The powers conferred by that act are judicial in their character, and not such

482 as belonged *to the chancellor of England, as the keeper of the conscience of the king, as representing his person, and administering, as his agent, his prerogatives and duties. Admitting then, as we well may, the superintending power of the crown, as parens patriæ, over charities, and admitting that this power is inherent in the sovereignty, I will ask upon what ground shall we arrogate it to the judicial branch of the government? That there inheres in every sovereign power, a right and a duty to protect those who have no other protector, as infants and lunatics, cannot be denied: and that there is an inherent power also in the sovereign, to declare that vague and indefinite charities shall be administered, if, in its wisdom, it shall so decree, is equally undeniable. But it remains to be proved, that this power is judicial, and not legislative: it remains to be proved, that the flowers of royal prerogative, which have fallen from the crown of England, have devolved upon the chancellors here. In this government of prescribed and limited powers, no public functionary, no organ of the sovereign power, no department, can assume a power which is not to be found in the law or the constitution. They constitute the commission under which alone authority can be duly exercised. It was in this view, very truly said, that this branch of the royal prerogative, if it had not been withered by the repeal of the statute, would have devolved upon the legislature. That body is the parens patriæ, under our system, and it would have remained for it to point out the organ which should administer its important function. My own opinion is, decidedly, that it does not now belong to the judiciary, even if it has existence any where in relation to charities. They must first be established, to call this guardian power into existence; and I have endeavoured to shew, that there is nothing, now recognized by law in relation to charities, upon which it can operate; for definite charities are but trusts which equity will execute by virtue of its ordinary jurisdiction, and with which, even in England, the attorney general cannot interfere; and indefinite charities are not recognized 483 by law, *and cannot therefore be enforced, either with or without his aid.

The result of this view of the subject is, that the interlocutory order of the chancellor must be reversed, and the bill of the attorney general dismissed.

It is now necessary to advert to the other questions arising in these cases. The chancellor held, 1. that the twenty-six enumerated legacies in the will, and the pecuniary legacies in the several codicils, stood upon the same footing, and in case of deficiency should abate in proportion: and 2. that there was nothing in the will to justify the executors, in paying the whole of any of these legacies to any legatee, to the prejudice of other legatees; and the estate having eventually proved insufficient to pay all, the unpaid legatees are entitled to resort to the executors themselves for their due proportions, and cannot be turned round to demand from the other legatees to refund. Upon these points I concur with the chancellor.

1. As to the first: general or pecuniary legacies must always abate proportionably. The testator, it is true, may arrange this matter otherwise at his pleasure; for cujus est dare, jus est disponere. But the order in which legacies are given, affords no evidence of this intention: for, even where the testator intends a perfect equality, some must be given first and some last. Hence the court has, generally, declined laying weight on particular words, as the saying, imprimis, or in the first place, or on a direction as to the time of payment. If it did not, there would be no end to claims of preference, considering the variety of expression, and the incorrectness with which wills are frequently drawn. 2 Ves. 421; 1 Vern. 31.

When, however, a testator creates two residuums of his estate, or in other words, residuum upon residuum; the first to be computed after taking out certain specified legacies; the other to be computed after taking out another set of legacies; the intention of the testator is very clearly shewn, to create different grades in 484 his benefactions. As in this *case: the legacy of 50,000 dollars in trust for his spanish relations and the 15,000 dollars to P. J. Chevallie, and the legacies in the will to the manumitted slaves, making a sum total of 69,600 dollars, are clearly to be preferred to the other pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the will, and to the various pecuniary legacies in the codicils; while all these in their turn have preference to those who are to take the last residuum. The case of Lewin v. Lewin, 2 Ves. 415, is in this respect like this, and the explanation of it by lord Hardwicke, 2 Ves. 420, in the case of Blower v. Morret, is very applicable.

There is nothing I think in this will to shew, that any of this second class of legatees have preference over others. It was argued, that Mrs. Fisher had preference, not only in point of time, but in point of right; but I do not think the proposition was zealously supported; and it certainly cannot be maintained. The benevolent designs of the testator, in favour of Mrs. Fisher, are indeed very strongly marked; but it cannot be supposed, that, if he had been asked the question, whether, if there was only enough to pay 5000 dollars, she should have the whole, to the exclusion of all the rest of his friends, he would have replied affirmatively. The rule of law, however, requires a proportional abatement in all, instead of a rejection of any; and it is founded, in part perhaps, in the presumption, that, if a testator could foresee that there would not be enough, to pay all his pecuniary legatees, the full amount of what he had given, he would rather have reduced their legacies in equal proportions, than have stricken out any one of them altogether. As to the legacies in the codicils, they certainly stand upon the same footing, by the express arrangement of the will, and upon general and established principles. 2 P. Wms. 24.

2. As to the second point: no blame was imputable, or imputed, to the executors, for postponing as they did, the sales of the testator's real estate. They acted fairly and honestly. But the executors
485 having imprudently (for it is *not pretended they have acted unfairly) paid to various legatees of the second class, the full amount bequeathed to them, and the fund having proved deficient, so that there must be a general abatement among them, two questions arise: 1. To whom are the unpaid legatees to look for their legacies? And 2. are those who have been paid liable to refund at all?

As to the first, I can have no doubt. They have to look to the executors, and to them alone, as they are solvent. If, indeed, they were insolvent, then they might, or might not, have a title to redress from the over-paid legatees, according to the principles which will be presently referred to. But the executors being solvent, there is no pretence for saying, that instead of looking to them, to whom the administration of the fund has been entrusted by the testator and by the law, they must look to those, to whom they have unadvisedly paid it away.

That upon general principles, the legatee has a right to demand payment of his legacy from the executor himself, instead of being turned over to compel legatees to refund who have been paid too much, cannot be denied. It would be a waste of time to cite authority, or to offer reasons, for such a principle. The argument indeed has rather tended to admit it, but to insist upon an exception, arising out of the particular provisions of this will. These provisions bar, the direction "to pay Mrs. Fisher her 5000 dollars, as soon as possible, knowing she is in need," and this clause; "with respect to the payment of the different legacies left by my foregoing will or part of my residuary estate, I leave to the judgment of my executors to begin paying those that they may think are most in need." It is contended, that these clauses justified prompt payment, if the assets were adequate; that the assets were deemed adequate; and that an unforeseen depreciation has occasioned the existing inadequacy.

The cases cited in which executors have been relieved against the charge of devasting, on the ground of the reduction 486 *of the assets by unforeseen accidents, are not to be questioned. The executor who pays simple contract debts when there were abundant assets, and those assets have been reduced by a general and destructive fire, or by eviction by title paramount which could not be foreseen, is surely entitled to relief. 2 Freeman, 1; 1 Madd. 1, 63; 1 P. Wms. 354; 1 Rand. 421. In Miller v. Rice, 1 Rand. 438, the executor, while the assets were abundant, confessed assets and gave a forthcoming bond, and afterwards, the assets becoming deficient by a general depreciation of property, he was relieved, and justly: for he had not voluntarily paid: he was sued: could he have been required or expected to plead a false plea? When he did plead, he could neither have pleaded plene administravit, nor plene administravit præter, for he had abundant of assets. He was bound then to let the judgment go; and if he had not done so, it would have resulted in the same thing. His plea would have been falsified, and judgment entered. When, therefore, he was about to suffer for his promptness and fair dealing, he was relieved, and properly relieved.

In this case, however, the state of things is very different. To justify a departure from the general course of administration, the executors ought to shew, that they have done that which, in the execution of this will, with its broad discretion, prudent men ought to have done. On the one hand, they were bound, indeed, as soon as possible on account of her needy circumstances, to have paid Mrs. Fisher her legacy. This was one injunction of the testator. But there was another more imperative. It was to pay all the legatees of the second class, either in the will or codicil, pari passu. It cannot be pretended, that if the deficiency had been foreseen, such payment would have been good. Now, the executors, ought to have foreseen its possibility at least, and to have guarded against it. Their testator had expressly directed, that the sales should not be hurried, as the time was unfavourable. The depreciation of property had commenced, and might continue. It

487 was impossible to say that *the property would pay the large sums charged upon it. What then was to be done, in this state of conflicting duties, of which the superiour was, to secure equality to all. If it was impossible to reconcile them, the subordinate should have given way, and Mrs. Fisher ought not to have been paid: for though she was to be paid as soon as possible, the possibility contemplated was a possibility consistent with the state of things in other respects. It was, in the strict sense, very possible to pay her the day after the testator's death. But this he did not mean. It was not, however, impossible, to reconcile these conflicting duties. Two obvious modes presented themselves: to require security to refund, which every executor has a right to require from a legatee, whom he pays in advance of other legatees; or, if Mrs. Fisher's situation did not enable her to give such security (of which there is no evidence) that was itself an additional motive or retaining the principal, and paying her the annual interest; or for vesting the principal in stock for her benefit, but under their control, in case the affairs of the estate should make it necessary to reclaim it. And, if her necessities required an advance of part of the principal, they should cautiously have advanced only so much, as would, under any conceivable state of things, have fallen to her share. In truth, however, there is no evidence, that the wants of this good lady would not have been adequately met by a payment of the interest. If her situation was such, I repeat that it was a motive for additional caution; particularly, if, as is contended, other legatees are to be turned around to her, instead of looking to the solvent executors; for they may well say, that the executors had no right to pay over their money to an insolvent person.

The case of Mrs. Fisher is stronger than that of the other legatees who have been overpaid. As to them no observation can be necessary. The executors had no right to pay them in anticipation, to the prejudice of others. They are therefore liable to the plaintiffs for the full amount of their proportions.

488 *The other question proposed, is as to the liability of the legatees who have been overpaid, to refund. Authorities have been cited to shew, that when an executor has voluntarily paid or assented to a legacy, it is to be taken to be an admission of the sufficiency of the assets, and the legatee will not be compelled to refund; 2 Ves. sr. 194; 1 Rop. on Leg. ch. 9; 2 P. Wms. 296; 1 Eq. Ca. 239, pl. 25; 2 Vern. 225; 1 Bro. C. C. 484. The first of these cases is the strongest of them all, and therefore shall be adverted to, particularly. Now upon examining the opinion of the court, it is evident that the very great weight attached to the admission of assets there, by the payment of the legacy, arose principally from the particular circumstances of the case. The executor had returned no inventory of the estate, and had paid off all the other legatees. And, even in that case, it is not alleged by sir John Strange, that the presumption is conclusive. If he had so decided, it would have been against the general principle which considers all such presumptions liable to be rebutted. The payment of the full amount of one legacy, furnishes indeed a presumption, and a very strong presumption, that there is enough to pay the rest. But what is there in the nature of the situation and character of an executor, that shall exclude him from this common privilege of repelling by evidence, a presumption of fact against him? There is nothing. An executor may have paid one by mistake, or he may from kindness to that one, have been willing to run the hazard of deficiency. But these would not be reasons for his being compelled to pay another out of his own pocket. I think, therefore, that the authorities can only be understood as saying, that payment to one affords the strongest presumption of sufficiency to pay the others, but not as denying the right of the executor, in a contest with those others, to rebut that presumption.

The question is more difficult as between the executor and the legatee who has been paid. The cases cited are certainly very strong to shew, that where an executor has *made voluntary payments, he shall not recover them back, though the assets prove deficient. It is said to be otherwise where the payment is compulsory; 2 Vern. 205. Or the deficiency of assets was created by debts which did not appear till after payment of the legacy. 2 Fonb. Eq. 377. It is admitted, indeed, that though the executor cannot compel the legatee to refund what was overpaid, other legatees may, where the assets were originally deficient, and all were bound to abate proportionably. But where the assets were sufficient, but have been wasted by the executor, who has become insolvent, even those who have not received anything, shall not force him who has, to refund; for they shall have no advantage of his diligence. Toller's law of ex'ors, 341; 2 Fonb. Eq. 376; 1 P. Wms. 495; 1 Ves. 194.

Notwithstanding the cases which have been decided, in England, where the executor is entitled to the residuum, that the executor shall not recover back from a legatee, what has been overpaid him, I cannot think, that such is held to be the inflexible law with us.

If, indeed, the advances have been long since made, and the estate distributed many years, the executor's bill to refund would not be entertained. Robertson v. Archer, 5 Rand. 319. But the very ground upon which this case was decided, negatives the general proposition, since the court would scarcely have proceeded upon the narrow principle, if the broad principle had been admitted. Indeed, in the well known case of Burnley v. Lambert, 1 Wash. 312, it had been said by the president of this court, after pronouncing that the executor was the proper judge of the ability of the testator's estate, "that after the assent of the executor, the legal property is completely vested in the legatee, and cannot at law be divested by the creditors. That, in such case, the creditors have a double remedy, 1. against the executors at law, in which case the executors have their remedy in equity to compel the legatee to refund; or 2. the creditors" &c. This opinion is but in unison with the general spirit of our decisions,

490 *which have relaxed much of the severity of ancient adjudications, in those cases where no fraud or misconduct is imputed to the executor, in the management of the estate, nor any apparent advantage derived to him from his errors or omissions, but he appears to have acted bona fide and with honest intentions. 2

Call, 86. I am, therefore, inclined to think, that there is no inflexible rule, which refuses to an executor, under all circumstances, a right to recover back from a legatee, an excess of advancements which may have been made to him above his rateable proportion of his legacy. The executors, in this case, might, therefore, file a cross bill, if they pleased, to have that matter fairly settled.

The cases cited by Mr. Leigh, of Briabane v. Dacres, 5 Taunt. 114, and Skyring v. Greenwood, 4 Barn. & Cres. 281; 1 Com. Law Rep. 43, 6, and 10 Id. 335, 8, are not, I think, decisive of this case. Sir V. Gibbs says, speaking of the right to recover back money paid by mistake of law, but under full knowledge of the facts, that "the party submitting to the demand, and paying the money, gives it to the person to whom he pays it, and closes the transaction between them."—"He who receives it, has a right to consider it as his, without dispute: he spends it in confidence that it is his: and it would be most mischievous and unjust, if he who has acquiesced in the right by voluntary payment, should be at liberty, at any time within the statute of limitations, to rip up the matter, and recover it back. He who received it, is not in the same condition. He has spent it in the confidence it was his, and, perhaps, has no means of repayment." In the case of Skyring v. Greenwood, chief justice Abbott expresses the like opinions yet more strongly. But both rely upon the fact, that the party receiving had a right to consider what was paid as his absolutely, and without dispute. But the legatee who has received his whole legacy in advance, is not precisely in this situation. He knows, that no act of the executor can absolve him from refunding at the suit of a creditor; or even at the suit of a legatee, if the executor is insolvent. He does not, therefore, 491 *fall within the principle of either of these cases, in this respect; and, certainly, not within the first, for another reason. The mistake here, is a mistake of fact, or, if you please, an erroneous inference from facts within the executors' knowledge; the mistake there, was a mistake as to the law; and where a doubtful question of law arises, if the party, who might litigate the right, submits to the demand, he can never recall the act upon the ground that he has erred. For, otherwise, there never could be a valid compromise upon a point of law; since, in every case, one or other must be wrong.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion to affirm the general principles of the chancellor's decree, except as to the charities, and to remand the cause to be proceeded in according to these principles, with some slight modifications as to the details.

The decree entered by this court, reversed the chancellor's decree as to the charities, and dismissed the attorney general's bill; and, approving the general principles of the decree, in respect to the other suit brought by the individual legatees, and correcting some of its details, affirmed it in all other respects.

*Hubbard v. Goodwin.
Kennedy &c. v. Same.

February, 1882.

Alliens—Right to Own Trust Estates—Escheat.—Land is purchased by or for an alien, and paid for by him or with money furnished by him, but the conveyance is taken to a citizen, upon express trust that he shall hold for the benefit of the alien and his heirs: HOLD, this trust estate of the alien can only be so acquired by him for the commonwealth, and a court of equity will compel the trustee to execute the trust for her benefit.

Same—Same—Same—Profits—Equity Practice.—The court of equity, in such case, follows the law in relation to escheats of legal estates purchased by aliens; and as the law does not, in cases of escheat, give the commonwealth the profits received by the alien or any other person before office found, so neither will equity, in the case of the trust estate, give the commonwealth the profits thereof accrued before decree.

Same—Purchase of Land by Citizen with Alien's Money—Implied Trust—Forfeiture—Quære.—Whether in the case of a purchase of land by a citizen, and the payment of the purchase money by or with the money of an alien, a resulting trust may be implied in equity for the alien, and such implied trust executed for the commonwealth? and, per TUCKER, L. C., equity will not, in such case, imply a trust for the alien, in order to forfeit it to the commonwealth.

Decrees—Between Co-defendants—When Proper.—It seems, there cannot properly be a decree between co-defendants in equity, in any case, in which the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree against both or either; and it would be inconvenient to extend that practice further.

Thomas Fretwell Philips, an alien, subject of G. Britain, came to Virginia in 1805, and, either personally or through the agency of Daniel Brodie, contracted with W. M. Cary, for the purchase of a parcel of land called Celeys in Elizabeth City county, for 8000 dollars. Philips paid the whole of the purchase money, or advanced it to Brodie to be paid, to Cary; but, in order to prevent the land from escheating to the commonwealth, and therefore to conceal Philips's interest in it, the conveyance from Cary was taken, not to Philips, the alien,

Alliens—Capacity to Hold Lands—Trust and Legal Estates.—In Cross v. De Valle, 6 Fed. Cas. 889, it is said: "When a trust is perfected in favor of an alien, the crown may be entitled, yet when a trust in favor of an alien is not in esse, but only in fieri and executory, the court will do no act to give it to an alien who by law cannot hold. Lewin, Trusts, 43. This subject was discussed with much learning and ability in the case of Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh 492, by the court of appeals of Virginia; and the court sustained the conclusion that a trust estate acquired by an alien is acquired for the state, and that a court of equity will compel the trustee to execute the trust for the benefit of the state." Dec. 374, where it is held that wherever a case is made out between defendants, by evidence arising from pleadings and proofs between plaintiffs and defendants, a court of equity is entitled to make a decree between the defendants and is bound to do so. but to Brodie who was a citizen. Philips took possession of the land, resided upon it, and took the profits to his own use, so long as he lived. He had a daughter named Sarah, the wife of John Goodwin, and she had an infant son, Thomas Fretwell 493 Goodwin: *the daughter, her husband, and her son, were all aliens: they came to Virginia during Philips's lifetime, and lived with him till his death, which happened in 1808. He died intestate. After his death, John Goodwin and his wife occupied Celeys, and took the profits, till 1809, when Goodwin died; and then Mrs. Goodwin continued to occupy and take the profits of the land, till 1811, when she married the same Daniel Brodie to whom Celeys had been conveyed by Cary in 1805. From the time of Brodie's marriage with Mrs. Goodwin, they resided at Celeys, and Brodie took the profits, until 1815, when his wife died, without having had any child by him; and thenceforth, Brodie continued to hold and enjoy the profits of the land, till his death in 1819. Meantime, Brodie sent his step son, T. F. Goodwin, to England, where he remained for several years, and until he attained to full age, under the care of John Goodwin, his paternal grandfather, and his other relations there.

Philips, it seemed, died in possession of personal estate, consisting of slaves, stock and furniture, at Celeys, besides money. Upon the death of Philips, in 1808, administration of his estate was granted to John Goodwin: upon the death of Goodwin in 1809, his widow took administration of her husband's estate, and administration de bonis non of her father's: and upon her death in 1815, her second husband, Brodie, took administration of her estate, and administration de bonis non of the estate of Philips.

Brodie left a will, whereby he directed that Celeys (which he described as the land which he had purchased of Cary) and all the slaves and other personal property there (which, he said, he had acquired by his marriage) should be sold, and that all the debts due and moneys belonging to his deceased wife, should be collected, by his executors; and then directed, that his debts should be paid out of the proceeds of the sales of Celeys and the slaves and personal property there, and that 2230 dollars should be deducted from the same fund, which sum he bequeathed to his own 494 *relations; and he bequeathed the residue of the proceeds of those sales, and the whole amount which should be collected of moneys due to his late wife, to his step-son T. F. Goodwin, for life; remainder to his child or children, if he should leave any; and, if he should leave none, remainder to the testator's two nieces, Mary the wife of William Nimmo, and Martha the wife of Edmund Kennedy. All the property he held in his own right, he devised and bequeathed to the same two nieces and a nephew. And he appointed E. Kennedy and W. Nimmo his executors.

The executors proved the will, and took upon them the execution thereof. They continued to hold Celeys, till the end of the year 1821, about which time the executor Nimmo died; and then Kennedy, in execution of his testator's will, exposed it to sale, at public auction, and he himself became the purchaser, at the price of 4800 dollars.

After this sale was made, William Sharp the english guardian (or who acted as the guardian) of T. F. Goodwin, by letter of attorney, appointed William Gray of Norfolk, his agent to attend to the interests of his ward in Virginia. And in 1823, Gray caused a bill to be exhibited, in the superior court of chancery of Williamsburg, in the name of T. F. Goodwin, still an infant, against Kennedy, now the surviving executor, and Mary Nimmo administratrix of W. Nimmo, now dead, who had been the other executor, of Brodie: wherein Goodwin, claiming as a legatee under Brodie's will, impeached the sale which had been made of Celeys by the executor Kennedy, on the ground that it had been unfairly sold, and purchased by the executor himself, at an under value; and prayed, that the sale should be set aside, and a resale of the subject, and an account of Brodie's estate, and of the executors' administration thereof. Kennedy, in his answer to this bill, denied that there had been any actual fraud in his purchase of Celeys, but declared he was perfectly willing that the sale should be set aside, and the land sold again for the best price that could be got.

And, in September 1823, he wrote a
495 letter to R. *B. Taylor (the counsel retained to prosecute the suit for T. F. Goodwin) offering to make sale of Celeys, upon such terms as he should approve, for the benefit of the parties concerned; to which Taylor, after consulting Gray the agent, wrote an answer, acceding to the proposition, and adding—"We think it would be proper to offer the property for sale, on credit, with good security, but that it should be set up so as not to sell for less than 6000 dollars. It would, perhaps, be better to endeavour to make a private contract, as the sum to be obtained would then be known beforehand; but if a public sale be made, it should be so conducted as not to sacrifice the property at less than 6000 dollars, which Hubbard would have given."

Accordingly, in May 1824, Kennedy sold Celeys to Thomas Parker, for 6000 dollars, payable in instalments, and conveyed it to him. Of this sale, and of its terms, Gray and Taylor were apprised, and they approved it.

And in October 1824, Parker sold and conveyed Celeys to Matthew Hubbard, upon the same terms on which he had purchased it; Hubbard undertaking to pay the purchase money to Kennedy, which Parker had contracted to pay, as the instalments thereof should fall due.

Goodwin's suit against Brodie's executors, in the court of chancery of Williamsburg, was heard in June 1824; and the chancellor ordered accounts of Brodie's estate, and of the executor's administration thereof. But while these accounts were in progress before the commissioner, Goodwin having attained to full age, came to Virginia: he arrived in September 1825. And the legislature, at the session of 1825-6, passed an act, granting and releasing to him all the right, title and interest, which had accrued, or might accrue, to the commonwealth, or to the president and directors of the literary fund, in the land called Celeys; and authorizing him to sue for the same, in any court of law or equity, and to hold it when recovered, in the same manner, in all respects, as if he were a native born citizen;

upon condition that he should become 496 a citizen of the U. States, *within two years from the time of passing the act; saving to all persons, other than the commonwealth, or the president and directors of the literary fund, any right which they had or might have in the land if the act had never been passed. And, by another act passed at the session of 1826-7, so much of the former act as imposed the condition that Goodwin should become a citizen of the U. States within two years, was repealed, and that condition dispensed with.

In June 1827, Goodwin exhibited his bill in the court of chancery of Williamsburg, against Kennedy in his own right and as surviving executor of Brodie, Mrs. Nimmo the administratrix of W. Nimmo the deceased executor of Brodie, and Parker and Hubbard, the purchasers under Kennedy at his second sale of Celeys: wherein he set forth the facts above detailed, as to the purchase of Celeys in 1805, by or for Philips; Philips's paying, or advancing to be paid, the whole purchase money to Cary; the conveyance taken to Brodie, in order to avoid the escheat; the successive occupation of the land by Philips during his life, by John Goodwin and wife during Goodwin's life, by Mrs. Goodwin till her marriage with Brodie, and then by Brodie till his death in 1819; the will of Brodie; and the sale of Celeys by Kennedy to Parker, and by Parker to Hubbard. And he alleged, that upon the purchase of Celeys from Cary, and the conveyance thereof taken from Cary to Brodie, Brodie executed a bond or some other instrument to Philips, whereby he acknowledged that the land was Philips's property, and that he was only a trustee for Philips, and agreed to hold the legal title, and to convey the same, according to his directions; which instrument came into Brodie's own possession upon his marriage with Mrs. Goodwin in 1810, and had either been destroyed by him, or was now in the hands of his executors. That Brodie being only a trustee for Philips, and Philips the cestui que trust being an alien, the trust estate was escheatable to the commonwealth, and the commonwealth having by the act of 1825-6 and 1826-7, granted and released all her rights in 497 *the subject to the plaintiff, he was now entitled to demand the land itself. And that Kennedy, when he sold the land in question to Parker, and Parker when he bought it, and Hubbard when he purchased it of Parker, had full notice of the trust upon which Brodie had held the legal estate. Therefore, the bill prayed a decree for the land, and for a conveyance and release of the legal estate of the same to the plaintiff; accounts of the profits received by Brodie, from the date of his marriage with Mrs. Goodwin till her death, and thenceforth till his own death; of the profits received by Brodie's executors from his death till the first sale to Kennedy; of the profits received by Kennedy, from his purchase till his sale to Parker; and of the profits received by Parker and by Hubbard, successively, during their occupation of the land; and a decree for such profits against the parties respectively, as well as compensation for any damages that had been done to the property, by cutting timber, or other waste.

Kennedy, in his answer to this bill, averred, that he had no knowledge whatever of the secret trust for Philips, on which it was alleged Brodie held the legal estate of Celeys, or of the facts alleged, from which such trust was inferred; and that he had not found among Brodie's papers, any instrument of writing declaring such trust. He had acted under the conviction, that the estate belonged absolutely to his testator, Brodie; he had, in execution of his testator's will, sold the land to Parker, upon terms approved by persons representing (as he thought) the interests of the plaintiff in Virginia; he had received from Hubbard, who had purchased from Parker, a considerable part of the purchase money, which he had applied, in due course of administration, to the payment of his testator's debts; and he was ready to render an account of his transactions.

Mrs. Nimmo, administratrix of Nimmo, the deceased executor of Brodie, in her answer, said, that as her intestate had had no part in making either of the sales 498 of Celeys, so *neither had he ever received any part of the profits of that estate; he died in 1821.

Hubbard, in his answer, said he was not informed and had no particular knowledge of any of the matters alleged in the bill, respecting the secret trust upon which Brodie held the legal title of Celeys for Philips. He had heard, that the plaintiff was prosecuting a suit to recover his share of the proceeds of the sale of Celeys, or to have the first sale set aside, and the estate resold; but he never heard it questioned, that Brodie's executors had full power to sell. Before he purchased the land of Parker, he ascertained that it had been sold by Kennedy to Parker, with the assent of the plaintiff's then agent and counsel in Virginia, and upon terms which they approved: his purchase, in truth, promoted the objects which the plaintiff's agents, at the time, were seeking to accomplish: and he had paid Kennedy, the executor, about 4000 dollars of the purchase money.

There was the fullest proof, that Celeys was purchased of Cary for Philips; that Brodie was only Philips's agent in making the purchase; that the whole of the purchase money was paid by Philips, or furnished by him to Brodie to be paid, to Cary; that the conveyance was taken to Brodie, instead of Philips, only because the one was an alien incapable to hold real estate, and the other a citizen; that the land was occupied by Philips, and by Goodwin and wife, and by Mrs. Goodwin, successively, till her marriage with Brodie in 1811; that Brodie, repeatedly, during Philips's life, at the time of his death, during John Goodwin's life, and after Brodie's own marriage with

Mrs. Goodwin, during her life, and after her death, acknowledged that Celeys was the property of Philips and his heirs, having been bought for him and paid for with his money, and that he Brodie claimed no interest in it, but only held the title as Philips's friend, and for his benefit; that, soon after Philips's death, John Goodwin his son in law, requested Brodie to convey Celeys to him, which Brodie refused to do, because he was an alien, but said, that whenever Philips's heir at law should 499 *become a citizen, and capable to hold the estate, a conveyance thereof to such heir should be immediately executed.

In a letter written by Brodie to John Goodwin, the grandfather of the plaintiff, in 1818, and in another written to the plaintiff himself in 1819, Brodie spoke of Celeys as the property of the plaintiff. And it was proved, that shortly after the purchase from Cary, Philips desired a neighbour, Robert Lively, to apply to C. K. Mallory, a lawyer (since dead) to prepare an instrument of writing to secure the title of Celeys and some debts due from Brodie to him; that Lively accordingly desired Mallory to write such an instrument; that Mallory did so, and Lively carried the draft to Philips; and that this paper was afterwards executed by Brodie; Philips remarking, at the time, that if they were all to live, there would be no necessity for such an instrument, to which Brodie answered, that it was perfectly right. But only the general purpose of this instrument, was proved; its precise contents were not proved, nor was it ascertained what had become of it.

There was no proof, and no reason to suspect, that Kennedy, when he made the sale of Celeys, or indeed, until this bill was filed, had any notice, that Brodie held the legal title of Celeys, in trust for Philips and his heirs, or otherwise than simply and absolutely as his own.

But there was proof, that Parker and Hubbard, both, had been informed before any part of the purchase money was paid, and before Parker's sale of the land to Hubbard, that Brodie had purchased it for the benefit and in trust for Philips; and that they had both heard, that Brodie had executed a bond to Philips to convey the title to him or his assigns; which bond, it was suspected, had come into Brodie's hands after his marriage with Mrs. Goodwin, and had been destroyed by him.

The chancellor, declaring that Brodie had held the legal estate of Celeys in trust for Philips and his heirs, and that Philips being an alien, that trust was, in effect, a trust for the commonwealth, which,
500 by the acts of assembly of 1825-6 *and of 1826-7, was now vested in the plaintiff; therefore, decreed, that Hubbard should surrender the possession to him, and that the defendants should make him conveyances and releases of the estate. And he ordered accounts to be taken, of the profits of the estate, received by Brodie from the time of his marriage with Mrs. Goodwin in 1811, till his death in 1819; by Brodie's executors or either of them, from the time of their testator's death till the sale made by Kennedy to Parker; by Parker from the time of his purchase till his sale to Hubbard; and by Hubbard since; and an account of all damages done to the land by Hubbard, since he had been in the occupation of it; and accounts of the estate of Brodie, and of the transactions of his executors, Kennedy and Nimmo, in the administration of his estate.

From this decree, Hubbard and Parker, immediately, appealed to this court.

The commissioner, notwithstanding the appeal, proceeded to take all the accounts ordered by the decree. And he reported, that the profits of Celeys, received by Brodie from his marriage with Mrs. Goodwin till her death, amounted to 625 dollars; that the estimated profits received by Brodie, from his wife's death till his own, amounted to 600 dollars; that, after Brodie's death, Celeys was rented out, and that the rents from that time till the sale to Parker, were received by Kennedy, and amounted, principal and interest, to 1184 dollars, chargeable to Kennedy; that the estimated profits during Parker's occupation, were 88 dollars; and during Hubbard's 989 dollars. The commissioner also reported accounts of the administration of Brodie's estate by his executors; by which it appeared, that (excluding what had been received by Kennedy, from Hubbard on account of the purchase money of Celeys, as not being a just credit to the estate) there was a balance due from the estate to Kennedy of 2508 dollars; and that upon Nimmo's account of administration, there was a balance due from his estate to Brodie's, of 2154 dollars.

501 *Upon this report coming in, the chancellor decreed, that Mrs. Nimmo, the administratrix of W. Nimmo the deceased executor of Brodie, should, out of the assets of Nimmo's estate in her hands, pay the plaintiff the sum of 600 dollars (being the estimated amount of profits received by Brodie himself after the death of his wife) with interest from the date of the decree till paid; and that Kennedy should pay the plaintiff the sum of 1184 dollars, with interest on 851 dollars, part thereof, from the 1st September 1829; (the date of the commissioner's report) this last sum being the nett balance of rents received by Kennedy from the time of Brodie's death till the sale to Parker. But Parker being now dead, and the cause pending in the court of appeals as to Hubbard, the chancellor, forbore to make any decree against either of them, in respect of the profits.

And from this decree Kennedy and Mrs. Nimmo appealed.

Leigh for the appellant Hubbard, and Stanard for the appellants Kennedy and Nimmo. The appellee can only claim under the act of assembly of 1825-6, such interest as the commonwealth had in Celeys; and the commonwealth's rights thus granted to the plaintiff, are placed on the ground, that Brodie held the legal estate, in trust for Philips, an alien, and that Philips's trust estate was escheatable in equity. Suppose Brodie took and held the legal estate, upon a simple trust expressly declared by deed for Philips and his heirs and assigns; was such a trust estate of an alien, in its nature, an escheatable interest? Such a trust estate is no wise different from a use in lands before the statute of uses; and we know from the best authority, that one of the reasons for passing the statute of uses, to transfer uses into possession, was, that the practice of conveying lands to uses defrauded the lord of his escheat; 2 Black. Comm. 231, 2. Hence, it appears that a use in lands was not an escheatable interest. If A. enfeoff B. to the use of C. and B. the feoffee to uses, is attainted of treason, the king shall have the land discharged of the use; *Harg. Co. Litt. 13, a, note 7; Pimb's case, Mo. 196. In the case of a devise of lands to an alien, upon trust to sell, the legal estate in the alien, though only a trustee, is escheatable to the crown; Fish v. Klein, 1 Meriv. 431. It is then, the legal estate that escheats, in consequence of the incapacity of the feoffee to uses, or of the trustee, to hold it, or of his attainder, not the use or trust estate, by reason of the incapacity or a attainder of the cestui que use or cestui que trust. For, so long as there is a person holding the legal estate, capable to hold it, there is no want of a tenant owing allegiance and service to the state in respect of the land held, no matter to whose use, or upon what trust, he holds. Thus, if there be lord and tenant, and the tenant enfeoffs J. S. and declares no use; the cestui que use [that is, the feoffor himself] does felony and is attainted; the lord shall not have a subpoena to have the land; and it seems the heir of the feoffor shall not have it, for there is corruption of blood; and, therefore, it seems, the feoffee shall retain it to his own use; 10 Vin. Abr. Escheat, A. pl. 16, p. 140. And upon the like principles was decided, in modern times, the case of Burgess v. Wheate, 1 W. Blac. 123; 1 Eden, 177, S. C. In Holland's case, 1 Roll's Abr. 194, 534; Alleyne, 14 S. C. it was held, that, if an alien purchase a copyhold in fee in the name of J. S. in trust for him and his heirs, upon office found that J. S. had the legal estate in trust for the alien, neither the copyhold nor the trust was escheatable at law, but the king must sue in chancery to have the trust executed for his benefit. And in Attorney General v. Sands, Hardr. 488, 495, where the question was whether a trust estate of a person attainted for felony, was forfeited to the crown, Hale, chief baron, said 'I hold that such a trust in an alien is forfeitable, and will belong to the king, as was held in Holland's case' &c. It is obvious, that this remark of Hale, was extrajudicial, and founded wholly on Holland's case; and that, as to Holland's case, the point adjudged was that the trust estate in a copyhold was not escheatable at law, and that the court that the king should sue in chancery to have the trust executed for his benefit. And these are the authorities upon which the elementary writers have repeated the opinion, that, though a trust estate in an alien be not escheatable at law, it is in effect escheatable in equity; that the crown may, in chancery, compel the execution of the trust for its own benefit. But all those opinions have reference to cases of express trusts. Here, Brodie did not take and hold Celeys upon any trust for Philips the alien, expressly declared; at least, we think, there is no proof of any such express trust. It appears, indeed, that an instrument of writing was drawn by Mr. Mallory, and executed by Brodie to Philips in his lifetime, for the purpose of securing the title of Celeys to Philips; but the contents of that instrument, in other words, the scheme devised by Mr. Mallory to effect the object, has not been ascertained. It is surmised, that Brodie got possession of this paper, after his marriage with Mrs. Goodwin, and destroyed it: but this is only surmise and suspicion: and the evidence of his repeated admissions, after his marriage and even after his wife's death, that he had purchased the land as Philips's friend and for his benefit, that it had been paid for with Philips's money, and that it was not his own property, ought to relieve his memory from this suspicion: for, if he destroyed the paper, he could have had no other view in destroying it, but to conceal its contents; that is, to conceal what his subsequent repeated admissions evince he had no care to conceal. If the court will found any decree upon the supposed contents of this lost paper, and make an effort to ascertain them by inference from the circumstances of the case; what, probably, were the contents of it? Was it a simple express declaration that Brodie held, and should hold, the estate in trust for Philips, his heirs and assigns? Mr. Mallory would hardly have hit upon such a device as that, of all others the most likely to endanger and defeat the object, which it was the design of the instrument to accomplish.

502 did not *and had no jurisdiction to adjudge, but only said obiter,

It was, most probably, a covenant, 504 *or bond with condition, that Brodie should convey the legal title to Philips or his heirs, whenever he or they should become citizens of the U. States. The answer which Brodie made to John Goodwin, when he demanded a conveyance, was exactly conformable with such an obligation: he refused to convey to Goodwin, because he was an alien, but said, that whenever Philips's heir at law should become a citizen, a conveyance to such heir should be immediately executed. And if this was the purport of the lost instrument it was only an executory contract entered into by a citizen with an alien, to convey lands to him when he should become a citizen. And then the question will be, whether such an executory contract gives to the alien covenantee, such an interest in land, as is escheatable, in law or equity, to the commonwealth? Surely, the commonwealth cannot demand specific execution of such a contract, and that in anticipation of the event on which the covenantor stipulated to execute it, in order to have the benefit of the escheat. Throwing the lost instrument out of the case, the plaintiff can only rest the claim of the commonwealth, in whose place he stands and whose rights alone he is intitled to demand, on the resulting trust to Philips, implied by law, from the fact that the estate conveyed to Brodie, was purchased and paid for with Philips's money. In Sanders's note upon Lloyd v. Spillet, 2 Atk. 150, note 2, it is said, that "if the consideration money is expressed in the deed to be paid by the person in whose name the conveyance is taken, and nothing appears in such conveyance, to create a presumption that the purchase money belonged to another, then parol evidence cannot be admitted, after the death of the nominal purchaser, to prove a resulting trust, for that would be contrary to the statute of frauds—but if the nominal purchaser, in his lifetime, gives a declaration of or confesses the trust, this takes it out of the statute;" and the authorities are cited for both branches of the proposition. Whether the declarations made by Brodie in his lifetime, on the subject of the estate in question, were such as takes 505 *this case out of the statute of frauds, is submitted to the court. Taking it that they were so, can there be such a resulting trust for an alien, so as that it shall escheat as his property to the commonwealth? Where land is purchased and paid for with the money of one person, and the conveyance taken to another, a trust results for the person who pays the purchase money; but this resulting trust is the mere creature of the law; it is the act of the law that creates or implies the trust estate. Now, an alien may take by purchase, though he cannot hold; but by act of law he cannot take, as by descent, curtesy, dower, guardianship. 7 Co. 25; 1 Bac. Abr. Alien, C. p. 132. And since equity is only part of the law, no trust estate can be implied for an alien, in equity. In this view of the case, therefore, Philips had no interest in Celeys, legal or equitable, escheatable to the commonwealth, at law or in equity; and, consequently, the plaintiff has no right to the land. But, supposing that the trust estate was in Philips; and such a trust estate as equity, following the law in respect to the escheat of legal estates purchased by an alien, would seize for the commonwealth; and supposing that Parker and Hubbard purchased with notice of the trust; they cannot be charged with any fraud; for they purchased with the knowledge and assent of the plaintiff's agents at the time, and to promote the plaintiff's interest; and it would be hard and inequitable, that they should suffer loss, because he thinks proper to relinquish his claim under Brodie's will, and make his appeal to the liberality of the legislature. At any rate, equity to such a case, will not go beyond the law in cases of escheats; and therefore, this decree is certainly erroneous in giving the plaintiffs the profits; since, in cases of escheats at law, the commonwealth never recovers profits accrued before office found. 3 Wheat. 589. There is no process or remedy provided for the recovery of profits of lands escheated, previously accrued, and no instance of an account or recovery of such profits.

506 *Johnson for the appellee. The question is, Whether Philips took such an equitable estate in Celeys, as that, if he had been a citizen, he could, in equity, have compelled the execution of the trust by Brodie? and if so, Whether, as Philips was an alien, the commonwealth could, in equity, compel the execution of the trust for her own benefit? There is no necessity, to maintain, that, if lands be purchased and paid for with an alien's money, and the conveyance of the legal estate be made to a citizen, admitting that this is only a trust implied by law and resulting to the alien, it is such a trust estate as is, in equity, escheatable to the commonwealth. If there were any occasion to maintain the proposition, it might, I should think, be maintained without difficulty. For an alien may purchase and take real estate, as well as a citizen; the law permits him to do so; but he cannot hold: he may purchase but he purchases for the benefit of the commonwealth. Neither is the disability of an alien to hold freeholds, or chattels real, for his own benefit, considered as a penalty or forfeiture, but it arises merely from the policy of the law, and therefore it has been held, in equity, that he cannot demur to a discovery of any circumstance necessary to establish the fact of alienage. Attorney General v. Duplessis, 2 Ves. sen. 286; 1 Bro. P. C. 415. But here, there was an express trust. There was a bond or covenant executed by Brodie to Philips, to secure Celeys to him; an instrument, which Brodie probably suppressed, since he had the opportunity, and was the only person that had any interest, to suppress it; and the contents of this instrument are sufficiently ascertained to have been a declaration of the trust, by the fact, that Brodie did hold the legal estate, upon a simple trust for the use of Philips; that Philips held the possession during his whole life, and his heir at law held it afterwards, and enjoyed the whole profits. But, throwing the lost instrument out of the case, Brodie's letters, admitting that Celeys belonged to T. F. Goodwin, the grandson of Philips, and heir at law of his daughter, 507 contain a sufficient written acknowledgment of *the trust on which he held the legal estate. Nay, his parol admissions and declarations of the trust, would suffice to establish it: the case, in its very nature, is not within the statute of frauds: like the case of a deed absolute on its face, but intended and delivered as a mortgage, the trust may be established by parol proof. Sugd. law vend. ch. 15, § 2, p. 443-6; Boyd v. M'Lean, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 482, where the cases are reviewed by chancellor Kent. Taking it then, that Brodie held the legal estate of Celeys, upon an express trust for Philips, the alien, it is impossible to doubt, that as the legal estate, if that had been purchased by and conveyed to the alien, would have been escheatable to the commonwealth at law, so this trust estate purchased by him enured to the commonwealth, and equity would compel the execution of the trust for her benefit: if it were otherwise, the law which inhibits an alien from holding lands for his own benefit, and declares, that he can only purchase for the benefit of the commonwealth, would by this simple device, be reduced to a dead letter. King v. Holland, 1 Roll's Abr. Alien, A. pl. 8, p. 194, 534; Alleyn, 14, Stiles, 20, 40, 76; Attorney General v. Sands, Hardr. 488, 495; 3 Ch. Rep. 33, 35; Earl of Somerset's case, Hob. 214; Cro. Jac. 512; Commonwealth v. Martin, 5 Munf. 117, 140, 141, 143; 1 Com. Dig. Alien, C. 2, 557; 1 Bac.

Abr. Aliens, C. 134; 2 Kent's Comm. 54. Neither does the case of Burgess v. Wheate, 1 Eden, 177, conflict with these authorities; besides, in that case, lord Mansfield dissented (and upon the strongest reasoning) from the opinion of lord keeper Henley and sir Thomas Clarke. The appellee, then, is entitled by the grant of the commonwealth, to the land in question. And the commonwealth was, and by consequence the appellee is, entitled to the profits from the death of Philips. For the title and the right to the possession of the land, vested in the commonwealth, immediately upon the death of Philips, without any office found. Harg. Co. Litt. 2, b, note 5; Willion v. Barkeley, Plowd. 229; 2 Kent's Comm. 47, 53.

508 *CARR, J. The claim of the appellee being founded on the acts of assembly of 1825-6 and 1826-7, granting and releasing to him all the commonwealth's right, title and interest, in the estate called Celeys, we are to inquire what were the rights of the commonwealth, which those acts granted to the appellee and authorized him to assert by suit at law or in equity? From the facts of the case, it is very clear, there could be no escheat, technically speaking; for the legal estate was vested in a citizen. But it is equally clear that this citizen was a mere trustee, holding the estate for the benefit of Philips the alien. It was a good deal discussed at the bar, whether this trust resulted, by operation of law, solely from the facts that the purchase money was paid by one, and the deed made to another, or was in express trust, raised by the agreement of the parties? Upon my mind, the evidence has left no doubt, that it was an express trust. The statute of frauds has no application to the case, even supposing the proof of the trust rests on parol evidence; as I think is clearly shewn by chancellor Kent, upon a full and very able review of the cases, in Boyds v. M'Lean, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 586. The declarations of Brodie, made at various times and on some solemn occasions, are full to prove, that he purchased and held this land for his friend Philips, and never paid a cent or laid the slightest claim to it, and that he said he would make the right, whenever any of the family could receive it. But I do not think it necessary to resort to parol evidence, to shew that there was an express agreement between the parties as to the trust. It is in clear proof, that there was a writing executed, by Brodie to Philips, to secure Celeys. We are not, to be sure, made acquainted with the particular terms of this writing nor ought we (I apprehend) to be too strict in requiring this, when we reflect, how this paper has probably disappeared. Brodie was the representative of Philips, and the husband of his daughter, and in these characters, had a right to all his papers and documents. But, though the paper be lost, the acts of the parties throw a *strong light upon its probable contents. Brodie held the legal title to guard it from escheat; Philips, and after him his son in law and daughter, enjoyed the full and free use and possession of the estate. The letters, too, of Brodie to old Mr. Goodwin and the appellee, shew, beyond a question to my mind, that he considered himself holding Celeys for the appellee. I conclude on this point, that here was a clear express trust in Brodie for the benefit of Philips.

Now, we know that, in equity, the trust is the land; the trustee, the mere instrument of conveyance, in no event to take a benefit. In Burgess v. Wheate, 1 W. Black. 161, lord Mansfield uses this strong language: "Twenty years ago, I imbibed this principle, that the trust is the estate at law in this court, and governed by the same rules in general, as all real property is, by limitation. Every thing I have heard, read or thought of since, has confirmed that principle in my mind." It is, and has long been, I believe, the policy of most nations, to exclude from all participation in the soil, those who owe allegiance to a foreign government. It is a principle deeply rooted in the common law of England, which as to this, is our law. By it, an alien cannot hold land: he may take indeed by purchase, but it is only for the benefit of the king, and so soon as there is an office found, it is seized into the king's hands; or if he die, the king is seized without office, for otherwise the freehold would be in abeyance, as an alien cannot have any inheritable blood; by act of law he can take nothing in land, for the law (which, as lord Hale says, nihil frustra facit) will not give him an inheritance or freehold for he cannot keep it. The law, therefore, will not give an alien the benefit of descent, curtesy, dower or guardianship. These positions are too well settled to need a reference to authorities. Would it not seem a strange inconsistency in the law, if principles so vital, so carefully guarded, might be rendered a dead letter by a mere change in the form of conveyances? And yet this would be very much the case, if by making a

510 citizen the trustee, the beneficial interest of the alien, in the *land, would be placed beyond the reach of the sovereign. Our country might be filled, our farms occupied, by strangers, owing no allegiance, feeling no attachment, to our government, and adding no strength to our resources; for both their persons, and the wealth they might amass, would be withdrawn in the hour of danger. But the law is not justly chargeable with such inconsistency. In some of our oldest books, we find it laid down, that if an alien purchase land, and take a deed to J. S. in trust for himself and his heirs, the king shall have the land; not, indeed, by an inquest of office, but by a suit in equity. The first case we find on this subject, is that of The King v. Holland reported in several books. The case, as I gather it from the several reports of it, was thus: an alien purchased a copyhold in fee, in the name of J. S. for himself and his heirs; and this being found by an office, the copyhold was seized into the hands of the king; J. S. came and traversed the trust, which was found for the king; yet the court decided, upon the peculiarity of the copyhold, being a base tenure, that the king could not recover the land itself, for that would make him tenant to the lord, to do service at his court, which the king could not be, but that he must sue in equity to have the trust executed. Lord

Hale was of counsel in this case, and we see the account he gives of it, in the case of The Attorney General v. Sands, also reported by several hands. In Hardress, 495, he says, "I hold that such a trust in an alien is forfeitable, and will belong to the king, as it was held in 23 Car. 1, in Holland's case: and the reason is, because, an alien has no capacity to purchase for the benefit of any other but the king. And it would otherwise be inconvenient, that aliens should receive the profits of lands to their own use; and the mischief would be the same as if aliens purchased the lands themselves." Again, in a report of the same case, 3 Ch. Rep. 130, 133, it is said, that an alien, who is cestui que trust of any estate, such estate belongs to the king. And the chief baron said, that it was the opinion of the judges in Holland's

511 case, in *which he was of counsel, that an alien hath no capacity to purchase, but for the king's use. The same law is laid down in 2 Vin. Abr. 258, and in Bac. Abr. and Com. Dig. under the head of alien. In Gilbert on Uses and Trusts, 43, 243, it is also said, "a trust in an alien, is forfeited to the king." It is not necessary to cite more authorities; these are enough. I, at least, am well satisfied both with the authority and the reason of the cases. I conclude then, that the commonwealth had a right to recover this estate by bill in equity, resembling the escheat at law; and that having transferred this right to the appellee, the decree is correct in decreeing him the land; unless there be something in the case of the purchasers, which should protect them from the interference of equity. It was relied on that they were purchasers without notice; but the record contradicts this; it shews that both Parker and Hubbard had notice of the trust, before they were purchasers.

But I think no rents and profits ought to be given. Such is the settled doctrine in cases of escheat at law; and the reason given there, which I think a very good one, holds equally here.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. This case brings into question the rights and capacities of aliens.

An alien may take lands by purchase, but he cannot hold them, except for the benefit of the state. But although he can take by purchase, he cannot take by act of law, as by descent or curtesy; in other words, he cannot take by act of the law, but only by his own act; for the law will not cast the freehold upon him, merely that it may be forfeited. There is, moreover, no distinction herein, whether the purchase be by feoffment, bargain and sale, or other deed, or by devise. In all those cases, as the act of the party, and not the mere act of the law, casts the freehold on the alien,

512 he can take; though he can only hold the estate he acquires, *subject to the right of the state to seize it, at pleasure. This can only be done, however, by office found, or something equivalent thereto. For, it is one of the principles of the common law, that the crown can only take by matter of record; a principle established for the security of private property from the grasp of power. And until office found, or some equivalent proceeding, he may hold against all the world, not excepting the state, and is not accountable for rents and profits previously received. 3 Wheat. 589; 11 Wheat. 332. These principles are so elementary in their character, that it is scarcely necessary to cite authority to prove them. I will refer, however, to 7 Cranch, 613, 618, where all the authorities have been diligently collected.

But though there seems to be no ground for difference of opinion, where the alien takes by purchase the legal title to lands, yet there does not appear to be the same unity of sentiment, in relation to an equitable interest in lands acquired by an alien.

That there are cases, in which the equitable interests of an alien in real property, are vested in the state, it will not be difficult to shew from reason and authority. But that wherever, in the case of a citizen, an equitable interest would be raised, it will be raised in favour of an alien, in order to forfeit it to the state, may, I think, well be questioned.

1. I am of opinion, that equity will never raise a resulting trust in favour of an alien. A resulting trust is the creature of equity. It is raised for the benefit of the party, who, upon principles of justice and the circumstances of the case, is entitled to the subject. Being raised for his benefit, there can be no motive for raising it, when that will pervert it to his prejudice. That which is designed as a boon, will not be changed into a forfeiture. To raise the trust, and thereby forfeit the estate, would be to commit the offence, and make the alien bear the penalty. Accordingly, although there is no case, perhaps, exactly like this; no case, where the court refused to raise a resulting trust for

513 the alien, because *he had paid the purchase money; yet there are cases strongly analogous, in which the court has disclaimed the exercise of a like power, when it could only work a prejudice to the party. Thus in Redington v. Redington, 3 Ridg. P. C. 106, 184, where a father who was a papist, had purchased lands in the name of his son, and the question was, whether it should be considered as a trust for the father, or an advancement for the son, it was resolved to be the latter; and a principal ground taken by the chancellor was, that to imply a trust would forfeit the lands, at the very instant the trust should be raised. So in Commonwealth v. Martin's ex'ors, in this court, where lands were devised to be sold, and the money paid over to aliens, it was argued, that, upon principles of equity, the devisees had a right to elect to take the land; but it was strongly said, "Why shall equity do so vain a thing, as to convert an useful principle of equity as to cestuis que trust generally, into an engine of destruction as to alien cestuis que trusts, by supposing an election in them, which they are not permitted to exercise?" "The election given to a citizen, is adopted on the principle of extending a substantial benefit to him. Why will equity suppose this power in an alien, not as a benefit to him, but merely for the purpose of forfeiting his estate." 5 Munf. 127. See also Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. 563. So too lord Mansfield, speaking of this right of election in the case of a papist, says, "No: a roman catholic shall not make his election, because there is a law which says, that being a papist he shall not take land." "In common cases, where money is given to be laid out in land or securities, a common person may elect to take the land, a charity cannot; because it is unlawful; and, therefore, though the election be given, yet one alternative being lawful and the other not, a court of equity says you shall do that which is lawful." Foone v. Blount, 2 Cowp. 467, 8. Pursuing these principles, and a like course of reasoning, I conclude that equity will never raise a mere 514 resulting trust *for an alien, that it may be forfeited to the state: it will not profess to benefit, when it designs to destroy.

2. I am of opinion, that, in the case of a mere executory contract for a purchase of land, while it yet remains in fieri, no forfeiture accrues. For until the purchase is complete by the execution of a conveyance, there is a locus penitentiae, of which the parties may avail themselves. The act is not yet consummate, which the law has forbidden. If it should never be consummated, there would be no offence against this policy of the law. If the parties, by mutual consent, should rescind their contract, there could be no doubt of their right to do so, and then no forfeiture could ever accrue. If it were otherwise, then upon a contract to sell to an alien, even before a cent of the purchase money was paid, the land of the citizen would be forfeited, while no penalty would fall upon the alien. But,

3. I am very clearly of opinion, that where for the purpose of evading the law, which prohibits an alien to hold lands, he purchases real estate in the name of a trustee, upon an express or secret trust to be permitted to take and receive the rents and profits, this is such a trust as in reason and upon the well received principles of equity, as well as upon authority, will pass to the state and be enforced at its instance and in its favour.

In reason, indeed, there can be no doubt. The inhibition of the law would be vain and nugatory, if it could be evaded by such a trust. The policy of that rule which denies to an alien the capacity to hold lands for his own benefit, rests upon the ground, that it is unwise to permit the soil of the country to be in the hands of the subjects of a foreign power, and its revenues to be enjoyed by them; since the state must be impoverished by transporting the revenues of the land into foreign countries, and weakened by putting a part of its territory under subjection to a foreign prince. Now, in a trust of this description, every evil that can flow from the conveyance of the legal title, equally exists; and hence we shall find, that, for centuries past, it 515 has been held *that the use of an alien shall go to the king. Had not this principle been adopted, the courts must either have permitted the alien to enforce the trust, which would have been a direct infraction of the policy of the law; or they must have held the trustee entitled to the property for his own use, which would have been to hold out to him the wages of treachery.

The well received principles of equity concur in sustaining this position. Trusts are considered as the legal ownership, governed by the same rules, and liable to the same charges. The trustee is considered as merely the instrument of conveyance. He is treated as a mere machine used to effect a transfer to the cestui que trust, and is called a conduit, because without deriving any benefit himself, he serves merely to conduct the beneficial interest to another. The cestui que trust, on the other hand, is regarded as the real owner of the estate, and the declaration of the use or trust as the essential part of the instrument. Though courts of law look upon the clause, which binds the feoffee to permit the cestui que use to enjoy the land, as nothing, courts of equity look upon it, as every thing. How, then, is the policy of the law sustained, if the alien may be permitted to become the actual owner, the real beneficiary of the land? if, by this arrangement, he is permitted actually to hold and enjoy it as the ordinary landholder; to receive its rents to use its resources, to spend them if he resides among us, in the acquisition of an influence which is depreciated by law, or if he resides abroad, to withdraw them to foreign lands, and, so far, to sap the foundations of our strength and diminish the wealth and prosperity of our people, by this worst of all kinds of absenteeism. I cannot think that such practices can be endured; for by such means, foreigners by selecting confidential friends as trustees, might ensure the actual enjoyment of the lands for a very long series of years, if not forever, in direct contravention of the policy of the law; (5 Munf. 140,) and that space in the land would be filled up by persons alien to our institutions, and the sub-516 jects *of foreign powers, which ought to be occupied by a faithful yeomanry devoted to the land of their birth or the country of their adoption.

Authority, upon this subject, is, I conceive, equally emphatical. I shall not stop to examine minutely, whether opinions, which have received the sanction of every luminary of the law, from the time of Coke and Roll to our own, were or were not expressed extrajudicially. To the opinion of the venerable sages of the law of ancient times, we are told that great veneration and respect are to be paid, "as evidence that cases have formerly happened, in which such and such points were determined, which are now become settled and first principles." They are among the fountains, from which we draw the common law; and when Coke or Roll or Hale lays down a principle as received, we may safely receive it as an adjudicated principle. If we consider only as dicta, and disregard accordingly, doctrines for which an express adjudication cannot be produced, the most unquestioned principles would be most in danger; for these are most apt to have their sources hidden, in the recesses of a remote antiquity. Confiding then, as I do, in the weight of the authorities, there can be no question, that they concur in establishing that a trust for an alien enures to the crown. Besides the short annunciation of this doctrine in the successive abridgments and elementary writers, to which reference has been made in the argument, I shall content myself with the mention particularly of the well reflected declaration of this opinion on the part of lord Hale as chief baron of the exchequer. In the case of The Duke of York v. Sir John Marsham, Hardr. 432, 436, he cites the case of The King v. Holland, in which he had been counsel. There, an alien had purchased a copyhold, which was conveyed to another in trust for him: and in assigning the reasons upon which, as he says, the right of the crown was declared not to be forfeited, there is no intimation of an idea, that it arose from the interest in the alien being merely equitable. On the contrary, the reasons

517 assigned go as well *to deny the right of the king to a forfeiture of the copyhold itself, even if the alien had taken the legal title. In the following year but one, the case of The Attorney General v. Sands, which had been long under consideration was decided by lord Hale. Hardr. 495. Upon that occasion, the doctrine respecting a trust for an alien, was distinctly pressed upon the court in the argument; and his lordship, in delivering his opinion against the forfeiture in that case, distinctly admits, "that the trust of an inheritance in an alien, is forfeitable, and will belong to the king; as, says he, it was held in Holland's case; and the reason is, because an alien has no capacity to purchase for the benefit of any other but of the king. And it would be otherwise inconvenient, that aliens should receive the profits of lands to their own use, and the mischief would be the same as if aliens purchased the lands themselves; but in that case the king is entitled to the profits only; the land itself is not forfeited to him."

Here then, we have an explicit opinion of lord Hale upon this point, not resting solely upon that in Holland's case, but sustained by reasons suggested by his own accurate mind. We also have an explicit statement of the fact that such was the decision in Holland's case. This statement was doubtless correct, for Hale was of counsel in the case, and his account of the judgment is far more satisfactory than the report in Stiles, in which there appears to me to be some omission, as the resolution of the court no where clearly appears. These decisions, more than 150 years ago, transmitted from generation to generation by the learned, as settled principles of the common law, cannot now with propriety be considered as mere dicta, which should have no influence with the court. As such this court did not consider them in The Commonwealth v. Martin's ex'ors; for there, the only debateable question was, whether the aliens were to be considered as having a trust in the lands; for it seems to have been agreed, on all hands, that, if they had, the right of the commonwealth was not debateable.

518 *The case of Burgess v. Wheate has been cited. Of this case, I think, it may be truly said, that it is of very doubtful authority. It was decided by lord

Northington and sir Thomas Clarke against lord Mansfield; decided as lord Thurlow says, 1 Bro. C. C. 204, upon divided opinions, and opinions, which continue to be divided, of very learned men." And when we find lord Thurlow himself pronouncing, that it was decided "upon the scanty ground of the defect of a tenant," and declaring an executor trustee of personality for the crown for want of next of kin, we cannot err very far in placing him on the side of lord Mansfield in this matter. If we do so, the scales are balanced, and the opinions of other learned men will make that of lord Mansfield decidedly preponderate. See 2 Kent's Comm. 54, citing Sugden's Gilbert on uses, 86, 404. That learned judge there delivers it as received doctrine, that the crown takes the trust of an alien. There, certainly, can be nothing more unreasonable, I think, than this decision of Burgess v. Wheate, if we consider it in any other light than as a mere question of tenure. That the trustee should be permitted, upon the death of the beneficial owner without heirs, to hold the estate to his own use, is utterly at variance, not only with the principles of equity, which consider him as a mere machine, an instrument, a conduit; which declare that trusts and legal estates shall be governed by the same rules, and that the trust shall descend and pass as the legal estate would descend and pass; but, it seems to me, at variance with the natural justice of the case. It is right and proper, that when the owner of property dies without giving it away, and without leaving any object having natural claims to his bounty, such as heirs or next of kin, his property should go to the community of which he is a member. But, in truth, Burgess v. Wheate was decided on the ground of tenure. It was a question of escheat for want of heirs, not of right in the crown because of alienage. And it was decided, that there could be no escheat upon the death of the cestui que trust without heirs, because the trustee was in existence *to do the services. It is to me very obvious, that this principle has no application to the case of an alien. That is not (though it is often inaccurately so spoken of as) a case of escheat. The devolving of the rights of the alien on the crown, is arranged by the most distinguished commentator under the head of forfeiture; though, in a case of more recent date than his work, it is said that it is not to be considered as a penalty or forfeiture, but as arising merely from the policy of law; Attorney General v. Duplessis. Be this as it may, it is confessedly altogether distinct from escheat, of which no further evidence need be required, than that, in case of escheat, the property in England goes to the lord of whom the tenant held, whereas in case of alienation, to an alien, it always goes to the crown, even though the land be holden of a mesne lord. Now, though it be true, as decided in Burgess v. Wheate, that the interest of cestui que trust shall not escheat (that is, devolve upon the lord for want of a tenant) because the lord has in fact a tenant in the trustee; yet it surely does not follow, that the trust estate of an alien, shall not devolve on the crown, for the same reason; since the want of a tenant is not the reason upon which it ever devolves on the crown. The case of Burgess v. Wheate has, therefore, I conceive, no application here.

After the preceding view of the state of the law which bears upon this case, I proceed to remark, very succinctly, upon the facts as they appear to me. I am clearly of opinion, that the doctrine of resulting trusts does not apply to the case. There is no room for a resulting trust where there is an express trust; and here, I think, there was an express trust, in writing, to permit the alien to take and enjoy the rents and profits to him and his heirs. That the land was purchased with Philips's money is admitted: that Brodie always acknowledged that the property was not his but Philips's is certain. From these circumstances, I should infer that, ab ovo, there was an understanding between Brodie and Philips, that the former was to purchase the 520 land *in his own name, and hold it for the latter. Such an understanding was an express trust though verbal.

But it was not a mere verbal trust. It was a trust in writing. That there was a writing executed by the parties, is perfectly clear; and this fact of itself puts the statute of frauds out of the question; for, if the trust or bargain whatever it was, was reduced to writing, the statute cannot apply, even though the contract or writing be lost. What was the precise nature of that writing, we are not informed by the witnesses. They state, however, that it was a writing to secure the title of Celeys. It was executed in Philips's lifetime, and the conduct of the parties amply supplies the defect of the testimony of the witnesses. Was it a bond to make a title? Philips was an alien, and could not take one; else, the deed might have been made to him in the first instance. Was it a bond to make him a title when he should become a citizen? If so, we should probably have heard of his taking some steps towards it. Nothing of that sort appears: no attempt at naturalization appears to have been made, though the facilities to admission had been, before 1805, the date of this transaction, very much increased.

These considerations shew, negatively, what was not the character of the written instrument. The acts of the parties shew pretty clearly, what was the character of the arrangement between the parties; and it would seem natural to suppose, that the writing contained the arrangement, whatever it might be. What was the arrangement? I answer, that Brodie should continue to hold the estate in his own name, but should permit Philips to enter upon the estate, receive the rents and profits, enjoy it as his own, and have it completely under his control. That this was the arrangement is to be presumed, because this was actually done. Philips did take possession; did enjoy, did receive rents and profits, did have complete control of the estate, and died in possession. After his death Goodwin and wife, both aliens, entered, in right of the wife, and held until his death, in the same manner. After Goodwin's death, Mrs. Goodwin, 521 *still an alien, continued to hold in the same manner, until she married Brodie in 1811; and after the marriage, Brodie and herself resided on the property until 1815, when she died. What are we to infer from these facts, but that, although the land was held in Brodie's name, it was arranged between him and his friend, that that friend, though an alien, should be permitted to hold, enjoy and control the estate as his own, under the shadow and protection of the deed from Cary to Brodie. A more complete trust cannot, I think, be conceived, and the right of the commonwealth is a necessary consequence. This right might properly have been asserted in the court of chancery, even in Phillips's lifetime; but since, by his death, the title was devolved on the state, without an office found, there can no longer be a question as to that matter. Moreover, the right of the commonwealth is transferred to the appellee, and he is empowered to assert it in any court of law or equity.

Having thus arrived at the conclusion, that the commonwealth had the right, and that the plaintiff is invested with that right, we next proceed to the defences.

Neither Parker nor Hubbard were purchasers without notice of the trust. If they had so purchased, they would not have been affected by the trust. Yet they must have shewn payment of purchase money, and the receipt of the conveyance to protect them. But, in truth, it is clearly proved they had both sufficient notice, not only before one cent of the money was ever paid, but before Hubbard even became the purchaser.

It was said, this sale was authorized by the guardian and counsel of the appellee. No such authority could have been given by him, for he was an infant; and it was not, therefore, possessed by the parties who exerted it. In fact, at that time, the commonwealth, and not Goodwin, was the party interested.

As to the profits: The commonwealth (or Goodwin who stands in her stead) can come into equity only upon the principle, equitas sequitur legem. They rely that

522 trusts *must be treated as legal estates, and upon that ground assert the rights of the state. If so, then the principle must be followed up to its consequences. We cannot blow both hot and cold. If equity follows the law, it must follow it throughout. Now, at law, until office found, the alien may receive the rents and profits and shall never be accountable for them. 3 Wheat. 563, 589. And this is the consequence, I take it, of the fact, that there is no remedy for such profits. In Wheaton, no case is cited in support of the position; but it seems sufficiently obvious upon this ground simply. The office found merely ascertained title of the crown, whereupon it entered by its officers. But no damages were provided for, nor were damages ever found by the inquest, nor is any remedy devised for the recovery of them. And this was equally the case, whether the alien himself or any other took the profits. Upon office found, they could not be recovered. Now, equity in following the law, cannot go further than the law. Equity, therefore, cannot decree rents and profits. The alien or any other person may take them without accountability, until office found or until some equivalent proceeding. What is the equivalent proceeding in this court? The decree. The office found ascertains the title of the crown, and vests the possession. That is the effect here of a decree, and until the decree there is no such effect. Therefore, I am of opinion, that so much of the decree of the court of chancery as decrees a title to be made to the appellant be affirmed, and, as to all other matters, that it be reversed.

I am clearly of opinion, that the court ought not in this cause to undertake to adjust the transactions between Hubbard and Kennedy. None of the cases in which the court has decreed between defendants, have gone so far. I think it has been done in no case where the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree against both or either. The practice should not be extended further. The contest, if any, between defendants can never come fairly before the court.

523 There is no issue made up, nor any provision for taking *their testimony in reference to the peculiar matters in difference between them. Indeed, it does not follow, that in answer to a plaintiff's bill, the defendant should go on to state his own case in reference to his difference with his co-defendant.

However, as the appellants were both properly made parties in the court of chancery, in reference to the question of title, they must pay the costs of that court. They must have their costs here.

Both decrees reversed, so far as they directed an account of profits, and decreed the payment of the profits by Kennedy and Nimmo's administratrix, and the first decree, for the land itself, affirmed.

Duff v. Duff's Ex'ors.

February, 1832.

Appellate Practice—Capacity of Testator to Make Will—Opinion of Lower Court Affirmed—Case at Bar.

—In a controversy concerning the probate of a will of real as well as personal estate, in a circuit court, the evidence of the witnesses as noted by the Judge, is, by consent, spread on the record: the evidence thus stated, is wholly silent as to the execution of the will by the testator, and attestation by the witnesses; but it is clearly to be collected from the record, that the only point in controversy was, whether the testator was of sound mind and that the due execution of it, supposing him sane, was not disputed: the circuit court, being satisfied that the testator was of sound mind, and, therefore, admitting the will to probate, this court, concurring in the opinion of the circuit court as to the sanity of the testator,

Appellate Practice—Remanding of Causes.—In the principal case upon the question concerning the probate of a will, the only point in controversy was, whether the testator was of sound mind, the question of due execution, supposing him sane not being disputed, the circuit court being satisfied that the testator was of sound mind admitted the will to probate and the appellate court concurring in the opinion as to the sanity of the testator affirmed the sentence. But TUCKER, P., who dissented, thought that the cause ought to be remanded to the circuit court for a new hearing, on which the evidence of due execution might be supplied. In the discussion of the question as to when a cause ought to be remanded to the inferior court for rehearing, TUCKER, P., in the following cases refers to his opinion in the principal case. Miller v. Argyle, 5 Leigh 466; Cropper v. Burtons, 5 Leigh 431; Watkins v. Carlton, 10 Leigh 574; Stillingtons v. Brown, 7 Leigh 275, and note.

affirmed the sentence—Dissentiente. TUCKER, P. who thought, that the cause ought to be remanded to the circuit court for a new hearing, on which the evidence of due execution, now wanting, might be supplied.

A writing purporting to be the last will and testament of Samuel Duff, was offered for probat, by the executors therein named, in the county court of Russell; and Rees Duff, a son of the deceased, appeared to contest the probat. There were six subscribing witnesses to the will; four of whom, and sundry other witnesses, 524 were examined in the *county court; which pronounced sentence, "that the said writing was executed as a will of real and personal estate, according to the statute in such case made and provided, and that the testator, at the time of making and executing the same, was of sound disposing mind and memory;" and therefore, "that the said writing should be established, and recorded, as the last will and testament of the said Samuel Duff deceased." Rees Duff appealed from the sentence to the circuit court.

In the circuit court, the following agreement between the parties, by their counsel, was entered on the record: "It is agreed between the counsel for both parties, that the testimony of the witnesses to be examined upon the hearing of this appeal here, as the same shall be taken down by the judge of the court, shall be used as the evidence in the event of an appeal, to avail as much as if their depositions were regularly taken." The testimony was accordingly noted down by the judge, from the lips of the witnesses; and he prefaced his notes of the evidence, with these words: "Mr. Estill states the case, with the circumstances necessary to enable the court to understand it. The only question is, Was the testator of sound mind when he executed the will?" And then followed the testimony of three of the subscribing witnesses, and of several others, as noted by the judge; all of which related to the question of sanity only: no question was asked, by the counsel on either side, or by the court, touching any other point. It appeared that the will was written for the testator, by one of the witnesses; and in the testimony of the three subscribing witnesses examined in the circuit court, as stated by the judge, not a word was said concerning the execution of the will, or their attestation thereof. The circuit court, upon consideration of the evidence, affirmed the sentence of the county court; and then Rees Duff appealed to this court.

Leigh, for the appellant, discussed the question as to the testator's sanity, upon the evidence. And he admitted, that 525 *it was sufficiently apparent from the record, that that was, in fact, the only point of dispute in the courts below; yet, he said, there was such a fatal defect in the proof of this will, as stated in the record, that this court could not affirm the sentence, even if it should think the testator's sanity unquestionable. There was no proof whatever, that the will was attested by the subscribing witnesses, in the presence of the testator; no proof, indeed, that the will was executed by the testator, in any way. In the actual state of the proof, he thought, the court must reverse the sentence; and, either pronounce sentence against the will (which, if it should concur in opinion with the courts below, as to the sanity of the testator, it would, he was aware, under the circumstances of the case, be very loath to do); or remand the cause to the circuit court, for a rehearing there, in order that the whole case might be fully stated on the record.

Johnson, for the appellees, maintained, that there could be no reasonable doubt, that the testator was of sound disposing mind and memory. If, for the defect in the proof as to the execution and attestation of the will, this court should reverse the sentence, he said, the latter alternative suggested by the appellant's counsel, was certainly the proper course: the court would never pronounce a sentence, which would, in effect, set aside and annul a good will, upon a ground, on which the party opposed to it, never thought of contesting it. But he contended, that this court ought to pay no regard to the supposed defect in the proof. The parties agreed, that the judge's notes of the testimony, should be substituted in place of depositions regularly taken; and thus adopted his state of the case and of the controversy; and he prefaced his state of the evidence, by saying, that Mr. Estill stated the case, with the circumstances necessary to enable the court to understand it; and that the only question was, whether the testator was of sound mind when he executed the will? Now, it was plain, the judge stated that this was 526 the only question, because Estill said *it was so; and plain, that Estill was the appellant's counsel, since he opened the case, in the circuit court: and, as the only question he raised, was as to the sanity of the testator at the time of the execution of the will, he admitted the due execution, if the testator was sane. The evidence in the circuit court, was properly confined to the only question of fact in dispute, the sanity of the testator. In the county court, the evidences as to the execution and attestation had been adduced; and the sentence of the county court shewed, that due execution and attestation was proved there.

CARR, J. It is clear from the record, and was admitted in the very candid argument of counsel, that the sole matter in contest in the courts below, was, Whether the testator was of sound mind when he executed the will? The question of due execution of the will, formed no part of the controversy; and I cannot doubt, that we ought, on this record, to take it as a point admitted by the parties. The record shews, that, in the county court, the due execution of the will was regularly proved. In the circuit court, it seems from the entry on the record, that before the cause was gone into, the counsel agreed, that, in case of appeal, the testimony, as the same should be taken by the judge, should be used as evidence. This I understand to be a substitution of the judge's notes of the evidence, for regular depositions, and thus making those notes a part of the record; especially, as we must of necessity conclude, that his statement was examined and agreed to by the counsel. The judge, being aware of this substitution, would of course be more full and particular in taking his notes. Mr. Estill I take to have been counsel for the appellant, because the judge's notes shew, that he was the opening counsel. Now the judge begins his notes, thus: "Mr. Estill states the case, with the circumstances, which are necessary to enable the court, to understand it. The only question is, was the testator of sound mind when he executed the will?"

527 *This is the introduction to the testimony, and was no doubt taken from the lips of Mr. Estill, as he opened the cause. I repeat, it is agreed to, and made part of the record by the counsel, and must be taken by us as forming a portion of the case. The conclusion from it is irresistible to my mind, that the parties were satisfied with the proof of the due execution of the will, and meant only to contest the capacity of the testator. What the parties admit need never be proved. Three of the witnesses to the will are examined before the circuit court, and it is stated by them, that they did witness it, but in that general and incidental way which shews that this was not the matter in contest. It would, I think, have a very mischievous effect, if we were to suffer a party, not merely to stand by, but actively to co-operate in thus turning the cause into another channel, and then come to a superiour court upon some formal point, from which his own conduct has led off the attention of the court below.

With respect to the soundness of the testator's mind, at the time of executing the will, I am clearly of opinion, that the sentence of the courts below, is correct; and I think it ought in all things to be affirmed.

CABELL, J. I am of the same opinion.

TUCKER, P. I am of opinion, that, in this case, the evidence in behalf of the sanity of the testator preponderates. But this is not sufficient to sustain the sentence of the courts below. The record exhibits no proof of the due execution of the will, according to the statute. The question before us admits of no division: it is integral. We are to pronounce, not upon the mere question of sanity, but upon the propriety of admitting this will to record, as a will of real and personal estate. We can neither infer any admission, nor that any testimony was given, other than what has been inserted in the record; both because the statute requires all the evidence to be spread upon it, and because it appears, that, in point of fact, that was done. The 528 consequence *must be, as I think, a reversal of the sentence; but in what manner and upon what terms, it is important to ascertain.

Before the act of 1810, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 64, § 18, p. 194, which required the testimony to be spread upon the record, in cases of probat, where either party desired to appeal, the appeal brought before this court the whole question of fact as well as of law; and the parties were not tied down to the evidence that had been given in the court below, but were at liberty to fortify it, and to maintain their case by any additional testimony that was deemed necessary. Hence a defect (such as has occurred in this case) might always have been corrected by farther examinations here. But that cannot now be done. The statute of 1810 declares, that "it shall not be lawful for the court of appeals in any civil action to hear or receive parol testimony;" and from that date, this court has always held, that it was confined to the testimony spread upon the record, in all cases concerning mills, roads, probats of wills, or grants of administration. We cannot, therefore, supply the defect in this case by an examination of the attesting witnesses, as to the ceremonies which attended the execution of this will. Yet a reversal out and out, in this case, might produce manifest injustice. It was said by judge Green, in Bagwell v. Elliott, 2 Rand. 200, that "if a will offered for probat be contested and rejected, this might be used thereafter, as the decision of a competent judicial tribunal, and would condemn it forever." And in England, a sentence in the ecclesiastical court as to the validity of a will of personality (as to which alone that court has jurisdiction) is conclusive between the parties to it, until repealed. Phil. Law Ev. [264].* To give to the decision in this case, such an effect, would be in conflict with what, from the facts before us, we suppose may be the justice of this case. What then is the rule of practice, which should be pursued, in 529 order *to adapt the decisions of the court to the principles of justice, under the new state of proceeding established by the statute of 1810?

We shall look in vain for precedents to guide us in this matter, among the former decisions of this court, as the difficulty we encounter, could not embarrass those who have gone before us. However, in Wilcox v. Rootes, 1 Wash. 140, we find enough to satisfy us, that the court in pronouncing sentence against the will, thought itself impowered to do so without prejudice to the probat of any other will which might be produced. The necessity of such a precaution is not, indeed, obvious; but its adoption affords evidence of the caution of the court at that time. In the recent case of Smith v. Jones, 6 Rand. 33, this court was of opinion, that the testimony in the record did not sustain the instrument as a valid will of real estate; but the subscribing witness, who put the testator's name and mark to the will, had not been examined, and it was very probable that his testimony would have supplied the deficiency: And the court sent the cause back, that his testimony might be taken. But, as it appears from the opinion of the judge in that case, that an application had been made to the court below, for an opportunity to procure the evidence of the witness, which was improperly refused, the order sending back the cause for further proceedings, should, perhaps, be ascribed to that error, rather than to any general principle which should govern in cases like the present.

We are driven, therefore, I conceive, to proceed according to well received principles, and analogies in the law. Now, nothing is more clear, than that when a cause, of whatever kind, has been once fairly and fully heard and decided upon its merits, the judgment or sentence is conclusive between the same parties, in any other controversy about the same matter. The rule of law is, nemo debet bis vexari pro eadem causa, 2 W. Black. 831, 5 Co. 31, 5 Bac. Abr. 440,

530 though, where the action is only mis- conceived, *or the judgment is given for a fault in the declaration or pleadings, or upon the manner not the matter of the plea, the judgment is not conclusive of the rights of the parties. So if the party demurs to the evidence, the judgment upon that demurrer, is final and conclusive, and no subsequent suit will lie for the same cause of action. So, if upon a special verdict, the facts are so specially found, as to enable the court to give judgment according to the right of the case, such judgment will be rendered, and will be final and conclusive. But if a special verdict be so uncertain or defective, that the court cannot pronounce judgment according to the right of the case, or if it appears from the verdict itself, that there is some other fact necessary to be ascertained, a venire de novo must be awarded. It is scarcely necessary to cite cases to this point: but that of Bond v. Seawell, 3 Burr. 1773, is too apposite to be omitted. In that case, two of the witnesses to the will had never seen the first sheet of it; but as the court was of opinion, that, if the first sheet was in the room at the time of attestation, it was sufficient, the special verdict, which had not found as to that fact, was set aside, and a venire de novo awarded.

The same principles run through the whole of our proceedings. Thus, if a bill of exceptions states a case so that the court can clearly discern the right, judgment will be pronounced accordingly; but if it states the case imperfectly, if it shews upon its face, that there is some other matter, which was necessary to have been stated, in order to a fair decision, the case will be sent back for a new trial. So of the pleadings: if the declaration be radically defective, shewing no cause of action whatever, a repleader can never be awarded; but where it does not state a defective case, but only states a good case defectively, a repleader will be awarded; the proceedings will be set aside up to the writ, and the parties permitted to begin de novo. 2 Salk. 579; 5 Bac. Abr. Pleas and Pleadings, M. 3, p. 457; 1 Chitt. plead. 634.

531 *All these principles are but contrivances of the courts to come at the justice of the case; to prevent, on the one hand, the renewal of litigation on a matter once fully adjudicated, and, on the other, to avoid rendering a final and conclusive sentence, where the proceedings themselves evince, that there is some fact not ascertained, which is susceptible of being established, and which ought to be ascertained, in order to enable the judge to pronounce judgment according to the right of the case.

Pursuing these principles, I am of opinion, that where the court sees that the whole case on a question of probat, is fairly before it, it ought to pronounce a general and definitive sentence, affirming or reversing the sentence of the court below: but where it is obviously otherwise, it is in its discretion, to send the cause back for further proceedings, unless the conduct of the party has excluded him from the privilege.

Thus, in the case before us: the defect is, that there is no testimony in the record, as to the execution of the will. Yet there are six subscribing witnesses. These witnesses would prove, that the will either was, or was not, duly executed. At present, they prove neither. Hence we see, that the very gist of the case is not presented. The essential fact is susceptible of being ascertained, but is not ascertained. This court has no information about it. Therefore, in my opinion, the cause ought to be sent back. This is the more reasonable here, as the decision of the court in favour of the will, or some agreement, not appearing in the record, admitting the execution of it, may have lulled the executors into security. A party can never be in fault for not producing farther testimony, when the tribunal which sits in judgment upon his case, tells him there is sufficient. If that tribunal be mistaken, he is surely entitled to a new hearing of the cause.

But the other judges being satisfied with the sentence, in all respects, it is affirmed.

532 *Conrad v. Harrison and Others.

March, 1832.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Mortgages—Subsequent Mortgage of Same Land—Order of Liability.—S. mortgages a parcel of 300 acres of land to B. to secure a debt due to him; then S. mortgages all of the same land, except 75 acres, to H. to secure debt due to him, these 75 acres being excepted and reserved out of this second mortgage, because the mortgagor was then in treaty with a third person for the sale thereof to him, which treaty was afterwards broken off; and then S. mortgages the whole parcel of 300 acres to C. to secure a debt due to him: HELD,

1. Same—Same—Marshalling Assets.—That H. the second mortgagee, has a right, as against Sisson the mortgagor, B. the first mortgagee and C. the third mortgagee, to insist that the debt due to B. shall be satisfied out of the parcel of 75 acres reserved out of the second mortgage to H. so as to leave that part of the subject mortgaged to H. untouched, and applicable to the satisfaction of the debt due him: and.

2. Same—Same—Order of Liability.—That C. the third mortgagee, has no right to call on H. the second mortgagee, to contribute, pro rata, to the satisfaction of the debt due to B. the first mortgagee.

Same—Case Doubted.—The proposition, that where "a judgment is recovered against a debtor, and then the debtor alien his lands to divers alienees by divers conveyances, all the debtor's lands, in the hands of his several alienees, are alike liable to the judgment creditor, and the lands in the hands of the several alienees must contribute pro rata to satisfy the judgment," stated by the court in Beverley v. Brooke, 2 Leigh. 428, doubted, but held not applicable to the present case.

Successive Alienation of Incumbered Land—Order of Liability.—On this question the principal case is cited in the following: McClung v. Bierne, 10 Leigh 402, 408, and note; Henkle v. Allstadt, 4 Gratt. 292; Alley v. Rogers, 19 Gratt. 389, and note; Jones v. Phelan, 20 Gratt. 241, 242, 243; McClintic v. Wise, 25 Gratt. 456; Whitten v. Saunders, 75 Va. 569; Miller v. Holland, 84 Va. 656, 5 S. E. Rep. 701; 2 Va. Law Reg. 702. To the point that where part of a tract of land subject to a lien is conveyed, the residue is primarily liable for the whole debt, the principal case is cited in Baughner v. Elchelberger, 11 W. Va. 226; Payne v. Webb, 23 W. Va. 664.

See monographic note on "Mortgages" appended to Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197, and "Marshalling Assets" appended to Carrington v. Didier, 8 Gratt. 280.

John Brock, by deed dated the 4th June, 1817, sold and conveyed to Jesse Sisson, a parcel of 360 acres of land in the county of Rockingham, for 7000 dollars; of which Sisson paid Brock 2000 dollars in cash, and, by deed of the same date, conveyed the whole of the land to Henry Gambill, in trust to secure the payment of the balance of the purchase money, 5000 dollars, in instalments. Sisson, having made sundry payments to Brock, and reduced the debt he owed him to about 400 dollars, and being indebted to Reuben Harrison and Jesse Cravens, in the sum of 3212 dollars, by deed dated the 23rd February 1822, conveyed the land he had bought of Brock, "except about 75 acres on the east side of the tract, which the said Sisson was about to sell to Peter Durrow," to Philip Koontz, in 533 trust *to secure the debt of 3212 dollars due to Harrison and Cravens. At the time this last mentioned deed of trust was executed, Sisson was in treaty with Durrow, for the sale to him of the 75 acres reserved by the deed; but that treaty was afterwards broken off, and no sale was made to Durrow. By deed dated the 4th April 1824, Sisson conveyed the whole of the land he had bought of Brock (including the 75 acres, which he had reserved out of his mortgage to Harrison and Cravens) to the same Philip Koontz, in trust to secure the payment of a debt of 820 dollars due to Henry Conrad. All these deeds were duly recorded: besides, Conrad, as well as his trustee Koontz, had full notice of all the preceding conveyances and incumbrances; and Harrison and Cravens, when they took their mortgage of February 1822, had full notice of the previous mortgage to Brock. After the execution of the deed of trust to secure the debt due to Conrad, Harrison, one of the cestuis que trust and creditors secured by the deed of February 1822, purchased Sisson's equity of redemption in the whole of the land that had been bought of Brock, and procured from Brock, an assignment of his claim for the balance of about 400 dollars yet remaining due to him, and of the deed of trust of the 4th June 1817, executed by Sisson to secure the debt to Brock.

In a bill exhibited in the superiour court of chancery of Staunton, by Conrad against Harrison, Cravens, Sisson, and the trustee Gambill (the trustee Koontz was not a party, having died before suit brought) the purpose of which was to adjust the rights of the incumbrancers, and to settle the priorities among them; Conrad insisted, that the balance of 400 dollars due to Brock and by him assigned to Harrison, should be satisfied out of that part of the land, which was mortgaged to Harrison and Cravens, by the deed of trust executed by Sisson to Koontz, of February 1824, leaving the 75 acres (reserved by the exception in that deed) which Sisson was then about to sell to Durrow, untouched, and applicable, in the first 534 instance, to the satisfaction of the

of June 1817, to which Harrison was entitled by assignment from Brock, ought to be charged upon and satisfied out of the 75 acres, which were reserved in Sisson's deed of trust to Koontz to secure the debt due Harrison and Cravens, leaving that part of the land which was mortgaged by that deed, untouched, and applicable to the satisfaction of the debt of 3212 dollars thereby secured to Harrison and Cravens.

The chancellor declared, that Conrad had no right to require, that the 75 acres should be exempted from the lien of Brock's mortgage of June 1817, to the benefit whereof Harrison was entitled, since the effect of such exemption would be to throw the whole burden of that first incumbrance, upon the only subject embraced by the second mortgage to Harrison and Cravens, of February 1822, for the advantage of Conrad, the third and last incumbrancer. Therefore, he decreed and ordered, That the 75 acres should be sold by the marshal of the court, and that the nett proceeds of the sale thereof should be applied, first to the payment, to Harrison as assignee of Brock, of the balance due upon Brock's mortgage of June 1817, and the residue, if any, to the payment of the debt due to Conrad upon his mortgage of April 1824. And that, the 75 acres being first sold, the residue of the land should then be sold by the marshal, and the nett proceeds of sale applied in the following order: 1st, to the payment of any balance of the debt due to Harrison on Brock's mortgage, that might remain unsatisfied after applying the proceeds of sale of the 75 acres to that debt; 2ndly, to the payment, to Harrison and Cravens, of the debt due them on their mortgage of February 1822; 3rdly, to the payment of the debt due Conrad, upon his mortgage of April 1824; and 4thly, if there should be 535 any balance remaining, that should be paid into court, subject to future order. From this decree, Conrad appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant. 1. Conrad was entitled to priority of satisfaction out of the parcel of 75 acres. For, the intent of the parties to the deed of February 1822, whereby 75 acres of the land, which Sisson was about to sell to Durrow, was excepted and reserved out of the mortgage to Harrison and Cravens, was, to enable Sisson to sell that parcel of 75 acres, clear and unincumbered to Durrow; and if that parcel had been sold to Durrow, Harrison and Cravens, who, with such intent, and with full knowledge of Brock's incumbrance at the time, assented to the reservation of it, ought not to have been allowed, as against Durrow, to insist that the debt due to Brock should be charged upon it, in exoneration of the parcel mortgaged to them. Neither could their rights be varied or made better, by the circumstance, that, not Durrow, but Conrad, became the purchaser of the 75 acres; they intended to leave it in Sisson's power, to sell a clear unincumbered title in that parcel; and it made no odds to them, who was the purchaser. But, 2. supposing Conrad not to be entitled to priority in respect of the 75 acres; yet here, in effect, the whole of the subject was first mortgaged to Brock, and then part of it mortgaged to Harrison and Cravens, and last, the residue of it mortgaged to Conrad. And Conrad has a right to insist, that the part mortgaged to Harrison and Cravens, shall contribute, rateably with the part mortgaged to him, to the satisfaction of the debt due to Brock the eldest incumbrancer; and this in strict analogy to the settled principle of the law, that if a judgment be recovered binding the lands of the debtor, and then the debtor sell parcels of the lands to several purchasers, at several times, all the purchasers shall contribute, in just proportion, to the satisfaction of the judgment. 5 Vin. Abr. Contribution and Average, A. pl. 3, 4, 6, 7, 12, 19, p. 561, 2; 6 Bac. Abr. Scire facias, C. 5, p. 114, 115; Harbert's case, 3 Co. 11. The doctrine 536 has *been applied in equity; and so applied, as to compel several purchasers of lands previously mortgaged, to contribute to the satisfaction of the debt due on the mortgage. Cheesborough v. Millard, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 409; Mayo v. Tomkies, 6 Munf. 520, 8; Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384. In Beverley v. Brooke, 2 Leigh, 426, 439, 444, where a judgment had been recovered against a debtor holding lands, and the debtor had afterwards aliened his lands to several purchasers at divers times, I endeavoured to maintain, for the eldest purchaser, that the lands in the hands of the junior purchaser, ought, in equity, to be first subjected and applied to the satisfaction of the judgment debt: but the court held, that the law was perfectly settled otherwise; that "all the alienees of the lands of a debtor bound by a judgment or recognizance, no matter in what order the alienations were made, are bound to bear equally the burden of satisfying the judgment, by mutual contributions, pro rata, according to the value of the property held by them; all being considered as in æquali jure, without regard to the priority of their purchases or conveyances."

Leigh, for the appellees. 1. When Harrison and Cravens took their mortgage of February 1822, whereby the 75 acres, which Sisson was about to sell Durrow, were reserved out of the mortgage, they had no other intent than to obtain adequate security for the debt due to them, and they acted under the belief, that the part of the land mortgaged to them was adequate security for the debt. They knew that Brock had a mortgage of the whole land; and that they would have a right, as against Brock and Sisson, to compel Brock to take satisfaction out of the part which was mortgaged to him but not to them. It was no part of their duty to take care of the interests of Durrow, or any other purchaser from Sisson, of the 75 acres. It was the purchaser's business to take care of himself, and to see that the purchase money he contracted to pay Sisson, should be applied to relieve the subject from Brock's incumbrance.

537 The *purchaser of the 75 acres stood in Sisson's place; he purchased Sisson's rights; he purchased subject to all claims, legal or equitable, which attached thereto in Sisson's hands. 2. As to the question of contribution among the junior mortgagees, to satisfy the eldest mortgage;

the proposition contended for, seems hardly reconcilable with the fundamental principle or maxim, that regulates priorities among equitable incumbrancers: Qui prior est in tempore, potior est in jure. To say, that in the case of a mortgage of a subject, followed by successive mortgages of the equity of redemption of the whole of the same subject, every elder shall have priority over every junior mortgagee throughout—but that, if after the mortgage of the whole subject, there shall be several mortgages of several parts of it, to different persons, at different times, all the junior mortgagees of the equity of redemption, shall contribute, pro rata, out of the parts mortgaged to them, respectively, to pay off the debt due on the first mortgage,—seems a very odd distinction. There may be more reason, perhaps, for a distinction between the cases of subsequent absolute purchasers of parcels of a subject under mortgage, and mere mortgagees of the parcels: but even this distinction would be irreconcilable with general principles of equity. Chancellor Kent has decided, upon full consideration and the strongest reason, that there shall be no contribution between purchasers, at several times, in succession, of several parcels of lands under the lien of a prior judgment, or of a prior mortgage. Gill v. Lyon, 1 John. Ch. Rep. 447; Cloves v. Dickenson, 5 Id. 235, 241, 2. I must own, that, in the argument of Beverley v. Brooke, though Mr. Johnson did not cite the decisions of chancellor Kent in the cases just mentioned, yet he urged, and with great force too, the same general reasoning, on which that judge founded his opinion; but as it was only a minor point in that cause, and no authorities upon it were cited at the bar, the argument in support of it was not reported. But Beverley v. Brooke is not exactly in point to the present case: the eldest lien in that case, 538 *was a judgment; and this court sitting in chancery, placed the subsequent mortgagees in the same situation, in which it supposed the law would have placed them, if the judgment creditor had sued out a scire facias against them as terre tenants. Mayo v. Tomkies is not at all in point: there, the subsequent purchasers of the parcels of the mortgaged lands, claimed under a devise which charged the parcels equally.

CARR, J. The only serious question in this case, is that which has been raised, and very well argued, on the subject of contribution. I have laboured exceedingly, to understand it; but I feel doubtful of my success; especially, as the present inclination of my mind seems opposed to my former opinion.

I premise, that I do not think this question at all affected by the exception or reservation in the deed from Sisson to Koontz for the benefit of Harrison and Cravens, nor by the understanding, which the appellant's counsel supposed, existed between the parties to that deed. For the intent and design of the parties, we must consult the deed itself. That gives a lien on Sisson's land, except 75 acres on the east side of the tract. As to the land thus excepted, Harrison and Cravens have no claim on it as a security for the debt due them: but that is all: they say nothing as to the effect of Brock's lien upon it; much less do they stipulate to relinquish any right, which their position as incumbrancers may give them, to throw Brock's lien on this excepted land. We must, then, decide this as a general question.

Considering Conrad's claim to preference over Harrison, by throwing Brock's lien off the 75 acres, wholly unfounded, has he a right to stand on equal ground with Harrison? to claim a rateable contribution of him, in the payment of Brock's debt? It lies at the very root of this doctrine of contribution, that the parties shall stand in æquali jure. The vendor or his heir can never call on his vendee for contribution.

Suppose, after Sisson's deed to Harrison *and Cravens, and before that to Conrad, Brock's trustee had advertised, and sold the 75 acres retained by Sisson; he could never have called on Harrison to bear his part of a common burden. So far from it, if Brock's trustee had advertised the whole land for sale, there can be no doubt, that Harrison and Cravens could have enjoined the sale of the part covered by their deed, until it should be found, that the sale of Sisson's 75 acres would not satisfy Brock's lien; and for such deficiency only would the residue of the land have been liable. So, if Sisson had died, and this land (the 75 acres) had descended to his heirs, it would have been first liable in their hands, nor could they have asked contribution of any body; except indeed of each other, if they had borne the burden unequally. Harrison and Cravens, then, having this 75 acres between them and Brock's lien, when they took their deed, is there any act or omission of their's since, which could deprive him of this protection? None such is relied on. Could the sale or mortgage of this 75 acres by Sisson to Conrad, with full notice, change the equity of the parties, and give Conrad a right to contribution, which all must admit Sisson had not? This would violate that settled rule, that a vendee with notice, takes the land with all its equitable burdens, and stands precisely in the shoes of his vendor. Look at the position of these parties; do they stand in æquali jure? I think not. Harrison and Cravens took their deed, knowing they had the 75 acres between them in danger: Conrad took the 75 acres, with the same knowledge: a knowledge calculated, essentially, to influence the contract of each. Suppose a man had bought a thousand acres of land, at the price of 10,000 dollars; that he had mortgaged it for the purchase money, and had paid all of it but 1000 dollars; and another wants to buy a hundred acres of this land: in making his contract, it will not weigh a feather in the scale, that the whole tract is still bound for 1000 dollars, while he knows that nine hundred acres still remain in his vendor's hands liable for this balance, before the hundred acres he 540 proposes *to buy can be charged. He would, without hesitation, give the full price, and pay the money, satisfied that the lien could never touch him. But suppose the vendee of the thousand acres, had sold to different purchasers nine hundred acres, and offered the last hundred to another, with the original lien for 1000 dollars still on the tract? assuredly, his prospects in the purchase would be very different; and common prudence would induce him to pause, till he should see clearly how the incumbrance was to be met. It seems plain to me, therefore, that the successive purchasers, or incumbrancers, do not stand in æquali jure; and that no one who comes after, can call on those before him for contribution. Sir W. Harbert's case, 3 Co. 11, b, when carefully examined, will be found to rest on these principles of equity. The same subject is very ably handled by chancellor Kent, in several cases; especially in Clowes v. Dickenson.

If it be asked, how I can reconcile this decision with that of Beverley v. Brooke, in which I sat, and agreed fully with the rest of the court? I answer, that I cannot reconcile them to my own satisfaction. I can only say, that, in each, I have decided as I thought right. I well remember to have examined with care, the authorities cited in Beverley v. Brooke, by our excellent and learned brother [Green, J.] whose aid I most sincerely wish we had now; and to have thought his deductions from them correct. In that case, the decisions of chancellor Kent now cited, so powerful in their reasoning, seemed to have escaped both the bar and the bench. There was no reference to them. The counsel, indeed, took the ground in argument; but we thought all the authorities were the other way.

I am for affirming the decree.

CABELL, J. As to the first point, it is enough to say, that I concur with judge Carr, that the exception of the 75 acres out of the deed of trust of February 1822, to secure the debt due Harrison and Cravens, furnishes no ground to sustain Conrad's claim to priority of satisfaction out of that reserved parcel.

541 *The other question is, Whether, on general principles, Brock's debt, which every body admits must be provided for, is to be first charged on the parcel of 75 acres? or whether it is to be charged, rateably, on that parcel and on the residue of the land conveyed in trust to Cravens and Harrison? There is no difference, as to this question, between creditors secured by mortgage, and creditors secured by deed of trust; and as the case may be thereby simplified, I will consider it as if Sisson were mortgagor and Brock mortgagee of the whole tract, and Harrison and Cravens, and Conrad, were subsequent mortgagees, each, of particular parts of the tract.

All mortgages, whether original or subsequent, are regarded, in a court of equity, as mere equitable incumbrances for the security of the debt; and it is the business of that court, so to mould and direct these equities, as to effect the purposes of justice.

If there were no other persons concerned in this case, than Sisson the mortgagor, Brock the first mortgagee, and Harrison and Cravens the second mortgagees, all would admit, that a court of equity, in providing payment for Brock's debt, ought so to direct it as not unnecessarily to lessen or impair the security of Harrison and Cravens; and, consequently, that Brock's lien ought to be made to fall, in the first place, on the 75 acres not included in the mortgage to Harrison and Cravens, and in which Sisson and Brock were alone interested. If this would be so, in that case, I cannot conceive how the alienee of Sisson's equity of redemption, can stand on better ground than Sisson himself. And, accordingly, there never has been a case, where one of two subsequent mortgagees were held to be contributory to the other. They are not in equal right; but the last mortgage takes in subordination to him who precedes him.

It is supposed, that the case of Beverley v. Brooke is in conflict with these principles. But that case is different from this, in some important respects. That was not the 542 *case of subsequent incumbrances, after a prior mortgage, but after a prior judgment. In that case, English had obtained a judgment against Pickett, who afterwards mortgaged a part of his lands to Beverley, and then, the whole to Scott. English, by his judgment, had a legal lien, and could have taken out an elegit against all the lands of Pickett; and it was not competent to a court of equity, to restrain or limit him in the exercise of that legal right. Besides, he was not plaintiff, nor did he ask any thing of a court of equity. He stood on his legal rights, which bound all of Pickett's lands; and this court, conforming to the law, executed that lien, by directing that all the lands should contribute, rateably towards the satisfaction of his judgment. Whether that decision was right or not, it will be time enough to inquire when a similar case shall occur. It is sufficient, for the present, to say, that that case is materially different from this; for here, the original lien is merely an equitable incumbrance, and not a lien by judgment; and here, the person claiming contribution, is plaintiff in equity, and therefore, can ask nothing but equity.

I concur in the opinion, that the decree should be affirmed.

TUCKER, P. The rights of the parties in this case, must first be examined upon general principles of law, independent of the influence, which the exception in the deed of trust of February 1822, is supposed to have upon it. In this regard, Conrad's pretensions will be found to rest on no reasonable foundation. Brock having a deed of trust on the whole land, and Harrison and Cravens a subsequent deed of trust on one part of it, and Conrad a still later deed of trust on the whole, it is found, that there will not be enough to pay all. Brock must be paid, for he has the first lien. Harrison and Cravens, or Conrad, must lose. Which ought to be the loser, the prior or the subsequent incumbrancer? The latter, assuredly. Conrad does not think so: but he can sustain his claim, only by shewing 543 that he has a right, either to throw the whole burden from his *shoulders upon Harrison and Cravens, or a part of that burden by compelling them to pay rateably.

That Conrad should throw the whole burden upon Harrison and Cravens, who obtained their lien before he obtained his, would indeed be without example. The principle is clear, that where a first incumbrancer (as Brock in this case) has two funds to resort to, and a subsequent incumbrancer but one, the latter may compel the former to seek satisfaction out of that on which he has no lien, provided he does not thereby interfere with the superiour rights of a third person. Thus, if Harrison and Cravens had no incumbrance, Conrad might demand that his 75 acres should be relieved, and the burden thrown on that portion which would yet have remained in the debtor's hands. But Harrison and Cravens have an incumbrance on that part; an incumbrance prior to Conrad's; and it would reverse the order of things, and upturn the established principles of equity, if he, who is subsequent in point of time, should be prior in point of right. Conrad, therefore, has no pretension to throw the whole burden upon Harrison and Cravens.

Neither is he entitled to throw any part of the burden upon them. Before he purchased, no person had that right. His purchase was made with knowledge of their lien, and of Brock's incumbrance, and with presumed knowledge of the legal effect of those liens. Would it be just or reasonable, that Harrison and Cravens, without any fault, or assent on their part, should thus be incumbered with any part of this burden? Far otherwise; for they not only have a right to resist Conrad's pretensions to throw the burden on them, but if Brock himself had been about to do so, they would have been entitled to demand that the whole burden should have been thrown upon Conrad. This is a necessary consequence of the principle of equity, already stated, that where a first incumbrancer has two funds to resort to, and the subsequent incumbrancer can only charge one of them, the first incumbrancer shall be compelled to seek redress, *in the first 544 instance from the other fund. Thus, if Sisson still held the 75 acres of land, Harrison and Cravens would have a clear right to demand that Brock's 400 dollars should be paid out of that parcel, if adequate to the purpose, so as to leave their fund untouched. It is no sufficient objection to this, that Harrison and Cravens would thus, in effect, have satisfaction out of a fund on which they had no lien. That objection has never been considered availing, since the case of Lanoy v. The Duke of Athol, 2 Atk. 444. See Attorney General v. Tyndall, Amb. 614; Aldrich v. Cooper, 8 Ves. 381. The principle is firmly established, and cannot now be called in question, that if two funds of a debtor are liable to one creditor, and only one fund to another, the former shall be thrown upon that fund, to which the other cannot resort, in order that he may avail himself of his only security.

Now, if upon the execution of the deed of trust to them, Harrison and Cravens had this right against Sisson, they must have the same right against Conrad, because when Conrad purchased, he took his 75 acres, subject to its liability in the hands of the debtor, in preference to the land already incumbered to Harrison and Cravens. He sits (as has been well said) in the seat of his grantor, and must take the land with all its equitable burdens. It cannot be in the power of the debtor, by the act of selling the remaining land to discharge it, and throw the burden back upon Harrison and Cravens. If so, we should then have this unheard of state of things, that one man shall lose his rights and property, without his fault or his assent, and another shall be enabled to take them away without an equivalent. The equity of Harrison and Cravens, therefore, as against Sisson, to throw the burden upon his 75 acres, still subsists as against Conrad, who purchased from him with a full knowledge of all the facts, and a presumed knowledge of all the legal consequences of those facts.

But it is said to be settled, that all the alienees of the lands of a debtor, are bound to contribute, rateably, to the 545 *satisfaction of a judgment which binds them, without regard to the time or order of their purchases. And it is contended, that the case of a mortgage does not differ from that of a judgment, nor the case of incumbrancers from that of alienees.

That the principle contended for is in direct conflict with that which, I think, has been already shewn to be established, is sufficiently obvious. That it is in conflict with the reason of the thing, seems equally plain. "If," says chancellor Kent, "there be several purchasers in succession, at different times, I apprehend, that, in that case also, there is no equality, and no contribution as between those purchasers. Thus, for instance, if there be a judgment against a person owning three acres of land, and he sells one acre to A. the two remaining acres are first chargeable in equity, with the payment of the judgment debt, whether the land be in the hands of the debtor or of his heirs. If he sells another acre to B. the remaining acre is then chargeable, in the first instance, with the debt as against B. as well as against A. and if it should prove insufficient, then the acre sold to B. ought to supply the deficiency, in preference to the acre sold to A. because, when B. purchased, he took his land chargeable with the debt in the hands of the debtor, in preference to the land already sold to A. In this respect, we may say of him, as is said of the heir, he sits in the seat of his grantor, and must take the land with all its equitable burdens. It cannot be in the power of the debtor, by the act of assigning or selling his remaining land, to throw the burden of the judgment, or a rateable part of it, back upon A." Upon these principles, set forth in Clowes v. Dickenson, chancellor Kent proceeded in that case, and on the same principles, he had previously decided the case of Gill v. Lyons. I do not perceive how the reasoning, or the conclusion, of the judge can be successfully controverted. His decisions, indeed, are not binding authority upon this court; but we are bound to follow the light of reason, from whatever luminary it may be poured upon us.

546 *Sustained by this high opinion, I should have no difficulty in pronouncing, that a subsequent alienee or incumbrancer of one of several mortgaged subjects, can never call upon a precedent incumbrancer of another, for contribution, but for the case of Beverley v. Brooke, in which the common law doctrines are cited, approved and enforced, in reference to incumbrancers, and that too in a court of equity. Without questioning the truth of the doctrine at law, I should have conceived the principles of chancellor Kent would have prevailed in equity. The distinction between the cases grows out of the difference of the tribunals, as happens in a thousand instances. It rests upon principles of equity unknown to the common law, and the creatures of courts of chancery; principles, which form a part of that artificial but beneficent system, which has so admirably contrived to soften the rigour of the common law, and to transfer the purest ethics through the whole of our jurisprudence.

While, however, the case of Beverley v. Brooke stands as the law of the court, we are not justified in taking a distinction from the difference of the tribunals of law and equity: that was a case in equity as well as this. But that was the case of a judgment; this, of a mortgage: and if I could see no distinction between them, I should not be disposed to extend to this case, as it is not identical, a principle with which my reason is not satisfied. There is, however, some distinction between the cases. The right of the purchasers, as we are told in the authorities cited, is not to compel each other to contribute, but to force the plaintiff in the judgment, by audita querela or scire facias, to issue his execution against all. If this is not done and one pays all, it would seem he is without remedy. 3 Co. 14, b. But, in the case of the mortgagee, there are no means of compelling him, at law, to turn all the parties out of the mortgaged premises. His title is at law absolute as to the whole. The incumbrancer who would enforce contribution, can only have it in equity: and if he asks it there, he must shew that he has equity; and this, I take it, the last incumbrancer cannot shew, as against the prior mortgagee.

547 *It remains, as to this part of the case, only to say that the exception or reservation of the 75 acres, contained in the deed of trust to Harrison and Cravens, can have no influence in withdrawing the case from the influence of general principles. The argument was, indeed, strong and imposing, and if there could have been no other motives for the exception than the protection of the 75 acres from the operation of this equitable principle, it would present a question of much difficulty. But there was another ample and more obvious motive for this exception: the protection of these 75 acres from Harrison and Cravens's lien for 3212 dollars. Brock's lien was trivial; the debt due him was reduced to 400 dollars: it could prove no obstruction to a sale: who ever purchased could easily clear it off with part of the purchase money. Not so, if it had been bound for the 3212 dollars. If offered for sale, it might well have been objected that that large debt would sweep the whole.

If once bound, Harrison and Cravens might have been unwilling to release it, unless they got the whole proceeds of sale, which would have thwarted the views of Sisson, who wished the command of these funds. These, I conceive were the views of the parties. They are, at least, more likely to have been the operative motives, than a protection for a mere equitable right, of which, it is very probable, not one of the parties to the instrument had any knowledge or conception. We cannot consider the exception, therefore, as a waiver of that right, since it may be ascribed to a different and more obvious consideration.

Decree affirmed in omnibus.

548 *Sale v. Dishman's Ex'ors.

March, 1832.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Partnership—Bond Executed by One Member—Liability of Other Members.—Though a bond or covenant executed by one partner of a mercantile house, in the name of the firm, for a debt of the partnership, is not binding on his copartner who did not seal the instrument, yet the debt being originally a debt of the concern both partners are liable for it to the creditor.

Same—Liability of Estate of Deceased Member.—And though the surviving partner of a mercantile house is alone liable at law to the creditors of the house, yet if the surviving partner prove insolvent, the estate of the deceased partner is liable, in equity, for the debts of the partnership.

Same—Same—What Amount of Laches Will Exonerate—Quere.—What degree or kind of laches of the creditor, or dealing between him and the surviving partner, in respect of the debt claimed of the partnership, will suffice to exonerate the estate of the deceased partner from the debt.

Same—Same—Diligence Required of Creditor in Enforcing Claim.—It seems, mere delay of the creditor to assert and prosecute his demand against the surviving partner, will not suffice to exonerate the estate of the deceased partner. And there is no analogy between the duty of creditor in such case to assert and prosecute his claim against the surviving partner, and the due diligence which the assignee of a bond is bound to exert against the obligor, in order to entitle him to recourse against the assignor.

Partnership—Bond Executed by One Member of the Firm—Liability of Other Members.—On this question the principal case was cited in Weaver v. Tapscott, 9 Leigh 427, 430, 432, and foot-note; foot-note to McCullough v. Sommerville, 8 Leigh 415; Ward v. Motter, 2 Rob. 552, 567; Morris v. Morris, 4 Gratt. 327; *Brooke v. +Same—Same—Laches.—The principal case is cited in Coles v. Ballard, 78 Va. 148. In Welfey v. Shendoah, I. L. M. & M. Co., 83 Va. 77, 3 S. E. Rep. 376, the principal case is cited to the point that a court of equity can only decree upon the case made by the pleadings.

And in Whittaker v. Southwest Va. Imp. Co., 34 W. Va. 229, 12 S. E. Rep. 511, it is said: "Next as to the defense of laches. It is argued that as this defense is not made in the answer, the defendant cannot have its benefit on demurrer. This position is sought to be sustained by the language of the judges in Sale v. Dishman, 3 Leigh 548; but it cannot be sustained, for it is opposed to the case of Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601, wherein JUDGE SNYDER says that 'it is now the clearly-established rule in equity that the statute of limitations, or objections in analogy to it upon the ground of laches, may be taken advantage of by demurrer as well as by plea.' This language is the text of 1 Daniel, Ch. Pr. p. 569, § 9, where many authorities are cited."

See monographic notes on "Partnership" appended to Scott v. Trent, 1 Wash. 77, and "Laches" appended to Peers v. Barnett, 12 Gratt. 410.

Newton Berryman and James Dishman were merchants and partners at Port Royal, trading under the firm of Berryman & Dishman, though it appeared, that, in fact, Dishman had only permitted his name to be used as one of the firm, in order to give Berryman credit, and had advanced him about 500 dollars in money, which he was to receive back, with interest, without regard to the profit or loss of the trade. In March 1812, a contract was made between William Sale and Berryman & Dishman, whereby Sale agreed to sell and deliver to Berryman and Dishman, between 600 and 700 barrels of indian corn, and Berryman & Dishman agreed to pay Sale for the corn, four dollars per barrel, on or before the 1st January 1813. This contract was evidenced by covenant signed and sealed by Sale, and by Berryman alone in the name of the firm of Berryman & Dishman. But, it appeared, that Dishman had advised Berryman to purchase the 549 corn. Under this contract, *Sale delivered Berryman & Dishman 688 barrels of corn. The partnership of Berryman & Dishman was dissolved in April 1812; and public notice was given of the dissolution, and all persons having claims against the firm, were requested to present them to Berryman for settlement and payment. Dishman died in June 1813. And, on the 23rd April 1814, upon a settlement of accounts between Sale and the surviving partner Berryman, there was a balance found due to Sale, on account of the corn, of 1320 dollars; for which Berryman gave his bond to Sale, who, however, declared, at the time he took it, that he would not give up his recourse against Dishman's estate.

In February 1819, Sale exhibited his bill, in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, against Berryman, and Austin Smith and George White executors of Dishman, setting forth the facts, as above stated, and that Berryman was now utterly insolvent; alleging, that the corn had been sold and delivered to Berryman & Dishman, and chiefly, in fact, upon the credit of Dishman; insisting, that, though Berryman's covenant signed and sealed in the name of the firm, was not Dishman's deed, yet, independently of that covenant, the partnership was bound to pay the value of the corn sold and delivered to it; and that, though the claim could only be enforced against the surviving partner, at law, yet, in equity, the estate of the deceased partner was liable for the debt: and praying a decree for it against Dishman's executors.

Dishman's executors, in their answers, set forth the terms of the connexion between their testator and Berryman, and said that Dishman was only a nominal partner; that Sale had in fact dealt with Berryman alone; and that upon the dissolution of the partnership, all the social effects were left in Berryman's hands, to meet its engagements: and they insisted, that, under the circumstances of the case, Sale, having after the dissolution of the partnership, and after Dishman's death, taken Berryman's bond for the balance due him on account of the corn, thereby precluded 550 himself *from all recourse against Dishman's estate. They did not plead, or otherwise rely on, the statute of limitations, in their defence. Neither did they allege, that Sale, by a prompt and timely assertion and prosecution of his claim against Berryman, might have recovered the debt of him, before he became insolvent.

Berryman's answer also stated the terms of his connexion with Dishman, and gave a detailed account of the transaction with Sale; and he alleged, that he was entitled to credits for effects assigned to Sale, the proceeds of which were to be applied towards the discharge of this debt.

The facts of the case, as above stated, were fully proved. It was admitted by Dishman's executors, that Berryman had become insolvent before this suit was brought by Sale. Dishman's executors filed copies of sundry executions sued out by sundry creditors against Berryman, and of sundry mortgages of property executed by Berryman to secure debts due by him to other creditors, in 1815 and 1816; whereby it appeared, that, in the course of those two years, executions to a larger amount than Sale's claim, had been satisfied out of Berryman's property, and that he had, besides, mortgaged other property to other creditors, to a yet larger amount in value.

The chancellor dismissed the bill; and Sale appealed from the decree to this court.

The cause was argued here by Stanard and Johnson for the appellant, and Leigh for the appellees; but it was more fully discussed by the judges.

CARR, J. The appellees' counsel objected to the jurisdiction of the court of chancery to give relief upon this bill, and in support of that objection, cited the case of Linney's adm'r v. Dare's adm'r, 2 Leigh 588, as resembling this. It is certainly like it in some of its features, but very unlike it in others. We declined the jurisdiction in that case, because at the time of filing the bill, the plaintiff had a perfect

551 *and plain legal remedy, as Ross, one of the obligors bound for the debt, was admitted, on all hands, to be perfectly solvent: in this case, it is admitted on the record, that before Sale's bill was filed, Berryman was insolvent; so that, in fact, the plaintiff had no remedy at law, when he came into equity. Whether that fact, under the circumstances attending it, will entitle him to relief here, is another question. We know, that one partner cannot by deed bind the firm. The covenant, therefore, entered into by Berryman, for the purchase of the corn, imposed no obligation on Dishman. But it is in proof, that the corn, with his advice and assent, was sold and actually delivered to the firm. This created a debt against the firm, binding Dishman as well as Berryman; a simple contract debt as to Dishman. By the death of Dishman, this debt survived against Berryman; and the creditor lost all remedy at law against Dishman's representatives. Berryman, afterwards, executed his bond for the debt. But neither the death of Dishman, nor the execution of Berryman's bond, discharged Dishman's representatives in equity. Their situation, however was materially changed. They were, now, neither primarily nor absolutely liable. For the authorities relating to this point, and the further view of it there taken, I refer to the case of Linney's adm'r v. Dare's adm'r. The books all lay it down, that the first resort of the creditors is to the surviving partner, and if he be not responsible, then they may come upon the estate of the deceased partner in equity. I said, in Linney and Dare, that I had not met with a case, where the creditor had been suffered to come upon the assets of the deceased partner in equity, until he had first sued the surviving partner at law, and shewn a defect of assets, or such partner had been declared bankrupt: but I did not mean to be understood as supposing that there could be no such case. Insolvency may be ascertained just as satisfactorily without a suit as by one; whatever puts the fact beyond a doubt, is sufficient. Here, insolvency before the suit, is admitted. But when it took place, we are not informed. It

552 *is said, with great reason, by lord Eldon in Ex parte Kendal, 17 Ves.

525, 6, that, as this resort to the funds of a deceased partner, is a demand in equity only, it can be enforced only on equitable principles; and that, where the dealing of the creditor with the surviving partners, has been such, as to render this relief inequitable, he will not be relieved. One instance of such dealing, is a course of conduct, shewing that the creditor means to relinquish his remedy against the assets of the deceased, and look exclusively to the surviving partner. I see no such intention in the present case; for when Berryman offered Sale his obligation for the money, he refused at first, and finally accepted it, with a declaration, that he had no idea of releasing his claim on Dishman's estate. But Sale, with Berryman's bond in his possession, waited upwards of four years, before he took any step to recover the money: and if Dishman's executors had put this matter in issue, and shewn us, that, but for this delay, the money might have been made out of Berryman, I strongly incline to think, that this also would have been such conduct, as would have rendered it inequitable to permit his resort to the estate of Dishman; for lord Hardwicke, speaking of this application to equity, in Bishop v. Church, 2 Ves. sr. 107, says "The plaintiff must come as from a pure fountain; must shew himself not to be guilty of any laches, much less collusion, turning to the prejudice of the other side, which might be strong enough to rebut that equity set up beyond what the rule of law admits." But the defendants made no such point in the pleadings; gave no notice of such a defence to their adversary: nor can this be supplied by the documentary evidence touching the point found in the record.

Upon the whole, I think the chancellor's decree should be reversed, and a decree entered for the appellant.

CABELL, J. This is the case of a creditor of a mercantile house, seeking to recover his debt from the representatives of a deceased partner: and the question is, whether he has shewn himself entitled to recover?

553 *It is an elementary principle, that on the death of one of two or more joint partners in trade, the legal obligation to pay the debts of the house, devolves exclusively on the survivors or survivor. But it is equally true, that the deceased partner, although discharged at law, is regarded, in equity, as still liable for the debt. That liability, however, cannot be made to affect his estate, even in equity, until the surviving partner becomes insolvent. Therefore, the first question in this case, is, whether it sufficiently appears, that the surviving partner was insolvent, before the commencement of the suit?

There is no particular kind or degree of proof prescribed for establishing the fact of insolvency. In England, it is considered established by the party becoming a bankrupt; so also, by a judgment and execution and a return of nulla bona. But, in the case before us, the insolvency is admitted by the parties, on the record; which precludes the necessity of any other proof, and is of itself the establishment of the fact.

As the act of limitations was neither pleaded, nor any way relied upon, it is unnecessary to inquire, whether it would have been applicable to the case, or whether it would have availed, if it had been pleaded or relied upon. Mere length of time between the death of the deceased partner and the commencement of the suit, cannot avail, except as evidence of payment; and it cannot be pretended, that the time, in this case, was sufficient for this purpose.

Then, the only real question is, whether the creditor is bound to shew, that he has used due diligence in endeavouring to recover the debt from the surviving partner? or to shew, that an early prosecution of the suit against the surviving partner, would have been fruitless? I am clearly of opinion, that no such obligation rests upon him. The doctrine of due diligence, as between indorser and indorsee, and assignor and assignee, has never been applied as between a creditor of a mercantile house and a deceased partner.

The reason is most obvious. The 554 indorser or assignor *is never considered a debtor, or as liable for the debt, until the indorsee or assignee has first shewn that he has used due diligence, and has failed to recover the debt: but the deceased partner is considered, in equity, as originally and equally liable with the surviving partner: and the doctrine of due diligence can never apply as between joint debtors. That it does not apply, in such a case as the present, is clearly proved by Slesch's case, 1 Meriv. 563, for, although the delay there was only six months, it would have been as fatal, on the ground of due diligence, as a delay of as many years. Nor does the creditor lose his recourse against the estate of the deceased partner, even if, being requested, he refuses to sue the surviving partner himself, or to permit the representative of the deceased partner to sue in his name: as appears by the case of Bishop v. Church, 2 Ves. sen. 100, 371. The representative of the deceased partner, if he be dissatisfied with the delay, or unwilling to encounter its risk, has his redress in his own hands: he may either pay the debt, or institute a suit against the surviving partner for a settlement of the accounts; or he may, without paying the money, sue the surviving partner and the creditor. It is no objection to the authority of Bishop v. Church, that, in that case, both of the partners had bound themselves by bond, for the payment of the debt. For the bond being only joint, not joint and several, the deceased partner was as much discharged at law, from all obligation to pay the bond, as the deceased partner, in this case, was discharged from the legal obligation to pay this simple contract debt. Moreover, if the deceased partner be regarded merely as a surety, he has no more right than other sureties, to demand of the creditor, that he shall sue the principal. And that other sureties have no such right, except under our particular statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 116, § 6, p. 461, (which does not extend to a case like this), is clear from the case of Croughton v. Duval, 3 Call, 69.

I do not feel myself required, on the present occasion, to decide, as a general question, what sort of dealing between 555 *the creditor and the surviving partner, or what sort of laches on the part of the creditor, would be sufficient to rebut the equity of the creditor. It is sufficient for the present, to say, that, in my opinion, there is nothing, in this case, to impair the claim of the appellant.

TUCKER, P. It is apparent from the original agreement, signed by Berryman in the name of the firm, for the purchase of the corn from Sale, that the firm was looked to as debtors for the amount. It is natural, that it should have been so, as Dishman lent his name to give credit to the firm. The contract thus signed, and (by mistake of received principles, which deny the right of one partner to bind another at law by a seal) being sealed also, was nevertheless binding in equity upon both partners. When, indeed, it appears that the creditor intends to look only to the individual partner, it may be otherwise; but, in equity, the form of the thing is immaterial, if the substance of the contract was to bind both. Thus, even a joint bond is, in equity, after the death of one of the obligors, construed to be several as well as joint; because, in justice, in conscience, and by the intent of the parties, both are debtors. Wherever the real consideration is paid to both, both are bound to make satisfaction, though, through ignorance, the instrument is so drawn as to have another effect at law; and, as there is no legal remedy, a court of conscience will, if it can, reach the effects of the persons borrowing and receiving the money. Bishop v. Church, 2 Ves. sen. 100. In this case, then, the partners were clearly bound by the original contract. Without controverting the case of Tom v. Goodrich, 2 Johns. Rep. 213, which was an action of assumpsit, I think it is evident, that, unless it appears that the note or bond of an individual partner, is designed to be accepted in discharge of the partnership, it will not have that effect in equity. Thus, even if a judgment be obtained against a surviving partner, on notes of the firm, that judgment is, at law, an extinguishment of the 556 original notes (for, transit *in rem adjudicatam) and so in case of a bond, it would be, at law, an extinguishment of the simple contract; yet, in both cases, it would be in equity a partnership debt still. Jacomb

v. Harwood, 2 Ves. sen. 265; Heath v. Percival, 1 P. Wms. 682; Orr v. Chase, 1 Meriv. 729; David v. Ellice, 5 Barn. & Cress. 196, 11 Com. Law Rep. 201. And this principle I understand to be distinctly recognized by this court, in Williams v. Donaghe's ex'or, 1 Rand. 300, and in Linney's adm'r v. Dare's adm'r, 2 Leigh, 588. Now, in the present case, the implication that the taking of Berryman's bond was intended to absolve the partnership, is not only weakened by the fact that he was the only surviving partner, but it is expressly repelled by Sale's declaration, at the time, that he would not give up his resort to Dishman's estate. If the taking this obligation did not discharge Dishman, the subsequent dealings with Berryman had not that effect.

The principal questions discussed at the bar, respect, 1. the jurisdiction of the court, and 2. the supposed laches of the plaintiff in pursuing Berryman.

On the subject of jurisdiction, I think there is no difficulty. It was admitted, that Berryman was insolvent, when this suit commenced. No suit at law against him could avail, and therefore none could be required. It is also obvious, that as to Dishman's estate, the only remedy was in equity. The case is, therefore, not like Linney and Dare, where the jurisdiction was denied, because the creditor had a complete legal remedy against Ross, the surety, and it was no concern of his to bring the parties into equity, in order to fix the demand on the representatives of the principal. In this case, there is no remedy at law.

The other question is more difficult. The partnership was dissolved in 1812, and in May 1813, Dishman died. From that date till 1819, no proceedings were instituted against Berryman, who, in the mean time, became insolvent; and the first suit against him is that which we are now considering, the main design of which is to subject 557 *Dishman's estate. In the interim, it would seem he had parted with valuable property, and had discharged very considerable demands, from which it may be inferred, that this debt might have been recovered of him, if it had been prosecuted immediately.

That the liability of the estate of a deceased partner, is neither immediate nor absolute, seems to be very clear. It cannot be charged at law, but if the surviving partner is not responsible, it is liable in equity. In this case, it is indeed agreed, that Berryman was insolvent when the bill was filed: but the question recurs, whether it suffices to establish an insolvency, contemporary with the suit? It is contended, that that is not enough; and that before the deceased partner's estate can be charged, due diligence must have been used to procure payment from the surviving partner; and it must appear, that notwithstanding the exertion of such diligence, the debt could not be recovered from him.

Now, in considering this matter, we must bear in mind, that though the common law, deviating herein from the lex mercatoria, holds partnership contracts to produce only a joint obligation because they are joint in form, and considers them as attaching only upon the survivors; yet the courts of equity, following what is apprehended to be the general mercantile law, considers a partnership contract several as well as joint, and binding upon the survivors. Gow's law of partn. 436, 7. The money is advanced or the goods delivered upon the credit of all the partners. All are presumed to have derived more or less benefit from the transaction; and the question of more or less, the court will not enter into. Hence the equity to charge the estate of the decedent, though discharged at law: an equity set up beyond what the rule of law admits, which, therefore, may be rebutted, if the party is guilty of fraud or collusion, or even of laches. 2 Ves. sen. 107. What does amount to laches? is the important question here. "With respect to the time (says Gow, p. 443,) when the creditors should prosecute their demands against the surviving partners, in order to retain their right of resorting to the estate of a deceased partner, no rule of convenience exists, which requires them to do it within any assigned or arbitrary limitation." It seems to have been supposed by some, that it must be done within some very short period of time. But it is very doubtful (as is well observed by the master of the rolls in Sleaford's case, 1 Meriv. 569,) whether the estate of a deceased partner would be benefited by such a rule; since few houses could stand the sudden and concurrent demand, which that rule would necessarily bring upon a surviving partner. A house might be reduced to bankruptcy, which, in the ordinary course of business, might have been able to fulfil its engagements; and a demand would thus be brought on the estate of the deceased partner, from which it might otherwise have been wholly exempt. Accordingly, in that case, Miss Sleaford was held not to have lost her equity by eight months delay. In Lane v. Williams, 2 Vern. 277, 292, the laches was much greater, but did not bar the creditor. In Daniel v. Cross, 3 Ves. 277, it was nearly two years before the bankruptcy of the survivor: and in Hamersley v. Lambert, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 508, Hubbell, the deceased partner died in September 1803, and the surviving partner was discharged as an insolvent in October 1807—an interval of four years. In that case, the delay was held no bar: though chancellor Kent goes, perhaps, too far in saying, that Miss Sleaford's case established the doctrine, that "neither delay, nor lapse of time, nor dealing with the survivor, nor calling for and receiving part of the debt from the survivor, amounts to a waiver or bar of the claim upon the assets of the deceased." "It is," says he, "in equity a joint and several debt; and as lord Parker observes in one of the cases, the assets of the deceased must lie at stake, until the 559 bond is *paid." I rather think, there is no settled rule or analogy yet established upon this subject. To require the same diligence which is demanded in cases of bills of exchange, was very readily

*So says the master of the rolls in Sleaford's case: but in the note of the editor of the late edition of Vernon, the case appears to be very incorrectly reported. He states the note to have been a year old: and he details circumstances as appearing in the case, upon which it might have been decided, without a reference to the principle under discussion. (Note by the judge.)

considered out of the question. To put the case upon the footing of the implied contract for due diligence between an assignor and assignee, would, it appears to me, be pregnant with the very evil so strongly stated by the master of the rolls in Sleech's case. The case of the assignor and assignee, indeed, must always stand upon its own peculiar grounds. The principles established as to the duties of the assignee, have taken a halfway ground between the liability in cases of negotiable instruments, on the one hand, and the duties of a creditor in relation to the surety in a bond, on the other. They have been laid down for the regulation of this new kind of medium, which has been created by giving validity to the assignment of bonds, and authorizing the assignee to sue in his own name. No fair analogy can be drawn, between the case of the deceased partner and the assignor of a bond. The assignor has parted with his interest, and stands merely as a guarantor: the deceased partner was one of two joint debtors; in his lifetime, he would have had no right to call upon the creditor, to proceed against his co-partner, or to complain that he had not done so; and though, after his death, a court of chancery will not charge his estate with the equity, until the insolvency of the survivor is established, yet I am not aware of any express decision, which requires him to proceed within any limited time. He is still the debtor; and the assets of his estate "must lie at stake until his debt be paid." He was bound to see it paid in his lifetime: he was bound to follow his creditor: his creditor was neither bound to look after him, nor to pursue his partner. At his death, his obligations ought to devolve, with his estate, on his representatives: they ought to press the payment by the surviving partner, or to demand that the creditor should proceed, if danger of his insolvency be apprehended. This would be in strict analogy with the case of the surety in a 560 *bond, who never can charge his creditor with laches, until he has prompted him in vain to pursue the principal. Considering the decedent's estate as only bound in equity, courts of equity have indulgently said, it shall not be charged till the surviving partner is insolvent, because the debt ought in justice to be paid, if possible, by the funds of the concern. It treats the deceased partner as a surety only; and that is going far enough. He is absolved, indeed, by collusion: he is absolved by giving time to the surviving partner, or by new arrangements with him: he may be absolved by failing to sue when required to do so; but, if there be no such requisition, he is in no sort culpable. This is what is meant by laches, in relation to him. In no other sense, can the cases be reconciled with this expression of lord Hardwicke: his own decision cannot; for in the case of Bishop v. Church, 2 Ves. sen. 100, 371, it appears that Church died in 1740, and Owen, the surviving partner, became bankrupt (as I understand the state of the case) after the creditor Bishop's death in 1747, and after repeated and unavailing requests by Church's representatives, that Bishop would sue Owen, or let them sue him: yet lord Hardwicke was of opinion, that he did not lose his recourse, because he was not bound to do so, unless they first paid him his money.

I am, therefore, inclined to the opinion, that though chancellor Kent has attributed to the master of the rolls in Sleech's case, a stronger expression of opinion than that case will justify, and lays down his own, perhaps, too broadly; yet it is not going too far to say, that mere delay in instituting proceedings against the surviving partner, will not discharge the decedent's estate, unless the creditor has been called upon to institute proceedings for the safety of that estate, and has declined or has failed to do so. Such conduct would justly be held, to rebut the equity which is raised in behalf of a creditor, against a deceased partner.

But, the court consisting, at this time, of only three members, perhaps it is better to waive the decision of the question 561 *now; and the rather as it does not seem essential; for I do not think the question of laches is fairly presented. Surely, if the defendants designed to rebut the plaintiff's equity on the ground of laches, they ought to have charged it, that it might have been fairly inquired into. As they have not done so, the fact should not be regarded as established by the exhibits, which were irregularly filed, since they related to matters not in issue between the parties.

Decree reversed.

Mowry v. Miller.

March, 1832.

[24 Am. Dec. 680.]

Malicious Prosecution*—Advising and Procuring Prosecution for Felony—Case.—Action on the case, for defendant having advised and procured a third person to institute a malicious prosecution against plaintiff for felony: Held, the action lies against defendant for advising and procuring such prosecution.

Same—Declaration—Without Probable Cause.*—In every such action, the declaration must allege that the prosecution was without probable cause: but that allegation relates to the state of the fact, that the prosecution was without probable cause, not to the state of the defendant's knowledge that there was no probable cause.

Same—Same—General Demurrer.—On general demurrer to a declaration, the court looks always to the substantial meaning of its allegations, to ascertain whether it states good cause of action.

Same—Same—Variance as to Date—When Immaterial.—In an action on the case for advising and procuring a malicious prosecution, it is not material for the plaintiff to prove the exact day of his acquittal as laid in the declaration, so that it appears to be before the action brought; and, therefore, a variance in that respect, between the day laid,

Malicious Prosecution—Probable Cause.—In Scott v. Shelor, 28 Gratt. 806, the principal case is criticised as to the rule laid down that the allegation in regard to probable cause relates to the state of the fact that the prosecution was without probable cause, not to the state of the defendant's knowledge that there was no probable cause: that case (Scott v. Shelor) holding that probable cause is the existence of such facts and circumstances as would excite the belief in a reasonable mind, acting on the facts within the knowledge of the prosecutor, that the person charged was guilty of the crime for which he was prosecuted. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Spengler v. Davy, 15 Gratt. 388. But see foot-note to Spengler v. Davy, 15 Gratt. 388, and Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 33, 41, citing the principal case.

‡Malicious Prosecution—Declaration—Variance.—In Arthur v. Crenshaw, 4 Leigh 399, the principal case is cited to the point that where the time of the trial of a particular fact is not material, a variance from the date, in alleging the trial and the result, will not be material, although it is to be proved by the

and the day stated in the record produced to prove the acquittal, is not material; the day not being laid in the declaration, as part of the description of such record of acquittal, and being laid under a scilicet.

Case, brought by Miller against Mowry, in the circuit court of Shenandoah. The declaration was in the following words:

"B. Miller complains of G. Mowry, in custody &c. of a plea of trespass on the case: For that, whereas the said Miller is a true and honest citizen of the common-

562 wealth *&c. and hath never been guilty, or, until the committing of the grievances by the said Mowry, herein after mentioned, been suspected to have been guilty of felony &c. Yet the said Mowry, well knowing the premises, but contriving and maliciously intending to injure the said Miller, in his good name &c. and to bring him into public scandal &c. and to cause him to be imprisoned &c. heretofore, to wit, on the 24th October 1825, at &c. consulted with, advised and procured one S. Zirkel, to go before George Moore a justice of the peace in and for the county aforesaid, and, then and there, induced the said Zirkel, falsely and maliciously and without any probable or reasonable cause whatsoever, to charge the said Miller with having feloniously stolen 1400 dollars in bank notes, the property of the said Zirkel, from the possession of the said Mowry; and upon such charge, he the said Mowry prevailed on and compelled the said Zirkel, by the false, scandalous and malicious representations of him the said Mowry, and without any reasonable or probable cause whatsoever, to procure the said Moore, being such justice as aforesaid, to make and grant his warrant &c. for apprehending the said Miller, and for bringing the said Miller before the said Moore, or some other justice of the peace for the said county, to be dealt with according to law, for the said supposed offence; and the said Mowry directed, advised and procured the said Zirkel, under and by virtue of the said warrant, afterwards, to wit, on the 24th October 1825, at &c. wrongfully and unjustly and without any reasonable or probable cause whatsoever,—and, at the instance of the said Mowry, caused the said Miller to be arrested &c. and imprisoned &c. until the said Zirkel, at the instigation of the said Mowry, by his false, scandalous and malicious charges, caused the said Miller to be carried before the said Moore justice of the peace as aforesaid, and to be committed by the said justice for examination, without any probable cause, to the jail of the said county, there to remain until discharged by due course of law—And,

563 afterwards, to wit, on the 7th October 1825, at *a court held at &c. by J. S.

[and others, naming them] justices of the peace for the said county, for the examination and trial of the said Miller for the said felony, and who had competent and legal authority to hold such court,—having heard and considered all that the said Zirkel, and the said Mowry, who instigated the said Zirkel to prosecute the said Miller, could say touching and concerning the said supposed offence,—then and there, to wit, at &c. on the said 7th October aforesaid, adjudged &c. that the said Miller was not guilty of the said supposed offence, and then and there caused the said Miller to be fully acquitted of the said supposed offence, and discharged &c. and the said complaint has not been further prosecuted, but is wholly ended and determined—Wherefore the said Miller saith, that he is injured, and hath sustained damage &c."

Mowry, 1. demurred generally to the declaration, and 2. pleaded not guilty.

Upon the demurrer, the court held the declaration good. And upon the trial of the general issue, there was a verdict for the plaintiff, for 500 dollars damages, and judgment was given accordingly.

At the trial, Miller offered in evidence the record of his examination before the county court for the felony of which he had been accused, and of his acquittal; whereby it appeared, that the court by which he was examined and acquitted, was in fact held on the 7th November 1825, instead of the 7th October as stated in the declaration; whereupon Mowry's counsel objected to the variance between the record, and the allegation of the trial and acquittal in the declaration; but the court overruled the objection, and allowed the record to be read in evidence; to which Mowry's counsel filed exceptions.

Mowry applied to this court for a super-seas to the judgment; which was allowed.

Stanard, for the plaintiff in error. The demurrer to the declaration ought to have been sustained. For, 1. though 564 *one who institutes a prosecution maliciously and without probable cause, or who conspires with another to institute such prosecution, is liable to an action, in the one case for a conspiracy, in the other for malicious prosecution; yet to advise another to institute such prosecution, is not actionable. And 2. if to advise such a prosecution be actionable, it ought to be distinctly and expressly averred in the declaration, not only that the prosecution was malicious and without probable cause, but that the advice to institute it was given without probable cause. Ellis v. Thelman, 3 Call, 3; Young v. Gregorie, Id. 446; Kirtley v. Deck, 2 Munf. 10; Marshall v. Bussard, Gilm. 9. Here, the declaration does not allege, that Mowry without probable cause, advised and procured Zirkel to institute the prosecution, but that he advised and procured Zirkel without probable cause, to institute it. The circuit court also erred, in admitting the record of Miller's acquittal in evidence at the trial. The day of his examination and acquittal was material; and the variance between the record exhibited, and that alleged in the declaration, in this particular, was fatal. Pope v. Foster, 4 T. R. 590, is directly in point.

Leigh, contra. He who advises, procures and instigates another to a malicious prosecution, is the author of the injury; and it would be strange if an action will not lie against the real wrong-doer, but only against the instrument, who may perchance be innocent. Upon the general demurrer record, provided the time be not alleged as descriptive of the record by means of a prout patet per recordum or otherwise.

And in Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh 476, the principal case is cited to the point that a variance in dates under videlicet is not material. See monographic note on "Malicious Prosecution" appended to Guerrant v. Tindler, Gilm. 36.

to the declaration, the court is to ascertain the substantial meaning of it. This declaration may not be drawn with the most perfect logical precision: but, seeing that it charges, that Mowry advised, procured and induced Zirkel, falsely and maliciously, and without any probable or reasonable cause, to institute the prosecution, it is an over nice criticism to say, that it does not mean, that Mowry, maliciously and without probable cause, instigated Zirkel, but only that Mowry (innocently) instigated Zirkel, maliciously and without probable cause, 565 to institute the prosecution. The allegation *is distinct, that the prosecution itself was without probable cause; which is enough. As to the variance between the record of the acquittal adduced, and the allegation of the acquittal; the declaration does not purport to recite the record, or to allege the acquittal with a prout patet per recordum: the substantial part of the allegation is, that Miller was finally acquitted before this suit was brought. In Pope v. Foster, as I infer from the report, the declaration purported to set out the record of the acquittal, in form; otherwise, it seems strange, that the date of the acquittal, set out under a scilicet, should have been held material, the acquittal being alleged to have been, and having been in fact, before the action brought for the malicious prosecution.

TUCKER, P. The first objection in this case goes to the cause of action. It is said, that in every case for malicious prosecution the defendant is charged with active agency, and that an action for merely advising another to institute a prosecution, is not sustainable. For my part, I can conceive nothing more direct than the charge here. It is, substantially, a charge that the defendant maliciously and without probable cause consulted with, advised and procured one Zirkel, falsely and maliciously and without probable cause, to prosecute the plaintiff for felony. This procurement is surely actionable. The language of the declaration corresponds with the form of declaring in an action on the case in the nature of an action for a conspiracy; and it was admitted in the argument, that the facts set forth, would be sufficient, if proved, in an action against two or more, to sustain such an action. If so, a charge of such advice and procurement by one, cannot less entitle the plaintiff to this action.

It is next objected, that from their connexion in the declaration, the words without probable cause, apply only to the act of Zirkel, not to the advice and procurement of the defendant. The charges of malice, and want of probable cause, are reiterated, and stand in connexion with both.

566 *Yet, in truth, according to my view of the matter, the objection could not avail, if true. The law requires the plaintiff in this action, to set forth that the prosecution was without probable cause. But, as this is merely because no man can maintain an action for a malicious prosecution, where there was probable cause, it is obvious, that those words should be made to refer to the state of fact, as it respects the person prosecuted, and not to the degree of knowledge of that fact in the party prosecuting.

Then, as to the supposed variance. If the declaration had purported to recite the record of the prosecution, the variance might, perhaps, have been fatal. But that is not the case here. It merely alleges the fact that the plaintiff was acquitted on a particular day; it does not profess to recite the record. Now, the material and substantive part of the allegation was, that the acquittal was before action brought. The date was immaterial. The case of Pope v. Foster, which was cited as in point, has been overruled by the case of Purcell v. Macnamara, 9 East, 157. In this latter case, the action was for a malicious prosecution; the plaintiff alleged in his declaration an acquittal on a particular day, but without a prout patet per recordum; the record, when produced, proved a different day: but it was held, the precise day was not material, the substance of the allegation being that the acquittal was before action brought. This case has been since approved, in Philips v. Shaw, 4 Barn. & Ald. 435, 5 Id. 964, 6 Com. Law Rep. 477, 7 Id. 318.

We are, therefore, of opinion to affirm the judgment.

567 *Samuel v. Marshall and Wife and Others.

March, 1832.

Deeds—Imbecility of Donor—Fraud.—A person reduced to a state of mental imbecility by habitual intoxication, makes a voluntary and irrevocable deed of gift of his whole estate, to a cousin german, to the disherison of his half sisters, reserving the use to the donor for life, without any reasonable motive assigned for such an act: HELD, fraud and imposition may be inferred from the circumstances, and from the very nature of the contract; and this deed of gift is fraudulent and void.

Same—Same—Drunkenness—Validity of Contract—Case at Bar.—In such cases, drunkenness, if produced by the donee, or if so extreme, that the party did not know what he was about, is a material circumstance in deciding on the validity of the contract; and imbecility of mind, however produced, combined with other ingredients, and particularly, with the absence of consideration, has always an important influence on the question of the validity of contracts.

Contracts—Validity—Imbecility.—Although a person may labor under no legal incapacity to do a valid act or make a contract, yet if the whole transaction, taken together with all the facts, mental weakness being one of them, shows that consent was wanting, it would be void. Of this description was the case of Samuel v. Marshall, 3 Leigh 567. Greer v. Greers, 9 Gratt. 333 (see also, note, citing the principal case).

On this question of mental capacity to contract, the principal case is cited in foot-note to Beverly v. Walden, 20 Gratt. 147. And in Miller v. Rutledge, 83 Va. 867, 1 S. E. Rep. 302. It is said, quoting from Minor's Inst. 572, the test of legal capacity is said to be that the party is capable of recollecting the property he is about to dispose of, the manner of distributing it, and the objects of his bounty. But, of course, the particular act must be attended with the consent of his will and understanding, clung the principal case. And in Porter v. Porter, 80 Va. 122, 15 S. E. Rep. 500, the principal case is cited to the point that mere weakness of the understanding is no objection to a man's disposing of his own estate. See also, Jones v. McGruder, 87 Va. 379, 12 S. E. Rep. 792, citing the principal case on the question of undue influence.

And in Korne v. Korne, 30 W. Va. 7, 3 S. E. Rep. 30, it is said: "This is not an instance of a contract made by a person of great mental weakness or imbecility. In such case courts have often held that the transaction, when grossly inequitable or unfair, might be set aside, although the incapacity of such person be not an absolute disqualification for the transaction of business. It therefore seems Chancery Practice—Issue Directed—When Proper.—If the evidence on a question of fact in a suit in chancery, though various and conflicting, be such as ought to satisfy the chancellor's conscience as to the truth of the case, he need not direct an issue to try the fact.

Distributes—Suit to Settle Estate—Parties.—The distributees of a deceased person may maintain a bill in equity, to impeach and set aside a deed of gift of personal estate made by the decedent in his lifetime, as fraudulent; and the court may, at their suit, declare the deed fraudulent, and annul it; but the subject itself can only be decreed to the personal representative of the decedent, or to the distributees in a case in which the personal representative is a party.

Richard Coleman, by deed dated the 25th April 1822, recorded in the county court of Spotsylvania in July 1823, conveyed to his cousin german, Josiah Samuel, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, in consideration of natural love and affection, all his lands, slaves, stock of every description, household furniture, and plantation utensils, reserving to himself the use and profits of the property, for and during his life. The conveyance was merely voluntary.

After the death of Coleman, B. Marshall and Elizabeth his wife, W. Coleman and Sarah his wife, H. Wright and Lucy his wife, and J. White and Thirsa his wife (the female plaintiffs being the half sisters, heirs at law and distributees, of Coleman) exhibited a bill against Samuel, in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, alleging that Coleman's mind, naturally weak, was so impaired and stupified by habitual and constant intoxication, the 568 means of which were profusely supplied him by Samuel, in order to accomplish his own fraudulent purposes, that he was utterly incapable of making any valid disposition of his property; and that the deed of April 1822 was obtained from him, while he was in this state of mental imbecility, by gross deception and fraud practised by Samuel; and therefore praying that the deed should be declared void, and set aside, and the plaintiffs declared entitled to the subject; and general relief.

Samuel, in his answer, admitted, that Coleman was an habitual drunkard, but denied, that this habit had so impaired his mind as to render him incapable of managing and disposing of his property; on the contrary, he said, that Coleman, when sober, was perfectly capable to do so; and, at the time he executed the deed in question, he was quite sober, was in possession of his faculties, knew what he was doing, and was fully competent to make any disposition of his property. He stated the relation between Coleman and himself; that they were brought up and educated together, and contracted the closest friendship in early youth, which continued uninterrupted till Coleman's death; and after Coleman attained to manhood, before he was addicted to any bad habit, he declared, that in case he should die without heir, he would leave his estate to Samuel, and frequently repeated the same declaration during his life: that he did not supply Coleman with intoxicating liquors, for the fraudulent purpose charged: that Coleman executed the deed in question, of his own free will and accord; that he, Samuel, exercised no influence, and practised no deception or fraud upon him, to obtain it. And he further stated, that in the autumn of 1822, Coleman determined to break up house-keeping, and to live with Samuel; he also determined to sell some of his property, and pay his debts: that, with Samuel's assent and concurrence, 200 acres, parcel of the land conveyed by the deed of April 1822, were sold for 1400 dollars, of which 100 dollars were paid in a bond for that sum assigned to him, and the residue in slaves five in 569 *number, valued at 1300 dollars: that Coleman, in like manner, with Samuel's consent and concurrence, sold three of his slaves, and part of his stock and plantation utensils, the proceeds of which sales were applied to the payment of his debts: that Samuel, with Coleman's consent, had sold the five slaves received for the 200 acres of land, on a credit, but the money not having yet fallen due, he had not received it: that Samuel had sold the residue of the land conveyed by the deed for 300 dollars; and that he had paid one small debt of Coleman, and intended to pay all his debts.

Many depositions were taken and filed by both parties, upon the questions of fact—

1. Whether Coleman's mind was so impaired by inveterate habits of intoxication, as to render him, whether drunk or sober at the time of executing the deed of April 1822, incompetent, in point of understanding, to make any disposition of his property? Upon which point, the evidence of the witnesses was (as is usual in such cases) various and conflicting; but, in the opinion of the chancellor and of this court, the weight of evidence was, very decidedly, against his competency.

2. Whether he was sober at the time of executing the deed? According to the evidence of the subscribing witnesses to the instrument, he was sober, and, in their opinion, of competent mind to know what he was doing, and to dispose of his property; but these subscribing witnesses were persons whose acquaintance with him, it appeared, had just commenced; and on the other hand, there was proof, that upon the deed being afterwards mentioned to him, he said he had no recollection of having ever executed such an instrument, and spoke in harsh terms of Samuel.

3. Whether any undue influence was exercised over him, or any deception or fraud practised upon him, by Samuel, in order to obtain the deed from him? As to which there was no direct evidence of undue influence or fraud; no evidence except what might be inferred from the contents and purpose of the deed itself, and from the circumstances, that *Samuel had promised to pay the draftsman of the instrument a very high compensation for drawing it; that Coleman was staying at Samuel's house at the time, and was very subject to be influenced by others, to make wills and conveyances of his property, and had been induced by solicitations to make several such dispositions of it (previous to this) which had been cancelled: there was evidence, indeed, that at the time he executed this deed, one of the motives he assigned for it, was, that he wished to get rid of such importunities.

4. Whether he was upon friendly terms or not with his half sisters and their husbands? Upon this point again, the evidence was contradictory: there was evidence, that he entertained, and had always entertained, a rooted aversion to his sisters; and evidence to the contrary, that he was affectionate towards them.

The chancellor declared the deed null and void, and directed a commissioner to ascertain and report, what part of the subject conveyed by it was still held by Samuel, and the profits thereof, and how much money he had received of the proceeds of such part of the subject as had been sold.

The commissioner reported, that Samuel had received 300 dollars for the part of the land sold by him, out of which he had paid a debt of 15 dollars due from Coleman; leaving 285 dollars in his hands. That the nett proceeds of sale of the five slaves sold by Samuel, as admitted in his answer, and the value of sundry articles of personal estate of Coleman which Samuel had converted to his own use, amounted to 1600 dollars; but that Samuel had as yet received only 150 dollars of the money due for the proceeds of the five slaves. That other slaves remained unsold in his hands, the profits of which amounted to 181 dollars. That other articles of personal property of Coleman had been sold, by agreement between the parties, and bonds taken for the proceeds, payable to the marshal of the court, which were deposited in court, to abide the final decree: these bonds amounted to 186 dollars.

571 *Upon this report coming in, the chancellor decreed, that Samuel should pay the plaintiffs, the sums of 285 dollars, balance of the proceeds of land sold by him, and 1600 dollars nett proceeds of the five slaves, &c. with interest on those sums, respectively; that he should pay them the sum of 181 dollars, amount of profits of the slaves remaining unsold; that he should deliver them these slaves; and that the bonds made payable to the marshal for 186 dollars should be delivered over to them. From this decree Samuel appealed to this court.

Standard for the appellant, 1. argued the questions of fact upon the evidence, and insisted, that Coleman was of competent understanding to make the deed, and that no deception, imposition or fraud, no undue influence or art, to obtain the deed from him, was justly imputable to Samuel. 2. That, at any rate, considering the contrariety of the evidence touching the material facts, the chancellor ought to have directed an issue to ascertain the truth by the verdict of a jury. 3.

That the decree was certainly erroneous, in setting aside the deed, so far as it related to the personal subject, upon this bill of Coleman's distributees, and decreeing this part of the subject to them; for none but Coleman's administrator could maintain such a bill;—and erroneous too, in decreeing Samuel to pay 1600 dollars in money, when the far greater part of that sum appeared to be still due upon the bonds taken for the proceeds of the five slaves sold by him.

Leigh, for the appellees, 1. submitted the first and main question to the court: he said it was not necessary to argue it; the court would weigh the evidence. 2. He said, a court of chancery might direct an issue to inform its conscience, but it was, in no case, bound to do so: the question was, always, whether or no, in sound discretion, an issue ought to be directed. Pryor v. Adams, 1 Call, 382; Stanard v. Graves, 2 Call, 369; Rowton v. Rowton, 1 Hen. & Munf. 91; Hampson v. Hampson, 3 Ves. & Beam.

572 41. *And 3. he contended, that if it was wrong to decree the personal subject to Coleman's distributees, against an executor de son tort (as, he said, Samuel was) the distributees could entertain a bill to impeach and set aside the fraudulent deed, which prevented the devolution of the subject to Coleman's administrator, who would be a trustee for them.

Standard replied, upon the last point, that to entertain such a bill as this for the distributees, to set aside the deed in respect of the personal subject, would lead to this difficulty: if, upon their bill, a decree should be rendered setting aside the deed, would that decree preclude Samuel from insisting on the fairness and validity of the deed in a suit brought by Coleman's administrator to impeach it? when, if the decree were for Samuel, he could not plead it in bar of a suit brought by the administrator to impeach it. The bill should be dismissed as to the personal subject.

TUCKER, P. On the merits of this case, I am clearly of opinion to affirm the decree. The conveyance of the whole of the estate of a wretched sot, about whose capacity to contract, even for valuable consideration, the whole country is divided, to a cousin, to the prejudice of four half sisters, reserving to himself but a life estate, and giving away the residue for nothing, cannot, I think, be sustained with any sort of propriety. Drunkenness, it is true, is no excuse for crime; but if produced by the donee, or if so extreme, that the party does not know what he is about, it has been considered as a material circumstance in deciding upon a contract: and imbecility of mind, however produced, combined with other ingredients, and particularly with the utter absence of consideration, has always had an important influence upon the question of the validity of contracts. That Coleman was reduced to a state of imbecility, which rendered him liable to be plundered by the designing, I think is abundantly proved. That he was the object of the designs of several around him, we learn are from his own declarations, and it appears he himself was afraid, 573 that, in some *moment of more than common imbecility, he would fall a prey to their cupidity. That he has done so at last, appears to me very certain. It only remains for the tribunals of justice to redress the wrong.

The motives which have been assigned for this extraordinary act, are inadequate to account for it. The boyish promise to make his cousin the inheritor of his estate, if he should die without heir, though we should extend it farther than the express words, by the gloss of supposing that he meant his dying without children, will not account for such an act, at a time of life when romantic notions, are tempered, in the man of sense, by reflecting on what is due to nature and to feeling. Still less will it account for the execution of a deed in his lifetime, instead of a will to take effect after his death; an absolute instead of a revocable instrument; an instrument, which destroys at once, the only motive that stimulates most of those around a miserable drunkard, to pity his weakness, to bear with his offensiveness, to protect him when he cannot take care of himself, and to minister to him in his revolting infirmities; instead of an instrument, which, by being revocable in its character, would hold out a perpetual lure to all the seekers after his fortune, and secure to him, to his latest breath, their mercenary services, if he could not command their affectionate attentions. Had he made a will, instead of a deed, we should probably not have found him, as represented by one of the witnesses—dying, without the benefit of medical aid, which, if it could not have saved his exhausted constitution, might, at least, have soothed and mitigated the sufferings of his dying moments.

The next motive assigned for the execution of this deed, is a desire to free himself from the constant solicitations of those around him, to give his property to them. He did not, then, wish to part with his property. Why has he done it? If this was the motive, the act must be interpreted as commensurate with the motive. Construe the deed to have 574 been made upon a secret trust, that the property was to be *held for his benefit and at his disposal, and that the execution of it was intended merely to hoodwink the greedy expectants around him; then, indeed, the motive will account for it; but then, in execution of the trust, the property must be reconveyed. This view of the transactions, indeed, not only presents it in a less offensive form in its inception, but is rendered not improbable, by the fact, that Samuel conveyed away the property as Coleman directed, subsequently to the deed; and that Coleman himself disposed of it at pleasure, but referred those to whom he sold, to Samuel for a title, which was made accordingly. Yet these facts are not much in unison with the declaration, repeatedly made by him, that he did not recollect that he had ever made such a deed. So that the mind cannot be free from doubt which hypothesis to adopt. Either will lead to the same result.

Another fact upon which reliance is placed, to account for this extraordinary deed, is the alleged variance between Coleman and his half sisters. It is most singular, that as to one of them, this alienation of affection is said to have existed when she was only about seven years old; and it cannot be denied, that there is a conflict of testimony as to his feelings towards them all. But take it for granted—in this state of things, no importunity was to be feared from them. Coleman could sufficiently vent his spleen against them by a will. Are we to suppose, that the inveteracy of his feelings was such as to induce him to shut the door upon all hope of reconciliation? If he executed a will to their prejudice, it might be revoked, in case he should be reconciled to them. But by executing a deed to another, he tied his hands forever: he put it out of his power to yield to the impulse of natural feelings in their favour, whenever the unnatural hostility between them should have an end. Is it, then, most charitable to suppose, that Coleman, if he was of sound mind, executed this deed to cut himself off from future repentance in their favour, or that he, who from his boyhood had been looking forward to the reversionary interest in this estate, had contrived this 575 scheme by which he *might "make assurance doubly sure." I think I outrage human nature least, by the latter supposition.

It was said, that there is no proof of any fraud, imposition or contrivance on the part of Samuel. It is true, that except what has leaked out about the compensation to the draftsman for drawing the deed, we see little of Samuel's agency. But fraud is neither less certain, nor less successful, for being concealed. When it is so, it may indeed elude us, unless detected in the results. Such is the case here. The estate of an imbecile is conveyed to Samuel, without consideration, by an irrevocable instrument, executed among strangers, out of his own neighborhood, and to the prejudice of four half sisters, the natural heirs of his bounty; and this upon flimsy pretences, which can in no wise justify or account for the transaction. These facts are sufficient to stamp the transaction as one which this court should discountenance; and from them, and not from the conflicting opinions of witnesses as to the extent of Coleman's capacity, I conclude, that the deed was properly set aside by the chancellor.

Had there been a quid pro quo, we might have hesitated. But, surely, the question is very different, between a contract for valuable consideration, and this gift by an habitual sot, of his whole estate, to take effect at his death, to the disherison of his sisters and natural heirs. In other states, a commission of lunacy might have been issued against him, which would have placed his property intirely out of his control: and, even in the english courts we are told, a commission of lunacy extends to the case of imbecility produced by habitual intoxication, and this in a case "where the party, when he could be kept sober, was a very sensible man, but in a constant state of intoxication he was perfectly incapable, and would have been constantly contracting insanity;" per lord Eldon in Ridgeway v. Darwin, 8 Ves. 66, 7. If we have not gone so far in Virginia, it behoves us, at least, to protect such unfortunate persons from overreaching bargains and improvident gifts of their estates, when every

Hines, 1 Munf. 557, Bridgman v. Green, 2 Ves. sen. 627, Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273, are not stronger than this.

The decree, however, is erroneous, in directing Samuel to surrender the personal estate of the decedent Coleman, to the plaintiffs, they not being his proper representatives, though they are interested to set aside the deed; and also, in decreeing payment of the uncollected proceeds of the five slaves, that were received in part payment for the 200 acres of land, and afterwards sold by Samuel. The decree is to be corrected in these particulars.

The decree entered by this court, declared, that there was no error in the decree of the court of chancery, so far as it went to vacate and annul the deed which the bill sought to set aside; but that it was erroneous, in directing the surrender of the personal property and the payment of the personal assets, to the plaintiffs, they not being the legal representatives of the deceased Coleman; and also, in decreeing the payment to the plaintiffs of the proceeds of the sale of the five slaves received in part of the price of the land sold, instead of decreeing, that so much as had been collected, and the bonds and evidences of debt for the residue thereof, should be paid and delivered over into the hands of a receiver, to be collected and held by him, until, as between the appellees and the personal representative of the decedent, the right to the same should be ascertained. Therefore, the decree as to these particulars was reversed with costs, and as to the residue thereof affirmed; and the cause remanded, to be further proceeded in according to the principles here declared. But this decree to be without prejudice to any suit, which any legal representative of Coleman may hereafter bring against Samuel for the recovery of the assets of Coleman in his hands.

Selby v. Morgan.

March, 1833.

(Absent TUCKER,* P.)

Usury—Loan of Bank Stock—Sale.—Question, whether, under the circumstances of the transaction, a sale of bank stock upon a credit, at par, the cash value of the stock at the time of sale being twenty per cent. below par, was a bona fide sale, or an usurious loan under cover of a pretended sale.

Same—Sale of Bank Stock at Par—Market Price below Par—Effect—Case at Bar.—S. being under an urgent necessity to raise a sum of money, requests M. to assist his agent in negotiating a loan thereof at bank; M. lends his assistance, but the bank refuses to lend the money; then M. proposes to S. to sell him bank stock at par upon a credit, the stock being then 20 per cent. below par in the market; and M. enters into a negotiation with the bank to borrow the money S. wanted, for S. upon a pledge of the stock: the bank offers to lend the money upon a pledge of the stock and S.'s note indorsed by M. and M. having thus settled the terms of the loan with the bank, sells his stock to S. at par on a credit, and, immediately, the bank lends S. a sum equal to 4-5ths of the par value of the stock, on a pledge of the stock and on S.'s note indorsed by M. Held, this is a fair sale of bank stock by M. to S. and not a device to cover an usurious loan of money.

In January 1825, a mercantile house of Baltimore having recovered a judgment against Walter Selby of Jefferson, and sued out a writ of fieri facias thereon, which was levied on Selby's property; and Selby having given a forthcoming bond for the delivery of the property at the day and place of sale, and having forfeited the bond; and an award of execution thereon, in the month of March following, being expected as a matter of course; Selby was under an urgent necessity to raise funds, about 4000 dollars, to discharge the debt, and anticipate the award of execution. Therefore, he got a Mr. Hunter, to go first to Baltimore, to procure indulgence from his creditors, if possible, and if he should fail in that effort, then to proceed to Alexandria, and to obtain a loan from some of the banks there, or of any of the banks in the district of Columbia; and he sent a letter by Hunter to Jacob Morgan of Alexandria, requesting him to assist Hunter in negotiating the loan. Hunter's efforts to procure indulgence from 578 the creditors, having *proved abortive, he proceeded to Alexandria, delivered Selby's letter to Morgan, and explained to him the necessity Selby was under to raise money. Morgan lent his aid to Hunter, to negotiate a loan for Selby, at the banks in Alexandria, and at a bank in Georgetown; but no loan could be obtained. And then Morgan wrote the following letter to Selby:

"Alexandria, 21st January 1825. Dear sir, Mr. Hunter handed me your letter of the 10th inst.—Mr. Hunter's efforts, together with my own, have proved unsuccessful in procuring a loan for you. Indeed, all our banks are in a situation, which forbids their lending, except at short periods. I mentioned to Mr. Hunter, that I had bank stock, which you might have, if you thought it would answer your purpose: I would sell it upon such time as would enable you to meet the payments, if nothing better can be done. I can accommodate you to whatever amount you may require. Let me hear from you—and believe me &c. (signed) J. Morgan."

Upon the receipt of this letter, Selby (it seemed) wrote to Morgan, inquiring upon what terms he would sell him 5000 dollars of bank stock; and Morgan wrote him the following letter in reply:

"Alexandria, 5th February 1825. Dear sir, I duly received your letter of the inst. I will sell you 5000 dollars of bank stock of the banks of this town, at par, payable in two years, upon your note with collateral security, with interest at six per cent. payable semi-annually. With this stock, you can immediately command 4000 dollars, either by giving a stock note to the banks, or an individual one, payable in one or two years, or to sell the stock for money. In the first case, you can at your leisure, sell the bank stock, if you do not like the present price of it; in time, the stock may get to par. I should think, then, it would be preferable to borrow what money you want, upon it. The dividends upon the stock will more than pay the interest on the sum you require; and your collections perhaps, 579 *will enable you to pay the amount, without recourse to a sale at all. This is the way I have recently sold a considerable quantity of stock, to those who require loans of money for a longer time than the banks are willing to lend. And I can now sell, in the same way, at any moment, upon the same terms, all the stock I have. If this will answer your purpose, please let me know, and immediately you can command the money. I am &c. (signed) J. Morgan."

*He decided the cause in the court of chancery.
†Usury—Sale of Bank Stock at Par—Market Value below Par—Effect.—Nothing is better settled, in Virginia than that stock, bonds and notes may be sold, like any other property, at any price not above par which may be agreed between the parties. And the sales of stock and notes on credit at par when the market price was as much as 20 per cent. below par have been sustained as lawful. Brockenbrough v. Spindle, 17 Gratt. 33, 41, citing West v. Belches, 5 Munf. 187; Greenhow v. Harris, 6 Munf. 472; Selby v. Morgan, 3 Leigh 577. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Gordon v. Dooley, 10 Fed. Cas. 785; foot-note to Bank of the Valley v. Stribling, 7 Leigh 26; Thornton v. Gordon, 2 Rob. 728.

See monographic note on "Usury" appended to Coffman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. 698.

The market price of stock being at the time as Selby was informed, some twenty or thirty per cent. below par, he hesitated to purchase on the terms proposed; and sent Hunter to Baltimore again, to solicit indulgence from his creditors, with authority, in case he should fail, to accede to Morgan's terms, and purchase his stock. The creditors proving obdurate, Hunter wrote the following letter to Morgan:

"Baltimore, 11th February 1825. Dear sir, I am now here in relation to the claim of T. & G. against Mr. Selby, in satisfaction of which, the offer from you of the bank stock is proposed by Mr. Selby to be acceded to, in case Messrs. T. & G. do not agree to withhold their execution against him, which I have little hope of their doing. Mr. Selby has executed a bond payable to you for 5000 dollars, the amount he wishes to purchase, (and which I have with me) and also a covenant binding himself to execute a deed of trust forthwith upon his property, for the payment (and which I shall see attended to) for the purpose of obtaining the money immediately and without delay, as the scarcity of time does not admit of a more definite arrangement. If this arrangement accords with your arrangements, let me know immediately upon receipt of this, as I shall wait here for your answer. Respectfully &c. (signed) P. P. Hunter."

To this letter, Morgan wrote the following answer: "Alexandria, 14th February 1825. Dear sir, I have just received your letter of the 11th inst. I cannot consent to the arrangement you propose in relation to 580 my stock. I am still *disposed to sell Mr. Selby the amount of bank stock he requires, but in payment of which I must be fully secured, and that security accorded and approved of, before the sale can be consummated. The length of time he requires on the stock, alone renders this condition indispensable. I am &c. (signed) J. Morgan."

With this letter, Hunter returned to Selby, who thereupon repaired himself to Alexandria, in the hope of making better terms with Morgan. The only change of them to which Morgan would assent, was to allow him a credit of two and three years, instead of two years, for the price of the stock, payable in instalments with interest to be paid semi-annually: he still insisted on the par value. Selby still hesitating to purchase on such terms, returned home. But, on or about the 24th March 1825, he went again to Alexandria; and on this second visit, the arrangement was concluded. Morgan sold Selby seventeen shares of stock of the bank of Alexandria of 200 dollars each, and sixteen shares of the bank of Potowmac of 100 dollars each, at par, amounting to 5000 dollars, which Selby was to pay in two instalments, half within two years, and the other half within three years, and to pay him the interest on the whole, half yearly; and on the 26th March, upon Selby giving Morgan his bonds for the instalments, and a deed of trust of two parcels of valuable land in Jefferson to secure the payment, the stock was transferred to Selby. And on the same 26th March, a loan of 4000 dollars, for twelve months, was made by the bank of Alexandria to Selby, upon his own note indorsed by Morgan for his accommodation, and upon a pledge of the whole of the stock purchased of Morgan.

At the time of this sale by Morgan to Selby, of this bank stock at par, the market price of the stock was, at the least, twenty per cent. below par; and this was known to both parties. The stock was afterwards, in April and June 1827, sold to pay the debt it was pledged for to the bank; and the proceeds was only 3560 dollars 25 cents.

So far the facts of the case were uncontested and uncontested.

581 *In August 1827, the trustee to whom Selby had conveyed his lands in Jefferson, to secure the debt to Morgan, having, at Morgan's instance, advertised the lands for sale, in pursuance of the deed, to satisfy so much of the principal as was then due, and all arrears of interest—

Selby exhibited a bill against Morgan, in the superiour court of chancery of Winchester, setting forth the undisputed facts of the transaction above stated, and alleging moreover, that in the interval between Selby's first visit to Alexandria, when he declined to purchase the stock on the terms proposed, and his second visit, when the bargain was concluded, Morgan had himself negotiated with the bank of Alexandria, the terms of the loan of 4000 dollars to Selby, upon Selby's note indorsed by Morgan, and upon a pledge of thirty-three shares of bank stock; and that on Selby's second visit, Morgan informed him of this negotiation with the bank, and of the terms on which the bank had agreed to lend the money, and engaged to indorse the note for Selby's accommodation, in order to induce him to purchase the stock on those hard terms; that this, at last, was Selby's inducement to assent to the terms; and that the negotiation of the loan at bank, was part of, and connected with, the transaction of the sale of the stock by Morgan to him: charging, therefore, that the sale of the stock was a device to cover usury extorted from him by Morgan, and that that contract was, in effect, not a sale of stock, but an usurious loan to Selby, of money obtained from the bank upon the credit of Morgan's indorsement and the pledge of Morgan's stock: and praying an injunction to inhibit the sale of his lands under the deed of trust, and general relief.

The injunction was awarded.

Morgan, in his answer, admitted all the facts above stated as being uncontested; but he denied the other allegations of the bill in very explicit terms.

In March 1828, the chancellor dissolved the injunction, and Selby appealed to this court. The cause was heard here in March 1829, before judges Brooke, Cabell, Carr 582 *and Green; and upon the proofs then in the cause, the court was equally divided in opinion, upon the question of fact, Whether Morgan's engagement to indorse the note for Selby's accommodation, in order to obtain the loan of 4000 dollars from the bank of Alexandria, was so connected with the contract between Selby and Morgan for the sale and purchase of the stock, as to constitute a part of this contract, and the consideration in part of Selby's purchase of the stock? Judge Carr held the negative, and that, therefore, there was no pretense for Selby's complaint, that the transaction for the sale and purchase of the stock, was usurious: judge Brooke was of opinion that the transaction was not usurious, in any view of the case; and judges Cabell and Green held the affirmative on the above question of fact, and thence inferred, that the transaction was usurious. By this decision of this court, the chancellor's order dissolving the injunction was affirmed; and the cause remanded to the court of chancery.

After the cause was returned to the court of chancery, it was clearly proved, that on the 7th March 1825 (whether or no Selby was then at Alexandria upon his first visit, did not certainly appear) Morgan requested the president of the bank of Alexandria, to ascertain from the directors, whether they would lend Selby 4000 dollars, upon the hypothecation of seventeen shares of stock of the bank of Alexandria, and sixteen shares of the bank of Potowmac; and they refused to lend the money on that security, but came to the resolution to make the loan to Selby, upon the security of a pledge of the stock, and of Selby's note indorsed by Morgan: that Morgan was immediately informed of this resolution, by the president of the bank: that Selby had no share in the negotiation with the bank for the loan, and never was apprised of it, till informed by Morgan: and that the delivery of Selby's bonds and mortgage to Morgan, to secure the purchase money of the stock, the transfer of the stock by Morgan to Selby, the hypothecation and transfer of the stock by Selby to the 583 bank, the execution and delivery to *the bank of Selby's note indorsed by Morgan, and the payment by the bank to Selby of the 4000 dollars lent him, were contemporary acts. And it was also proved, that in December 1824, Morgan held only ten shares, and in February 1825, only thirteen shares, of the stock of the bank of Alexandria; so that he must have purchased part of the stock he sold Selby, after the treaty with him commenced.

Upon this new evidence, Selby moved the court of chancery to reinstate the injunction. This motion was overruled. And Selby again appealed to this court.

The cause was very earnestly debated here, by Leigh for the appellant, and by Nicholas and Johnson for the appellee.

Leigh said, that Morgan knowing Selby's urgent necessity for money and his purpose to borrow it, was the first to propose to sell him bank stock, if that would answer his purpose, namely, his purpose of raising money; and, in his letter to Selby, of the 11th February 1825, after pointing out to him the advantages of the purchase of the stock, upon the terms proposed, as a method of raising the money, either by the hypothecation of the stock, or by selling it for money, he told him, that "this was the way he had recently sold a considerable quantity of stock, to those who required loans of money for a longer time than the banks were willing to lend;" that "he could now sell, in the same way, at any moment, upon the same terms, all the stock he had;" and he desired Selby, "if this would answer his purpose" (namely, of raising money) "to let him know, and immediately he" (Selby) "could command the money." The transaction, then, commenced in an effort of Selby to borrow money, under an urgent necessity, known to Morgan; and this letter amounted to an avowal of an usurious intention; an avowal, that this proposed sale of stock was the way which Morgan had devised and practised, to cover loans of money to those who, like Selby, could not borrow it of the banks. And that this was his real design, was the more apparent from the fact, that he did not, at 584 the time, hold as *much stock as he proposed to sell; that he had to buy part of the stock he sold Selby. It was then the scheme of Morgan to get usury on his money: he bought at twenty per cent. below par, for the purpose of selling to Selby, on a credit, at par (though the purchase money was to bear legal interest, and so was made equal to cash, and to be perfectly secured by a deed of trust of real estate) in order, that Selby might raise money on the stock, to the amount of its real value. Then, in the consummation of the transaction, the money that Selby got of the bank, was not, in truth, lent to Selby, at his request, upon the credit of his note and an hypothecation of his stock, but was lent at Morgan's solicitation, upon the credit of Morgan's indorsement, and of an hypothecation of stock furnished by Morgan for the purpose; which, in substance and effect, was the same thing, as if Morgan had borrowed the money of the bank upon his own note indorsed by Selby, and an hypothecation of his own stock, and then lent the money to Selby. And the effort of the counsel was, to liken this case to those of Lowe v. Waller, 2 Doug. 736; Kent v. Lowen, 1 Camp. 177; Dunham v. Dey, 13 Johns. Rep. 40; Dunham v. Gould, 16 Id. 367, S. C.

Nicholas and Johnson maintained, that the transaction was exactly what it purported to be on its face—a sale of bank stock by Morgan to Selby, upon a credit of two and three years, at a price of twenty per cent. above the cash market price at the time of sale; and that the case was, in principle, the same with that of Greenhow's adm'r v. Harris, 6 Munf. 472.

CARR, J. When this case was before this court at a former time, the only question which I discussed in my opinion then delivered, was the question of fact, Whether Morgan engaged to indorse Selby's note at bank, as a part of the contract for the sale and purchase of the bank stock? Coming to the conclusion, that the promise to indorse formed no part of the contract, there was no necessity for my investigating 585 *the law of the case. I think the impression on my mind was, that, if the promise to indorse formed a part of the contract, the transaction was usurious; but it was an impression taken up without examination. The new evidence has changed my view of the facts. When it was found that Selby could not effect a loan of the banks, and the treaty for Morgan's stock commenced, the idea seems to have been, that by depositing the stock with the bank, it would lend the money, on the note of Selby without an indorser. But on the 7th March, 1825, (when Selby was, probably, at Alexandria, and the treaty on foot) the president of the bank, at the request of Morgan, applied to the directors, to know whether they would lend Selby 4000 dollars on his depositing as a security stock of the banks of Alexandria and Potowmac, to the amount of 5000 dollars? The board refused the loan on the stock, unless Selby's note should be indorsed by Morgan. An entry to this effect was made on its journal, and of this, the president says, he gave Morgan information. From this time, I cannot but suppose, that the treaty for the stock, proceeded upon the ground, that it was to be hypothecated, Selby's note given to the bank, and Morgan to indorse it. Selby bought the stock at par, executed his bonds to Morgan for 5000 dollars, payable with interest, in two and three years, and secured by deeds of trust; he gave about twenty per cent. above the cash price in the market; Selby then deposited the stock with the bank, with a power of sale; executed his note, which Morgan indorsed; and the bank paid Selby the money lent. It is contended, that the transaction, though in appearance a sale of stock, was, in truth, a loan of money at exorbitant usury. This is the question for examination.

In all such cases, lord Mansfield tells us, "The view of the parties must be ascertained, to satisfy the court, that there is a loan and borrowing, and that the substance was, to borrow on the one part, and to lend on the other." We have decided often, that the sale of stock, or any other *property, at whatever price, does not of itself constitute usury. In Greenhow v. Harris, judge Roane says, "I distinctly admit the right of a party to sell property, such as bank shares, at whatever price is agreed on. The transaction becomes usurious, only, when the object is to borrow money, and not to purchase stock, and the price of the stock is graduated as a device to effect the purpose; or where there is a combination between the seller of the stock on a credit, and the purchaser for cash." Does the case before us fall within the definitions here given? Was the substance, to borrow on the one part, and to lend on the other, and not to purchase stock? I can have no doubt, that Selby meant to buy Morgan's stock, and Morgan to sell it. It is equally clear that Selby was in distress for money, and wanted the stock as a means to raise it; and that Morgan knew this. Indeed, their first communications on the subject, grew out of a request of Selby that Morgan would assist his agent Hunter, in an attempt to negotiate a loan with the banks. The attempt failed, and then Morgan wrote to Selby telling him that he had stock, which he would sell him at par, giving him such time as would enable him to make collections; pointing out the facilities which the stock would afford in raising money, especially by giving a stock note to the banks, or an individual one, by which he tells him he could command the money at once. The whole aspect of the case exhibits Morgan as the seller of stock, not the lender of money. And the difficulty with me has been to bring this within any of the cases which have been cited. In Stribling v. Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 132, we decided, that the sale of stock at twenty per cent. above the market price was usury, because (solely because) there was indissolubly linked to that sale, a loan of money by the seller to the buyer. Here that distinctive feature is wanting. Morgan sells his stock, the bank lend its money, not to Morgan but to Selby; not on Morgan's credit, but on the credit of Selby, the stock and Morgan: a loan not influenced by the purchase and rate *of the stock, but made by the bank, in the course of its every day business; a loan agreed on all hands to be free from usury. I cannot well imagine, how a loan thus distinct, thus fair in itself, where no combination, no community of interest or profit can be detected, between the seller of the stock and the lender of the money, should make the sale of the stock usurious, which without it all admit would be untainted.

This case was likened to Lowe v. Waller. There, Waller wanted to raise £200. on a bill of exchange. Stratton & Harris hearing of it, sent their broker to let him know, that they would lend him £100. in money and £100. in goods, but that the goods should be choice sorts; he should have them at the warehouse price, and should not lose by them. When Waller went to see them, they pretended that they had no money then, but goods only, and desired that the business might lay over. Thus, they lured him on for about three weeks, knowing his extreme distress for money. At length, they sent him word, if he would come the next day, he should have £50. in money, and the rest in goods. He attended. One of the partners went out, and soon returned, saying he could get no money, but if Waller would take the whole in goods he should have them directly. Waller agreed: a broker who was present, sorted out the goods: they were immediately taken by him to an auctioneer, who sold them for £117. a sacrifice of nearly fifty per cent. Lord Mansfield said, it was impossible to wink so hard, as not to see, that there was no idea between the parties, of any thing but a loan of money; and that the only purpose of Stratton & Harris was to contrive to get more than legal interest. The device was, to give the transaction the colour of the sale of goods. Stripping off this covering, the court considered the goods sent to auction, as still the goods of Stratton & Harris; the money raised by the sale, as their money; and this money advanced by them to Waller, at a premium of near fifty per cent. And this has always been, and I trust always will be, considered a perfectly *sound decision. But does our case fall within it? I cannot think so. There seems to me some strong distinctions between them: from first to last, the treaty between Selby and Morgan, was for a sale of stock. Morgan never offered to lend Selby money. It was, in truth, a sale of stock. If you connect it with the bank transaction, it was still a sale of stock, which Morgan knew Selby meant to hypothecate with the bank for a loan of money, and to enable him to effect which, Morgan agreed to indorse his note. Still there was no borrowing and lending between Selby and Morgan; no sale of the stock to the bank to raise the money; nor any sale or sacrifice of it contemplated. The 5000 dollars in stock were pledged, as a collateral security for the 4000 dollars borrowed by Selby of the bank, not of Morgan; and it was understood, that the loan was for twelve months. Thus Selby would have twelve months to return the loan, and redeem his stock; and within this time, he seemed very confident that he could make his collections. In truth, eighteen months were given him: if within that time he had paid him off his note, the stock would not have been sacrificed: he would have held it. In Pollard v. Baylors, 6 Munf. 433, it is strongly laid down, that a penalty from which a party may deliver himself, by complying with his contract, does not make such contract usurious. While Selby kept the stock, the dividends represented its par value in money; and, in the mutations of the market, the stock might have risen far above its par value. We have known this the case with more than one bank. This case, therefore, does not fall within the principle of Lowe v. Waller.

The case of Kent v. Lowen was also relied on. There, Lowen made a promissory note to Coates & Co. for £153. 15. 0. payable at ninety days; it was indorsed to the plaintiff, who brought assumpsit on it; the defence was usury; the facts were these; Coates & Co. accommodated Lowen with their acceptance at three months, in consideration of which Lowen executed his note to them at ninety days for the same sum, with the addition of two and a half per cent. 589 *commission. The device attempted there, was to cover the usury by that usage, under which country bankers have been allowed to take a certain commission, besides legal interest, for their trouble and expense; but that was for discounting bills: here (lord Ellenborough said) there was no colour for a commission, Coates & Co. being the acceptors, and not the discounters of the bill; and the commission was a mere cloak for usury. I consider that just as plain a case of usury, as if Coates & Co. had advanced money to Lowen to receive two and a half per cent. above legal interest. Their acceptance bound them to pay the money unconditionally, and it was their money on which they took the usury. But our case is not like that. Morgan sold stock to Selby, and indorsed Selby's note to the bank: but this did not make him the lender of the money: the bank was the lender: he was a mere surety for the borrower, lending his name to him. The difference of his position from that of Coates & Co. is strikingly illustrated by the fact, that indorsers are allowed to take a commission for the loan of their credit and responsibility.

The case of Dunham v. Dey was cited. It turns on precisely the same point with Kent v. Lowen; and admits of the same answer.

I beg leave to refer, though, to what justice Spencer says, upon the subject of indorsers: "It has been said (he observes) that it is the usage for indorsers of bills of exchange, and sureties on custom house bonds, to take a per centage, for advancing their responsibilities. I see nothing improper in this; there is no loan of money directly, or indirectly, in either of these cases; they come neither within the terms nor the mischiefs of the statute; and they are innocent transactions."

Thus the case before us seems to me essentially different from those cited in its support. The sale of the stock being by Morgan, and the loan of the money by the bank, without the slightest proof of collusion or combination between them, I cannot so connect the transactions, as to taint the sale of the stock with usury.

590 *I think the chancellor was right in refusing to reinstate the injunction.

CABELL, J. Upon a careful re-examination of this case, I am now of opinion, that the transaction was not usurious; and, therefore, that the order of the chancellor overruling the motion to reinstate the injunction, must be affirmed.

BROOKE, J. I am clearly of the same opinion.

Order affirmed.

Gilliam v. Clay and Others.

March, 1882.

(Absent TUCKER, P.)

Witnesses—Competency of Oblige and Assignor to Prove Bond Usurious.—The obligee and assignor of a bond is not a competent witness for the obligor. In any controversy between the obligor and assignee, to prove that the contract was founded in a usurious transaction between the assignee and obligor.

James Gilliam executed his bond, dated the 28th January 1819, to Charles Gilliam for 2000 dollars, payable two years after the date. Charles Gilliam, by assignment expressing that it was made for value received, and dated the 11th February 1819, assigned the bond to Charles Clay. And James Gilliam, by deed of trust, dated the same 11th February, conveyed certain real estate in Lynchburg, to trustees, to secure the payment of the debt to Charles Clay, the assignee of the bond. Charles Clay gave this bond to his son Oden Clay, and then died. The money not being paid, Oden Clay the holder of the bond required the trustees to make sale of the trust subject, and pay the debt out of the proceeds, and they accordingly advertised it for sale, in pursuance of the deed.

591 *Whereupon, James Gilliam exhibited a bill against Oden Clay and the trustees, in the superior court of chancery of Lynchburg, alleging, that he (James)

Witnesses—Competency of Assignor of a Bond to Prove Usury.—For the proposition that the assignor of a bond is not a competent witness for the obligor in any controversy between the obligor and assignee, to prove that the contract was founded in a usurious transaction between the assignee and obligor, the principal case is cited in Chapman v. Hiden, 2 Pat. & H. 97; Wise v. Lamb, 9 Gratt. 399, 306, and note; Thornton v. Gordon, 2 Rob. 727.

See monographic note on "Witnesses" appended to Clalborne v. Parrish, 3 Wash. 146; monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801; monographic note on "Usury" appended to Coffman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. 608.

applied to Charles Clay, the assignee, for a loan of money, and negotiated the terms of the loan, which were usurious; that he offered his own bond and the real security he afterwards gave, but Clay told him that the bond must be executed to a third person, and assigned by the obligee to him; that thereupon, he executed his bond for the 2000 dollars to his brother Charles Gilliam, Charles assigned it to Clay, and James executed the deed of trust to secure the payment to Clay; that no consideration passed between Charles the obligee, and James the obligor, or between Clay the assignee, and Charles his assignor; that the sum which Clay actually paid him (James) was only 1450 dollars; Clay retaining the other 550 dollars, by way of discount at the rate of thirteen and three quarters per cent. per annum, computed on the amount of the bond, which was the usurious premium agreed to be paid by James Gilliam for the loan. Therefore, the bill prayed an injunction to inhibit the trustees from selling the trust subject, and general relief. The injunction was awarded.

The defendant, Oden Clay, answered, that his father had given him this bond as an advancement; and, as to the allegations of usury, that he was intirely ignorant on that subject.

The trustees also, in their answers, disavowed all knowledge of the usury charged.

The only proof which the plaintiff adduced of the alleged usury, was the deposition of Charles Gilliam, the obligee in the bond, and assignor thereof to Charles Clay; and this deposition stated the facts charged in the bill, explicitly and positively.

The chancellor was of opinion, that Charles Gilliam the assignor, was not a competent witness to prove the charge of usury; and, therefore, dissolved the injunction, and dismissed the bill. From this decree the plaintiff appealed to this court.

592 *Leigh, for the appellant. It is settled, that in an action by an indorsee and holder of a note negotiable at bank against the maker, the first as well as any other indorser is a competent witness for the maker, to prove usury, either between the maker and payee, or between the maker and any indorsee. Taylor v. Beck, 3 Rand. 316. Yet, in such an action, the holder must in his declaration shew his title from the payee and first indorser, just as in an action upon a bond by the assignee against the obligor, the assignee must in his declaration shew his title from the obligee and assignor. If, in this case, the assignee had brought debt on the bond against the obligor, and the obligor to sustain the plea of usury, had called the assignor to prove usury as between the obligor and assignee: how would the assignor have been interested in the event? His interest would be, that the assignee should succeed against the obligor, since a recovery against him would, in all likelihood, prevent the assignee from having recourse against himself: in this view, his interest would be against the party adducing him as a witness. If the obligor should be cast, he certainly could never have any action against the obligee. But if the assignee should be cast in his action against the obligor, and that upon the plea of usury, as between him and the assignee, sustained by the evidence of the assignor, the assignee would have his action against the assignor upon the contract of assignment; and in this action, the record of the action against the obligor would indeed be evidence, but evidence only to prove due diligence to recover of the obligor, and to prove that the recovery was defeated by the defence of usury; but it would not be evidence, as between the assignor and assignee, that there was usury in fact between the obligor and assignee. If the assignor should rely upon that defence, he would have to prove it by the testimony aliunde; he would not be allowed to sustain the defence, by the exhibition of a verdict founded on his own evidence. But here is a bill in equity exhibited by the obligor against the assignee and his 593 trustees, praying general *relief, upon which the court might have properly awarded an injunction only to stay the sale of the trust subject which the obligor had mortgaged to the assignee of his bond, until the question of usury should be tried and determined at law. Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. 407; Martin v. Lindsay's adm'rs, 1 Leigh, 499; Fitzhugh v. Gordon, 2 Leigh, 626. I do not see how the assignor can have any interest, that a decree to that effect should be rendered for the obligor. Such a decree would be no evidence for any purpose whatever, in an action at law by the assignee against the obligor on the bond, or against the assignor on the contract of assignment, or in an ejectment by the trustees for the trust subject; since the suit and decree in equity, would be res inter alios acta.

Johnson for the appellee Clay. The holder of a note negotiable at bank (which stands on the footing of a foreign bill of exchange) may sue the maker, or the first or any other indorser; and though, in either case, he is obliged, in his declaration, to shew his title from the first indorser, yet in an action against an indorser he is never bound to shew the record of any action he may have prosecuted against the maker, and his failure to recover the contents of the note from him. But in an action by an assignee of a bond against the assignor, the plaintiff is obliged to shew the record of any action he may have brought against the obligor, to prove due diligence and his failure to recover or get satisfaction of the debt from him, in order to entitle himself to recover it from the assignor. Suppose the assignee in this case, had brought his action on the bond against the obligor; he had pleaded usury as between him and the assignee, and called the assignor to prove the plea true; the assignor had been admitted as a witness, and proved the usury; and a verdict had been found upon that evidence, and judgment rendered, for the defendant; then, if the assignee had brought an action against the assignor on the contract of assignment, he would have been bound to shew in 594 his declaration, *due diligence against the obligor, and the reason of his failure to recover the money of him, and for that purpose to shew the record of his action against the obligor: but that record would shew, that his claim was tainted with usury, without at all shewing how it had been proved to be so; and so, by his own shewing, he would not be entitled to recover against his assignor. It is thus that in an action at law by the assignee against the obligor, the assignor would have an interest to sustain the obligor's plea of usury as between the assignee and obligor; and therefore, would be an incompetent witness to such a purpose. If incompetent at law, he is equally so in this suit in equity. If his evidence should be admitted here, as a foundation for the decree suggested by the appellant's counsel, to injoin the sale under the deed of trust till the question of usury shall be tried at law, it is not easy to see, why it would not be equally admissible on the final hearing, as a foundation for a final decree that the claim is usurious. If the evidence were admitted here for any purpose, the record of this suit, containing the deposition of the assignor, would be admissible evidence in any controversy at law between the assignee and obligor; and so the deposition of the assignor would be in fact read on the trial of the action at law.

Leigh, in reply. In the trial of an action of debt on the bond brought by the assignee against the obligor, upon the plea of usury as between them, if the assignor was called and admitted as a witness to prove the plea, there would be no difficulty whatever in exhibiting on the record the fact of such evidence being adduced and admitted, by a bill of exceptions; and if it was not done, it would be the assignee's own fault. And, in his action against the assignor, he would not be bound, in framing his declaration, to follow the usual form; there is nothing to prevent him, after shewing the record of his action against the obligor, from averring and proving that the obligor's plea of usury between him and the assignee, had been sustained by the evidence of the assignor contrary to the truth of the facts; and so, resting his claim against the assignor

595 upon the contract of assignment *expressed to be made for value received, and putting it on the assignor to prove the usury if he relied on it in his defence, by other evidence than a verdict founded on his own testimony. Suppose, in an action by an assignee of a bond against the obligor, the obligor should plead usury between him and the obligee, and should sustain the plea by evidence unquestionably competent, and so defeat the action; would the record of that action be such conclusive evidence of the usury, in the subsequent action by the assignee against the assignor, as to preclude the assignor from shewing a fair and legal consideration given by him to the obligor? If in such case, the record would not conclude the assignor's defence, neither would the record, in the present case, conclude the assignor's claim against the assignee.

CARR, J. The only question is, Whether Charles Gilliam, the obligee and assignor of the bond, is a competent witness to prove the usury between the obligor and assignee, alleged in the bill? I think he is not a competent witness. I am well aware, that objections to the competency of evidence have been much narrowed by the later adjudications, and that to disqualify a witness, he must have some legal, certain and immediate interest in the result of the cause, or in the record, as an instrument of evidence. Has not this witness such an interest? In Taylor v. Beck, we decided that an indorser might be a witness, where his evidence operated against his interest; as if he was called to prove some vice in the transaction between himself and the maker of the note, not touching the contract between himself and the holder. But here the effect of the evidence would be very different. The witness stands as obligee and assignor: he is examined to prove, that he gave no consideration for the bond; that he received none for the assignment, but was a mere instrument, in effecting an usurious loan, made by his assignee to his obligor. It is seen, at a glance, that this evidence, so far as it may avail, renders the whole transaction—the bond, the assignment, and the deed of trust, utterly void; and thus clears the wit-

596 ness of his liability as assignor. *It is objected, however, that this is not a bill for final relief, but merely seeking to stay the hand of the trustee, till the assignee of the bond shall sue on it at law, and thus give the obligor an opportunity of pleading and proving the usury. This objection admits, in effect, that, if this were a bill for final relief, this witness could not be heard; and very properly admits it; for he would be, by his evidence, establishing the usury, upon which the court would decree the whole transaction void, and cancel the deed, bond and assignment. But does it make any difference, as to the competency of the witness, whether this be a bill for final relief or not? If so, and we are to have the usury proved in this proceeding, by evidence which would not be heard on a bill for relief; it is carrying the principle of Marks v. Morris to a fearful extent indeed. Here is a transaction perfectly fair on its face; a bond executed, and assigned for value, and a deed of trust to secure it. A court of equity is called on to injoin the trustee, because the transaction is usurious, and to send the assignee to law to sue on his bond, for the express purpose of enabling the obligor to establish the usury, and thereby get clear of the whole debt. Before we take this strong and decisive step, must we not be well satisfied that usury has been practised? and must not that conviction be wrought by competent disinterested testimony? Suppose a bill filed charging usury, and professing to be full handed with proof; and that the answer denies the charge, and no proof of it is produced: would we not dissolve and dismiss at once? But between no proof, and a witness directly interested in establishing the usury, where is the difference? Surely, our minds cannot be impressed with the existence of usury in this proceeding, by a witness whom we would reject for his interest, if we were hearing the case finally, and who would be utterly incompetent to give evidence, in a trial at law on the bond, of which he is the obligee and assignor. The fountain is polluted at its source and the waters cannot be pure.

The other judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.

March, 1832.

[24 Am. Dec. 683.]

(Absent BROOKS, J.)

Bonds—Assignment—Effect of Equities of Third Persons as to Bona Fide Assignee.—Though the assignee of a bond takes it subject to any equity of the obligor, that attached to it in the hands of the obligee, he does not take it subject to any equity of a third person not party to the bond, of which he has no notice.

Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Therefore, where H. sold land to M. and took no security for the purchase money; and M. then sold the same land to F., took his bonds for the purchase money, and assigned those bonds for valuable consideration, the assignees having no notice of H.'s claim to a lien on the land for the purchase money due him by M.—though H. might have been entitled to payment of the purchase money due him from M. out of the purchase money due from F. to M. if F.'s bonds for the same had remained in M.'s hands, yet H. cannot assert any such equity as against the bona fide assignees of the bonds.

Predham Moore sold a parcel of land in Campbell to John Lee, for 8000 dollars, and executed a conveyance of the same to him, but the conveyance was never recorded. Lee, before he had paid any part of the purchase money to Moore, sold the land to Hancock, or rather he exchanged it with Hancock for real property in Lynchburg; but Lee neither conveyed the land to Hancock, nor put him in possession of it. Hancock, afterwards, sold the land to Moore, the original owner, for 12,000 dollars worth of timber to be delivered at Lynchburg. Lee being thus indebted to Moore in the sum of 8000 dollars, and Moore indebted to Hancock in the sum of 12,000 dollars, the parties met, and made an arrangement, whereby Hancock agreed to pay Moore the sum of 8000 dollars which Lee owed him, by setting off and discounting that sum from the sum of 12,000 dollars, which Moore owed Hancock, on account of his pur-

Bonds—Assignment—Equity of Third Party.—While it is well settled that the assignee of a chose in action takes subject to all the equities of the debtor against the assignor, existing at the time of the assignment, yet, if he purchases in good faith he does not take subject to the equities of third persons, who are not parties to the transaction and of whose equity he has no notice. 6 Va. Vendor and Vendee—Equitable Lien.—The implied equitable lien of the vendor of an equitable estate, where the contract of a sale is not recorded, will be enforced by a court of equity against the vendee, his heirs, purchasers with notice, and unsecured general creditors, but not against purchasers for value without notice, nor against mortgage or trust creditors with or without notice. Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 614, citing the principal case.

In Brasley v. Catron, 8 Leigh 527, the principal case is cited to the point that the equitable lien of the vendor ought not to be extended beyond its present limits as it is violative of the policy of our law which seeks as far as possible to discourage secret liens. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in McCandlish v. Keen, 18 Gratt. 622; Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 612; foot-note to Kyles v. Tait, 6 Gratt. 44.

Equal Equity—Priority.—In Cox v. Romine, 9 Gratt. 20, it is said, it may be laid down as a general rule, that between mere equities, equal in all other respects, the elder shall prevail. If, however, the junior claimant shall have an advantage of law, or superior equity, such party shall prevail, citing the principal case.

chase of the land from him; and Lee was to give his bond to Moore for 500 dollars, for the rents and profits of the land during the time he held it. All this was accordingly done: and Moore executed a covenant to Hancock to deliver him 4000 dollars worth of timber, being the residue of the consideration he had contracted to pay Hancock for 598 *the land. As the conveyance from Moore to Lee had never been recorded, and as Lee had not made any conveyance to Hancock, and as Hancock's sale to Moore had again vested the right to the land in him, the parties thought nothing more necessary to re-vest in him the legal title also, but to surrender to Moore the deed he had executed to Lee, to be cancelled: the deed was, therefore, surrendered to Moore. Moore delivered only a part of the timber he had covenanted to deliver to Hancock; and Hancock brought an action against him upon the covenant, for the residue, and recovered judgment for 1511 dollars damages, and costs of suit. By this time, it appeared, Moore was insolvent. Hancock assigned this judgment against Moore (inter alia) to Holcombe and others, trustees, to secure a debt due to Martin Hancock. But before Hancock had recovered the judgment against Moore, Moore sold the land in question to Lewis Franklin, for 6500 dollars, payable in instalments of 1000 dollars, each, in June 1827-'28-'29-'30-'31-'32, and 500 dollars in June 1833; and Moore conveyed the land to Franklin, and Franklin gave him his bonds for the several instalments. At the time of Franklin's purchase, he had no notice of the debt due by Moore to Hancock, or indeed of Moore's having ever purchased the land from Hancock. Moore assigned Franklin's bonds for the purchase money, to Murrell & Meem, for a valuable consideration; and they gave Franklin immediate notice of the assignment.

After the sale by Moore to Franklin, and the assignment of Franklin's bonds to Murrell & Meem, but before Franklin had discharged any of the bonds, Holcombe and others, the trustees to whom Hancock's judgment against Moore was assigned, Martin Hancock, the cestui que trust, and John Hancock, exhibited a bill in the superior court of chancery of Lynchburg, against Moore and Franklin, in which they insisted that the 4000 dollars worth of timber which Moore had covenanted to deliver to John Hancock, for the balance of the purchase money he had contracted to pay 599 Hancock *for the land, having been no otherwise secured than by Moore's personal covenant, Hancock had a lien, in equity, upon the land itself, for so much of the consideration as remained unpaid; namely, for the amount of Hancock's judgment against Moore for 1511 dollars, and interest thereon; and that this lien bound the land while it was in Moore's hands; and as Franklin had not yet paid any part of the purchase money, it bound the land in his hands also. And they prayed the court to declare and enforce the lien, and meantime to enjoin Franklin from paying Moore the purchase money he had contracted to pay him.

The answers of Moore and Franklin shewed the fact, that Franklin's bonds for the purchase money he owed Moore, had been assigned by Moore, for valuable consideration, to Murrell & Meem, and that they had given notice of the assignment to Franklin; and that Franklin had no notice of the equity asserted by the bill, until after he had received the notice of the assignment of his bonds to Murrell & Meem. Moore insisted, that the plaintiffs had no such equitable lien as they claimed: Franklin said, that if they had, he ought to be relieved from the payment of the purchase money he owed, pro tanto; and submitted to the court, whether Murrell & Meem the assignees of his bonds, or the plaintiffs, had the preferable right.

Murrell & Meem moved the court for a rule upon the plaintiffs, to make them parties defendants in the cause; which motion was overruled.

There was proof, that Moore had assigned Franklin's bonds to Murrell & Meem for valuable consideration, and that they had given immediate notice of the assignment to Franklin; proof also, of the transactions between Moore and Lee, Lee and Hancock. Hancock and Moore, and then of the arrangement between Lee, Hancock and Moore, and the several contracts for the sale and purchase of the land, as above stated; but no proof, that Franklin had the least notice of the equity asserted in the bill, or of the facts on which the plaintiffs' claim to the equitable lien was founded, *until some time after his purchase from Moore, and after he had received notice of the assignment of his bonds by Moore to Murrell & Meem; or that Murrell & Meem ever had notice of the plaintiffs' equity, until some time after Franklin's bonds had been assigned to them, and they had paid the consideration for the assignment, and given notice thereof to Franklin.

The chancellor declared, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the equitable lien asserted in their bill, upon the land in Franklin's hands, and made an interlocutory decree for the plaintiffs accordingly: from which decree the defendants appealed to this court.

CARR, J. This is a bill in equity to subject land to sale, under the lien for the purchase money. As the effort seems, of late, to have been to push this doctrine of equitable lien, beyond what seems to me its legitimate extent, I have thought it might not be amiss to look a little into it. It is a doctrine of comparatively modern date, and seems to have arisen from a supposed understanding between the parties. In Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason, 212; 4 Wheat. 292, in notis, judge Story discusses the subject with much learning. He says, "The rule is manifestly founded, on a supposed conformity with the intention of the parties, upon which the law raises an implied contract; and therefore it is not inflexible, but ceases to act, where the circumstances of the case do not justify such a conclusion." In that case, there was certainly no express waiver of the equitable lien: it was brought by an appeal to the supreme court of the U States, 4 Wheat. 255, and the supreme court was clearly of opinion, that, from the circumstances, the parties contemplated no such lien, and therefore decided, without difficulty, against its existence. In Bailey v. Greenleaf, 7 Wheat. 46, it was decided, that this lien could not be asserted against creditors holding under a bona fide conveyance from the vendee; and this, after a most able examination of the authorities by the chief justice. Some of his remarks are exceedingly strong to shew the mischief which would flow from extending this equity beyond its just bounds. He says, this lien "is a secret invisible trust, known only to the vendor and vendee, and those to whom it may be communicated in fact. To the world, the vendee appears to hold the estate divested of any trust whatever; and credit is given to him, in the confidence that the property is his own, in equity as well as at law. A vendor relying upon his lien, ought to reduce it to a mortgage, so as to give notice of it to the world. If he does not, he is, in some degree, accessory to the fraud committed on the public, by an act which exhibits the vendee as the complete owner of an estate, on which he claims a secret lien." Id. 51, again, he says, "The lien of the vendor, if in the nature of a trust, is a secret trust, and although to be preferred to any other subsequent equal equity, unconnected with a legal advantage, or equitable advantage which gives a superiour claim to the legal estate, will be postponed to a subsequent equal equity connected with such advantage." Id. 57. And for this he cites Buller's note, Harg. Co. Litt. 290. b, note 1, § 13, and Stanhope v. Earl Verney. there stated. These remarks seem to me very sound; and beyond the limits here established, I am unwilling to extend the equitable lien.

In the case before us, looking at the facts of the transactions between Moore and Lee, Lee and Hancock, Hancock and Moore, and then between the three parties, the case does not appear to me, so much like a regular sale and transfer of land, as a cancelling, by the parties all round, of their contracts,— Moore paying Hancock 4000 dollars in timber for his speculation, and taking back his land: more especially, as, instead of regular conveyances, they agreed that the deed made to Lee should be destroyed, and that

Lee should give Moore his bond for 500 dollars for the rents "and profits of the land while he held it. These facts furnish strong evidence to my mind, that the parties never expected or intended to apply the equitable lien to this transaction. But I shall not discuss this point further; for it is clear to me, that if, as between Hancock and Moore, this lien ever existed, it has been lost, by the subsequent transactions. Moore soon after he got back the land, sold and conveyed it to Franklin, who executed to him his bonds for the purchase money; and these bonds were assigned to Murrell & Meem, for valuable consideration, and Franklin had notice of these assignments before he had notice of Hancock's claim to this secret trust, this lien for purchase money. The assignees ought to have been made parties; for, as nobody can suppose Franklin will be left exposed to pay both claims, the question is, which has the preference? But though not parties, the claim of the assignees, is perhaps sufficiently before the court, to enable us to make this comparison. We have seen from the case of Bailey v. Greenleaf, that this equitable lien will be "postponed to a subsequent equal equity, if connected with a legal advantage." The assignees here, have that very legal advantage. They can sue at law on the bonds, and this lien will furnish no defence in that forum. Therefore they have nothing to ask of equity, but hands off—let us alone. But independent of this legal advantage, their claim is, I think, decidedly the best. It was said in the argument, that these assignees took the bonds subject to all the equity of the obligor. True, to all the equity of the obligor: but it is equally true, that they do not take them subject to the latent equity of a third person. Murray v. Lylburn, 1 Johns. C. R. 443; Livingston v. Dean, Id. 479. And that is the case here. Franklin has no equity against these bonds, unless he be liable to this equitable lien: he cannot be liable to both: and I think it clear, that he is liable to the bonds.

I have discussed these questions, since what has been said may tend to put an end to the controversy; but they are not properly presented by the record; since 603 *Murrell & Meem, though parties interested in them, have not been made parties in the cause. They ought, undoubtedly, to be made parties, that they may have an opportunity to assert their rights.

CABELL, J. Without deciding the point, I am willing to consider Hancock as having the same rights that he would have had, if he had conveyed the legal title to Moore, and if the consideration for the purchase had been a pecuniary one. If there were no persons concerned in this case, other than Hancock, Moore and Franklin, it would be perfectly clear, that, as Franklin received notice of Hancock's lien, before he paid his purchase money, the land would be liable in his hands, for the unpaid purchased money due from Moore to Hancock; and it would be equally clear, that Moore, also, would have a lien on the lands for the purchase money due to him from Franklin; although that lien would be subordinate to the lien of Hancock. But there are other persons, whose interests are involved in the controversy. Franklin's bonds to Moore for the purchase money, have been assigned to Murrell & Meem, for valuable consideration, and (it seems) without notice of any equity affecting them. This assignment of the bonds transferred to Murrell & Meem, the lien on the lands which Moore had before the assignment. Is this lien, thus acquired, subordinate in the hands of Murrell & Meem, to that of Hancock? I think not.

The doctrine of the lien of a vendor of lands, is the creature of a court of equity. It ought not, therefore, to be so applied as to operate injustice. So long as it is confined to the parties and their heirs, and to those claiming under them with notice, it can never be liable to objection. But the lien of the vendor, whether it be regarded as a natural equity, or as a trust, is founded on no matter of record, or even of express contract, but is merely implied from the supposed intentions of the parties. It is, in itself, secret and invisible. The vendor had it vendee, in some other form, so as to be notice to all the world. If he omit to do this; if he convey the land to the vendee, in such a manner as to make him appear to be the complete owner, with full power to sell or to charge it; justice forbids, that he should use his secret lien to the injury of those who, in ignorance of it (an ignorance produced by his own omissions), have acquired for valuable consideration, either the legal title or an equitable incumbrance. That this is so, as to a purchaser of the legal title, is undeniable. It is certainly true, also, as to a mortgagee, who is not regarded in a court of equity as a purchaser, in the full extent of the term, but as an equitable incumbrancer, having the advantage of a legal title. It is also true as to a mere equitable incumbrancer, who has not the legal title, but who has the preferable right to call for the legal title; as a creditor whose debt is secured by a deed of trust. I think the principles of equity require us to go one step further, and to protect from this secret lien of the vendor all subsequent equitable incumbrances, however acquired, provided they be acquired for valuable consideration and without notice. What is the principle of justice, that exempts from the lien of the vendor, a subsequent purchaser? It is, that he has made his contract and paid his money, without notice. His acquisition of the legal title, does not add to the justice of his claim, the weight of a feather. In justice, then, the equitable incumbrancer stands on the same ground with the purchaser of the legal title; for he also has made his contract, and has paid his money, without notice of the secret lien of the vendor. I do not think it necessary to fortify the equity of a mere incumbrancer, by shewing that he has a legal advantage or preferable right to call for the legal title: he has an equitable lien on the land: that is sufficient for his purpose. It is not to be affected by the lien of the vendor; because, even as to the mere equitable incumbrancer, the vendor has no equity. It is on this ground that *I think 605 Murrell & Meem must prevail in this controversy. I place no reliance on their having a legal title to the bonds, although I do think they have such title. That is not the sort of legal advantage of which the cases speak: the legal advantage there spoken of, is, I think, some advantage as to the land: but the only legal advantage, which the assignment of the bonds gave to Murrell & Meem, was a legal title to the bonds, and the right to sue at law, in their own names: as to the land, the assignment gave them no legal advantage whatever; as to the land, their claim was purely equitable. True, they might have sued at law on the bonds, but that did not strengthen their claim to the lands.

The doctrine of lien, if thus understood and enforced, will have a just operation, and be freed from the reproaches so frequently cast upon it.

Murrell & Meem ought, therefore, to be made parties, they being the parties interested to contest the claim asserted by the appellees; and, if in the controversy between them and the appellees, their case shall turn, as it now appears, that they acquired these bonds, bona fide, by assignment for valuable consideration, and gave Franklin notice of the assignment, before they had any notice of the equity asserted by the appellees, their claim to the money due on the bonds ought no wise to be affected by that equity.

TUCKER, P. I shall consider this case, as if there had been an ordinary sale for money by Hancock to Moore, a deed made, and part of the purchase money in arrear; reserving for some other occasion the inquiry, whether the vendor's lien extends farther than to secure the payment of purchase money; in other words, whether it can be extended to secure the performance of covenants to do some collateral act as the consideration of the sale.

In the view I take of the case, the material facts are simply these: Moore, after his purchase from Hancock, sold the land to Franklin, executed a deed to him, received his bonds for the purchase money, and 606 assigned them to Murrell & Meem, all which occurred before Franklin had any intimation of the claim, of Hancock. On hearing of the claim, he determined to retain the purchase money, until it should be decided, whether Hancock, or the assignees of the bonds, had the best right to it. He has, therefore, been in no default, nor has he at all committed himself, for Murrell & Meem did not take the assignments upon any assurance of payment from him. They never applied to him until after the assignment. It is obvious, therefore, that there is no pretense for making him pay it twice: so that the question is really between Hancock and the assignees, which shall have this portion of the purchase money yet in the hands of Franklin. In other words, whose is it? Does it belong to Hancock by virtue of his implied lien, or to the assignees who have purchased the bonds without notice of the arrears due to Hancock? I think the latter have the best right.

Where the vendee of land still retains the estate it is clearly liable for the whole of the unpaid purchase money by virtue of the vendor's lien. Where he has sold to a sub-vendee, and the title has been made by him, and the money paid before notice of the original vendor's lien, the sub-vendee holds discharged of that lien. Where, however, a part of the purchase money is unpaid by the sub-vendee, the land in his hands is liable for that unpaid portion, but for no more. The equity is, that he shall pay to the original vendor whatever he himself yet owes to his own vendor. If he owes any thing, he, and his land, are discharged, upon his paying up that to the original vendor's demand; and if he owes nothing, neither himself nor his land is in any wise responsible.

Try this case by these principles. Was any thing due from Franklin to Moore (when he received notice of Hancock's claim) which equity demanded that he should pay over to Hancock instead of Moore? Nothing was due. His bonds, indeed, had been due to Moore, but Moore had sold them, for 607 value, to persons who knew nothing* of the vendor's pretensions. From the moment of that sale, Franklin ceased to owe Moore any thing. He became the debtor of the assignees; and as he owed Moore nothing, he could be liable to Hancock for nothing, as has been already shewn.

It is true that assignees take every bond subject to the obligor's equity against the obligee; but I have yet to learn, that they take subject to an unknown equity of a stranger against the obligee. The equity set up by an obligor is against the bond: it is to avoid the bond. But the equity of Hancock is not to discharge or vacate, but to enforce, the bond, for his benefit. Can it be possible that the assignees take subject to this equity? They bought, indeed, subject to any equity of Franklin against Moore;—subject to the equity of Moore's debtor against the bond, but surely not subject to any supposed equity of his creditor to enforce it, of which equity they had no notice.

That the vendor's lien is lost as to the land by a sale to a subsequent vendee without notice, is clear. And if he has any lien upon the bonds given by the sub-vendee, why should not that lien also be lost by a sale of the bonds without notice? I can see no reason for the distinction; for as the assignee has possession of the bonds, and has by law a legal right to sue for them in his own name, and has therefore complete power to enforce payment at law, it is very clear that he has the legal advantage. Shall equity take away this legal advantage from a fair purchaser without notice? I think not. Murray v. Lylburn, 2 Johns. C. R. 441; Livingston v. Dean, Id. 479.

I am, therefore, of opinion to reverse the decree; and if the facts distinctly appeared in evidence as to the assignment, I should direct a dismissal of the bill. In the present aspect of the case, I think it better to send it back, with directions that Murrell & Meem be made parties, as the real contest is between them and the appellants. If the appellants refuse to make them parties, then their bill should be dismissed for want of proper parties.

608 *The decree entered by the court declared, that if Murrell & Meem took the assignment of Franklin's bonds from Moore, and gave notice of the assignment to Franklin, before they received any notice of Hancock's claim to charge the land with the unpaid balance of the purchase money due to him from Moore; in such case, if Hancock might otherwise have had a just claim in equity, so to charge the land with the balance of the purchase money due to him from Moore, that right was lost, and the assignees Murrell & Meem, had a preferable right to the amount of Franklin's bonds assigned to them; that Murrell & Meem, being thus parties in interest, ought to be made parties defendants in the cause; and that the chancellor erred in decreeing in favor of the appellees, before Murrell & Meem were brought before the court to assert their rights: Therefore, the decree was reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded in, according to the principles here declared.

Sureties—Summary Motion against Principal—Record—How Notice of Motion Made Part of.—In the case of*

a summary motion by surety against principal, to recover money paid by the surety, under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 116, if the defendant appear, and judgment be rendered on a hearing of the parties, the notice of the motion is not a part of the record, unless it be made so by a bill of exceptions to the opinion of the court.

Same—Payment of Several Sums—Right to Several Motions.†—A surety having paid five several sums of money for his principal may maintain five several motions, and recover several judgments, for the debts, and for the costs of each motion.

Several Judgments—One Supersedeas;—Regularity.—One supersedeas to five judgments, though between the same parties, and upon claims of the like nature and though the question be the same in all the cases, is irregular, and ought to be quashed as improvidently allowed.

Same—Same—Reversal—Costs.§—A. recovers five judgments for debt against L. in the county court; at the instance of L. the circuit court awards one supersedeas to the five judgments, and reverses them by a single judgment; to this judgment the court of appeals, at the instance of A. awards a supersedeas, reverses the judgment of the circuit court, and orders the supersedeas awarded by the circuit court to be quashed as improvidently allowed: HELD, A. is entitled to his costs in the circuit court as well as in this court, but not to damages.

Ayres recovered five several judgments against Lewellin, in the county court of Bedford. The record sent from the county court consisted, in the first place, of transcripts of the five judgments: the entry of the first of which was in the following words—"J. Ayres, plaintiff, against G. Lewellin, defendant.—Upon a motion for money paid as surety—This day came the parties by their attorneys; and, on hearing, it is considered by the court, that the plaintiff recover against the defendant, the sum of 100 dollars, with interest from the 13th April 1817 till paid, also 8 dollars 33 cents, and his costs by him about his motion in his behalf expended, &c." The caption of each of the other four judgments, was in these words—"Same plaintiff against same defendant—upon the same motion;" and then followed the several entries of these four judgments; which were, each and all, of the same tenor with that of the first judgment above recited, being each 610 for the same sums of *100 dollars and 8 dollars 33 cents, and the costs of the motion, with this difference only, that interest was given on the sums of 100 dollars severally adjudged in these four cases, from the 13th April 1813, 1819, 1820 and 1821, respectively. And then the record of the county court proceeded thus: "The following notice was filed on the motion for the foregoing judgments, viz. Mr. G. Lewellin; Take notice, that I shall, by my attorney, move the court of Bedford county, on the 4th Monday in this present month, for judgments and award of executions against you in five cases wherein I have been compelled to pay Stephen Martin as your surety. (signed) J. Ayres. (dated) December 9, 1823." Upon this notice was indorsed an affidavit of due service thereof on Lewellin. And this was the whole of the record of the proceedings of the county court.

Upon the petition of Lewellin, the circuit court of Bedford awarded one supersedeas to the five judgments.

The circuit court held, that the county court erred in rendering five several judgments upon one notice; and in giving five sets of costs upon one motion, whereas it should have rendered but one judgment for the several debts claimed, and given but one set of costs: therefore, the judgments of the county court were reversed, and one judgment rendered for Ayres against Lewellin, for the several debts, with interest on each respectively, and the costs of his motion in the county court; that is, for only one set of costs.

And then Ayres applied to this court, for a supersedeas to the judgment of the circuit court, which was allowed.

Johnson for the plaintiff in error, said, that, though the clerk had appended a copy of the notice upon which Ayres made his motions for the judgments in the county court, to the transcript of the entries of the judgments, and certified, that that was the notice on which the motion for the judgments was made; yet this notice was no part of the record. For Lewellin having appeared to the motions, and the 611 judgments *having been rendered upon a hearing of both parties, without any objection taken in respect of the notice, it was wholly immaterial what was the notice, or whether there was any notice. Neither could the notice have been made part of the record, but by some defence founded on it, and by bill of exceptions to the opinion of the court touching such defence, and thus making the notice part of the record. Then, the record of the proceedings in the county court presented, simply, a transcript of five several judgments rendered for five several sums of money, paid by Ayres as surety for Lewellin. And, as Ayres might have maintained five several actions of assumpsit for the five several debts; so he might well have maintained, as he did, five several motions to recover the several debts, in a summary way, under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 116, § 1, p. 460. It was true, that after the caption of the first judgment stating the names of the parties, plaintiff and defendant, and that it was "upon a motion for money paid as surety," the caption of the other four judgments stated that they were "upon the same motion;" but the language of the caption was only the clerical description of the case, and was not, like the judicial language of the court, to be construed strictly; and the captions to the four judgments might well be understood as only describing the nature of the motions to be the same with the first, namely, motions for money paid as surety, not as importing that there was only a single motion made for a single judgment for all the debts demanded; and seeing that, in fact, there were five several judgments for the several debts, as upon five several motions,

v. Mutual Assurance Society, 10 Leigh 506. TUCKER, P., says from the manner in which this record is made up, I take it that the notice was spread upon it, and is therefore part of it. This was not the case in Ayres v. Lewellin, 8 Leigh 609. The notice here demands certain quotas, due "as per declarations signed, sealed, etc." These declarations being thus referred to and being filed by the plaintiffs, make part of their case, and are, properly speaking, part of the record.

†Same—Notice of Suit—Waiver.—The principal case is cited in foot-note to Muire v. Falconer, 10 Gratt. 12; Ballard v. Whitlock, 18 Gratt. 242 (see also, foot-note).

‡Appeals.—See monographic note on "Appeal and Error;" appended to Hill v. Salem, etc., Turnpike Co., 1 Rob. 283.

and judgments for the costs of each motion severally, the caption must be so understood. [Tucker, P. The cause was brought up to the circuit court, by one supersedeas to all the five judgments; was not that irregular?]-Johnson said, it certainly was; and that was another palpable error in the proceedings of the circuit court.

612 *Leigh, for the defendant in error, admitted, that a party having paid several sums as surety for another, might maintain several motions for the several debts; but he might also maintain one motion for them all; and if, in fact, he made but one motion, he was entitled to only one judgment for all the debts, and the costs of that single motion; as, if he had counted in one action of assumpsit for several debts so contracted to him, he could only have had a single judgment, and the costs of his action. Here, there was but one notice, and but a single motion. He said, the notice was necessarily part of the record. For the notice of a summary motion of this kind, given by the statute, served the double purpose of process and declaration: it might be waived by consent: it might be admitted by the defendant: but the defendant's appearance was not a waiver or admission of due notice, any more than the defendant's appearance to an action, dispensed with a declaration. It was the notice that ascertained the nature of the claim; it was the notice that gave the court the summary jurisdiction. The first section of the statute giving this summary remedy for sureties (cited by Mr. Johnson) gave the motion; but the 5th section provided, that no judgment shall be obtained by such motion, unless the party against whom the same is prayed, shall have ten days previous notice thereof. Therefore, without a notice of the motion—actual notice given, or notice distinctly waived, or distinctly admitted, by the party entitled to it: without shewing on the record, in one or other of those modes, the nature of the claim; there could be nothing to warrant the exercise of this summary jurisdiction. It behoved the plaintiff to maintain that the notice was part of the record. And if it was, there was but one notice. But suppose the notice not part of the record, and suppose it unnecessary that it should be so; there was but one motion. The caption of the first judgment shewed, that that was rendered upon a motion for money paid as surety; the captions of the other four shewed, that they were rendered upon the same motion. The circuit court

613 thought, that "the *same motion" meant one and the same, which surely was the plain, ordinary import of the phrase: Mr. Johnson insisted, that "the same motion" meant the like motion, namely, for money paid as surety. This was a very violent construction. Nullum simile est idem, said the proverb; e converso, nullum idem est simile tantum. It never occurred to the judge of the circuit court, that idem and simile could not be regarded as convertible. If the captions were part of the record, then, they sufficiently shewed that there was but one motion; on which there were five judgments, and five sets of costs of that one motion awarded. But take it, that these captions were only clerical language, not the judicial language of the court; that they were only the clerk's description of the cases to which the entries of the judgments applied (and this, he said, was really the true character and function of the captions; for, when a record is made out, the caption of the entry of the judgment on the order book, need not be, and never was, inserted): then, the caption of the first judgment, as well as the captions of the four others, was only a clerical description of the case, in order to shew to what case the judgment applied; and the court could pay no more regard to the caption of the first judgment, than to the captions of the others. And, if this were so; if the caption of the first judgment was to be disregarded, as the mere language of the clerk; how could it be ascertained, that here was a motion, or motions, for money paid by Ayres as surety for Lewellin? and how could the jurisdiction of the county court to render judgment in this summary way, be sustained? Whether it was regular to award one supersedeas to the five judgments or not, depended, obviously, on the question, whether here were five several judgments upon five several motions, or five several judgments on one and the same motion? Suppose the plaintiff had, in one and the same action of assumpsit, counted in his declaration upon the five several debts due him, and the court, instead of rendering one judgment for all the sums, and for the costs of the single action, had rendered five 614 several *judgments for the five several sums, and for the costs of the action five times: there could be no doubt, that one supersedeas would have lain, to correct the error. So here, if there was but one motion for these five several debts, and one set of costs only incurred on that motion; a single supersedeas was the proper process to correct the error of severing the judgments into five parts, when it should have been one and intire, and giving five times the costs actually incurred.

TUCKER, P. In this case, I am of opinion, that according to general principles and the spirit of our decisions, the notice is no part of the record. "The parties came by their attorneys:" the defendant appeared, and having made no objection to the proceeding for want of notice, and having filed no bill of exceptions, we must take it, that there was a due notice proved in each of these several motions. The acts of the court must be presumed to have been right, unless the party has placed upon the record the evidence of its errors. There are several cases that bear on the point: Glascock's adm'r v. Dawson, 1 Munf. 605; Bronaugh's v. Freeman's ex'or, 2 Munf. 266; Beale v. Willson, 4 Munf. 380; Burke, adm'r v. Levy's ex'ors, 1 Rand. 1; Couch v. Miller, 2 Leigh, 545. It would be strange, indeed, if the certificate of the clerk of a county court, where the minutes only are signed by the court, should be taken as ascertaining what papers were read upon a trial, instead of the court itself being called upon to ascertain them by the solemnity of a bill of exceptions. It is an anomaly which cannot be admitted, since the court would find it difficult indeed, to pronounce how far the practice should be extended, and where to fix its limits.

If the notice be out of the case, then these five judgments of the county court are utterly independent of each other; and here we have a single supersedeas to all of them. This cannot be right. The supersedeas, where it has the character of original process, as it has here, partakes 615 of the *character of a writ of error: and a writ of error, it is presumed, will not lie to several distinct and separate judgments. Such a practice would lead to great difficulty and embarrassment. The supersedeas, therefore, was improvidently awarded by the circuit court: and if so, this court, instead of affirming the judgments of the county court, must, in proceeding to render such judgment as the circuit court ought to have given, dismiss the supersedeas, as improvidently awarded.

A party defendant who is harassed by a variety of actions, which might be properly united in one suit, is not without a remedy. He may move to consolidate them; and if that motion be overruled, the error may doubtless be corrected by a superior tribunal; in what manner, it is not necessary for me to say, except that a supersedeas is not the proper remedy, where it does not appear from the record, that such a motion was made or rule applied for. In this case, no such step was taken, and it was not therefore competent to the circuit court to look into the matter. In every point of view, I am of opinion, that the supersedeas was improvidently awarded.

The other judges concurred.

After this opinion had been announced, Johnson insisted, that Ayres, the plaintiff in error here, was entitled to judgment for his costs in the circuit court, as well as in this court; and also to damages for retarding the execution of the judgments of the county court, now finally affirmed by this court, under the statutes, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 64, § 11, ch. 69, § 61, pp. 192, 240.

The judgment of the court was, that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the defendant should pay the plaintiff in error, his costs expended in prosecuting his supersedeas here: and this court, proceeding to render such judgment as the circuit court ought to have 616 rendered, *ordered, that the supersedeas awarded by the circuit court to the judgment of the county court, at the instance of Lewellin, should be quashed, as having been improvidently awarded, and that he should pay Ayres, the plaintiff in error here, his costs about his defence in the circuit court expended. But the court gave no damages.

TUCKER, P., dissented from so much of the judgment as gave Ayres his costs expended in the circuit court. He said—I have examined a variety of cases in this court, in order to ascertain what has been the practice; and I am satisfied, that wherever an appeal is dismissed as improvidently allowed, or a supersedeas quashed as improvidently awarded, the court has always refused to give costs to the party prevailing.

The first case was that of Hepburn v.

Lewis, 2 Call, 497, in which the judgment of the district court was for less than 100 dollars; and the appeal was dismissed as improvidently allowed, but there was no judgment costs.

In Clarke v. Conn, 1 Munf. 160, the appeal from the court of chancery was dismissed after it had been depending five years, on the ground that it was improvidently granted by the chancellor, after his power over the case had ceased; and no costs allowed.

In Lewis v. Long, 3 Munf. 136, the plaintiff sued on a single bill for more than 100 dollars. The jury found the debt to be discharged by less than that sum. The defendant obtained a supersedeas, and the judgment was reversed; from which the plaintiff appealed. The appeal was dismissed after a laborious argument by bar and bench; but no costs were allowed.

In Hutchison v. Kellam and Lymbrick v. Seldon, Id. 202, it was after great argument decided, that the jurisdiction of the court of appeals did not attach where the damages were less than 100 dollars, though the right of freehold incidentally came in question; whereupon the appeals were dismissed, but no costs were given.

617 *In Skipwith v. Young, 5 Munf. 276, the like principle was decided, and the appeal dismissed as improvidently allowed, but without costs.

In Rootes v. Holliday, 4 Munf. 323, the appeal allowed by the chancery court upon an appeal bond executed by a surety only, was dismissed, as improvidently allowed, but without costs.

In Miller v. Blannerhassett, 5 Munf. 197, there was judgment in the county court against Blannerhassett. A writ of supersedeas was awarded by the circuit court of Wood county; whereupon the bond for prosecuting it was executed by a surety, but not by Blannerhassett himself. The circuit court reversed the judgment, and the plaintiff appealed to this court. After argument, it was decided, that the judgment of the circuit court was erroneous, because that court had no cognizance of the cause, the supersedeas having improvidently issued for the cause aforesaid. Reversed, and supersedeas quashed, but without costs.

In Thomson v. Evans, 6 Munf. 397, the appeal was allowed in court, upon the appellant's entering into bond &c. in the clerk's office within thirty days: appeal dismissed, but without costs.

In Ashby v. Kiger, 3 Rand. 165, an appeal from a decree for costs, was dismissed, but without costs.

In all the foregoing cases, the principle was invariably adhered to, of refusing costs where the process of supersedeas was quashed, or the appeal dismissed, on the ground that they were improvidently allowed. I have not depended upon the printed reports of the cases in examining this matter: the entries themselves have been carefully examined.

I can perceive no essential difference in principle, between these cases and that under consideration. That of Miller v. Blannerhassett is very strongly analogous. A case in point is not to be excepted; for, as the notice is no part of the record, the case appears to us as a single supersedeas to five judgments. This, I am sure, was not designed by the judge who awarded the supersedeas, and who 618 *probably took the notice to be part of the record. Had it been made so by an exception, the question might, perhaps, have been decided differently.

I am therefore of opinion, that on quashing the supersedeas to the judgment of the county court, the costs of that supersedeas should not be given.

Contract to Procure and Sell Infant's Land—Case at Bar.—A. and B. holding the legal title of an undivided moiety of land, by purchase and conveyance from C. the title of the other moiety being in D. an infant, and C. having covenanted to sell them the infant's moiety also, and A. and B. having under C.'s conveyance and covenant, taken possession of the whole, and made improvements; they sell and convey the moiety they had purchased of C. to E. for $12,750; and they covenant with E. to use their best endeavours to get in the legal title of the infant's moiety, and if procured, to sell and convey that also to E. for $6750; but if the legal title of the infant's moiety cannot be got in, within a year, then E. shall be at liberty, in their name or his own, to institute any legal proceedings against their vendor C. for his E.'s own benefit and advantage; and if they shall not be able to get in the legal title of the infant's moiety, then E. shall pay them the first mentioned sum of $12,750 only—A. and B. use their best endeavours to get in the legal title of the infant's moiety, within the year, by procuring the infant's friends to make application to the legislature, upon a fair state of the facts, to authorize her guardian to sell and convey it, in which they fail: Held, that after the expiration of the year, the contract of A. and B. with E. with respect to the sale of the infant's moiety, was at an end; and tho' E. had a right to prefer a bill against C. and the infant D. for specific execution, in the name of A. and B., yet he was to prosecute that suit for his own benefit, and at his own risque, and as between him and A. and B. was bound to bear the burden of paying the purchase money with interest, to the infant E. upon her conveyance of her moiety, after her full age, in conformity with C.'s contract.

Vendee in Possession of Land—Purchase Money Unpaid—When Liable for Interest.—A vendee of land let into possession, and the purchase money remaining unpaid, shall pay interest thereon, though the vendor be in default, unless he has not only kept the purchase money idle, but given the vendor notice that he has so kept it.

Appellate Practice—Specific Performance—Objection to Vendor's Title—Waiver.—On a bill by vendee against vendor for specific execution, if no objection to the vendor's title be made in the court of chancery, in any form, he cannot be heard to make such objection in this court.

In 1813, Joseph Blythe of South Carolina, being the owner of the equitable estate of an undivided moiety of two parcels of land in the county of Monroe, Virginia, one containing about 770 acres called The Red Springs, and the other called Green-

620 woods adjoining the first, and *containing about 200 acres, which moiety Blythe had purchased at a sale made by commissioners of the superiour court of chancery, under authority of a decree of that court, but the commissioners had not yet made a conveyance thereof to him; and the other undivided moiety of those lands, being the property of Eliza Young, also of South Carolina, infant heiress of Thomas Young deceased—Blythe, by Erasmus Stribling his agent, entered into articles of agreement with John Brockenbrough and Thomas Taylor of Richmond, Virginia, dated the 29th September 1813, whereby Blythe covenanted to sell Brockenbrough and Taylor, the whole of the lands, and to procure a proper conveyance of his own undivided moiety thereof, from the commissioners of the court of chancery, and to execute himself, a conveyance to them, with general warranty, of the other undivided moiety which belonged to Miss Young—And Brockenbrough and Taylor covenanted on their part, to pay Blythe 13,500 dollars, for the whole of the lands; that is to say, the sum of 6750 dollars, on receiving a regular conveyance from the commissioners of the court of chancery, of Blythe's undivided moiety; and the residue in four equal instalments of 1687 dollars 50 cents, each, on the 1st October 1814, '15, '16 and '17, with interest on the two last instalments from the 1st October 1815—but it was covenanted, that none of these deferred payments should be demanded by Blythe, until he should either make a good conveyance of Miss Young's moiety or give good and sufficient security for the conveyance of the title of that moiety when she should attain the full age—And Blythe covenanted to put the vendees in possession of the whole of the lands on the 1st October 1813.

The commissioners of the court of chancery made a conveyance of Blythe's undivided moiety to the vendees; upon which they paid the moiety of the purchase money, 6750 dollars to Stribling, Blythe's agent in Virginia, and received possession of the whole of the lands in October 1813, according to the agreement. But 621 Blythe neither *conveyed (for, indeed, he could not convey,) Miss Young's moiety, nor took any steps to enable him to convey it, nor gave security for the conveyance of the title thereof, when she should attain to full age.

The Red Springs was a watering place, whither company might resort for health or pleasure in the summer; and Brockenbrough and Taylor, shortly after their purchase, expended in improvements (as they allege) 4500 dollars.

By articles of agreement, dated the 31st May 1815, between Brockenbrough and Taylor of the one part, and Philip Rogers of the other,—reciting the articles of September 1813 between Blythe and them, and what had been done in execution thereof,—Brockenbrough and Taylor covenanted to sell Rogers their interest in the lands, for the sum of 12,750 dollars—And it was covenanted that the said purchase money, when paid, should be full satisfaction for the [then] present title of Brockenbrough and

Appellate Practice—Objection in Lower Court—Waiver.—In Handly v. Snodgrass, 9 Leigh 493, it is said: "Courts have sometimes said that the counsel shall not be permitted to raise in the appellate court, for the first time, a point which, if made in the court below, might have been obviated. 18 Johns. Rep. 566. We follow this principle frequently, in rejecting objections to accounts where there has been no exception, and in other cases. Brockenbrough v. Blythe, 8 Leigh 619. And though it is not followed in all cases, yet I am of opinion that in cases of this description the principle is peculiarly appropriate." Specific Performance.—See monographic note on "Specific Performance" appended to Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 248.

Taylor in the said lands; that when the payment thereof should be completed, they should convey to Rogers, the legal title they acquired by the conveyance of the commissioners of the court of chancery above mentioned (the title, namely, of Blythe's undivided moiety); that they should use their best endeavours to procure the legal title of the other moiety (Miss Young's) and if the title thereof could be procured, they should convey the title of that moiety also to Rogers, and he should pay them for the same, the further sum of 6750 dollars; but that, if the legal title of Miss Young's moiety could not be procured by them, within one year from the date of the articles, then Rogers should be at liberty, in their name or his own, to institute any legal proceedings against Blythe, for his own benefit and advantage; that, in case they should not be able to procure the legal title of Miss Young's moiety, Rogers should pay them the first mentioned sum of 12,750 dollars only, and they should not be bound to convey him the title they then held in the other (Blythe's) moiety, until he 622 *that sum; and that, in case they should succeed in procuring the title of Miss Young's moiety, they should retain the title of the whole of the lands, until Rogers should complete the payment of both the sums of 12,750 dollars, and 6750 dollars, as a security for the whole purchase money, 19,500 dollars. And it was further covenanted, that, as Brockenbrough and Taylor had paid Stribling, Blythe's agent in Virginia, 6750 dollars, for Blythe's moiety of the lands, as that moiety was yet in the agent's hands, and as it might be thought proper to attach the same in his hands, in order to secure a full performance on Blythe's part, of his agreement with Brockenbrough and Taylor of September 1813, or damages for his non-performance thereof,—any proceedings might be had for that object, and such proceedings should be for the benefit of the party entitled thereto, according to the purport and intent of this agreement.

Rogers received immediate possession of the whole of the lands, and, thenceforth, continued to hold them, and to enjoy all the profits. He paid Brockenbrough and Taylor the first mentioned sum of 12,750 dollars, and they conveyed to him the undivided moiety, which had been conveyed to them by the commissioners of the court of chancery; that is, Blythe's moiety. They also, immediately, suggested to Blythe and Miss Young's friends in South Carolina, that the only way in which a conveyance of her title in the other moiety could be effected, during her infancy, was by authority of a special act of assembly, passed for the purpose. And, in consequence of that suggestion, a petition on behalf of Miss Young, of her mother who was entitled to dower of her moiety, the administrator of her father, and Blythe, was presented to the legislature at the session of 1815-16 (through the agency of Brockenbrough and Taylor) stating Miss Young's title to an undivided moiety of the lands; that the Red Springs were mineral waters; that the value of the property depended, chiefly on improving it as a watering place; and that her mother, who was her 623 natural guardian, *and the administrator of her father, did not consider themselves authorized to expend money belonging to her, in such improvements as were necessary to make this property profitable: and therefore praying the legislature, by special act to be passed for the purpose, to authorize the sale and conveyance of her interest in the lands in question. In consequence of this petition, a bill was passed by the house of delegates, authorizing the guardian or guardians, who should be duly appointed for Miss Young, according to the laws of South Carolina, to sell and convey her interest in the lands. But this bill was rejected by the senate. Thus, Brockenbrough and Taylor failed to procure a conveyance of the legal title of Miss Young's moiety, in the only way in which it was possible to procure such conveyance, within the year next after the date of their agreement with Rogers; and, thenceforth, they regarded their agreement with Rogers, in respect of that moiety, as at an end.

Meantime, in July 1815, a subpoena was sued out of the superiour court of chancery of Staunton, in the name of Brockenbrough and Taylor against Blythe and Stribling, his agent in Virginia, to attach in Stribling's hands, the 6750 dollars which Brockenbrough and Taylor had paid for Blythe's moiety of the land, till Blythe should comply with his contract with respect to the other (Miss Young's) moiety. It did not distinctly appear who sued out this process: Brockenbrough and Taylor were apprised of it, and made no objection. Blythe died in 1817, no proceedings having been had on the foreign attachment in chancery, during his life.

In May 1819, Rogers, without the knowledge or consent of Brockenbrough and Taylor, or either of them, caused a bill to be exhibited in their names, against Blythe's real and personal representatives, Stribling, the agent of Blythe, and Miss Young in the superiour court of chancery of Staunton—setting forth the contract of September 1813, between Blythe and the plaintiffs, Brockenbrough and Taylor, the conveyances of Blythe's undivided moiety of the 624 lands to *them, their payment of 6750 dollars to Stribling, his agent, and the expenses they had incurred in improvements: alleging, that Blythe had died, without having in any way complied with his contract, with respect to Miss Young's moiety; that the plaintiffs had thereby been prevented from improving the property as a watering place, to the degree of which it was susceptible, and so had been disappointed of the profits which they expected, and of the chief advantage which induced them to make the purchase; that Miss Young was still a minor, residing in South Carolina; and that her guardian was claiming her moiety, and threatening a suit for it; a measure which would be very injurious to the plaintiffs, since it would deprive them of the benefit of the improvements they had made, and would render the moiety which would be left them of comparatively little value, the lands being only valuable in one entire parcel, on account of the mineral waters, and so not admitting of convenient partition. Therefore, they expressed their earnest desire, that Miss Young's title should be conveyed to them; called upon her to disclose the nature of her title; and prayed, that Blythe's representatives might be decreed to procure and convey her title; or, if that could not be done, that the court would direct an issue to ascertain the damages the plaintiffs had sustained, by reason of Blythe's failure to perform the agreement with respect to Miss Young's moiety, and that they might be indemnified out of the money they had paid to Stribling for Blythe, which was still in Stribling's hands.

In this bill, there was no mention of, or allusion to, the sale made by Brockenbrough and Taylor to Rogers, or the fact that he was, and had been since 1815, in possession of the lands, enjoying the whole profits.

The representatives of Blythe put in their answer in 1820. They denied that Stribling had any authority from Blythe, to make the contract with Brockenbrough and Taylor, of September 1813, so far as it respected the sale of Miss Young's moiety of the land; and if he had such authority, they said, the purchasers had retained 625 the purchase money *of that moiety in their own hands, which was an ample security for the fulfilment of Blythe's contract in that particular; and if Miss Young should refuse to convey her moiety, when she should attain to full age, the purchase money contracted to be paid for it, would be the exact measure of damages which the purchasers would sustain by the breach of the contract. Therefore, they claimed the whole of the money in Stribling's hands.

No steps were taken to bring the suit to an early hearing.

Miss Young attained to full age in 1823. And, in 1824, she put in her answer, in which she said, that she was willing to ratify the contract made by Stribling with Brockenbrough and Taylor, so far as it respected her moiety of the lands, and to convey the same to the purchasers; and that she would execute a conveyance, and transmit it to her counsel in this cause, to be exhibited to the court, and to be delivered to the purchasers, so soon as they should pay the purchase money with interest.

She accordingly executed the conveyance, and it was filed in the court of chancery.

Neither Miss Young's title to a moiety of the lands, nor the particulars of Blythe's title to the other moiety, were shewn and regularly deduced: and upon the documents that were filed in the cause, the title, particularly as to the parcel called Greenwoods, did not appear to be perfectly clear. But the title was nowise questioned in the pleadings, or at the hearing.

As to the defendant Stribling, it appeared, that he had, as Blythe's agent, received from Brockenbrough and Taylor, in July, 1815, the sum of 6750 dollars, in full of the purchase money for Blythe's moiety, which was immediately attached in his hands, and that he had paid it into court, soon after the filing of the bill, in 1819. And the only question was, whether he was bound to pay interest in the interval between 1815 and 1819.

In July 1825, the court of chancery decreed, that upon the plaintiffs, Brockenbrough and Taylor, paying to Miss 626 *Young the sum of 6750 dollars with interest from the times appointed for the payment of the instalments thereof by the agreement of September 1813, the deed executed by her, conveying her moiety of the lands to them, should be delivered to them; and, in case they should fail to pay the same to her within six months, the marshal of the court should sell the whole of the lands, at public auction for cash, and bring the proceeds of sale into court, to be disposed of by future order—and that Stribling should pay Blythe's representatives, the sum of 6750 dollars which he as Blythe's agent, had received of the plaintiffs on account of the purchase money of Blythe's moiety, with interest from July 1815, when he received it.

After this decree was pronounced, Brockenbrough and Taylor exhibited their bill against Blythe's representatives, Miss Young and Rogers; setting forth the contract between them and Rogers of the 31st May 1815, and the proceedings and decree in the first mentioned suit prosecuted by Rogers in their names; and alleging, that they had no knowledge whatever of the proceedings in that suit, till after the decree made therein, and had taken no part in the prosecution of it; Rogers was the real, they only nominal plaintiffs in that cause. That, having by their contract with Rogers, covenanted to use their best endeavours to procure the legal title of Miss Young's moiety of the lands, and, if the title thereof could be procured, to convey that moiety to Rogers, for which Rogers was to pay them 6750 dollars, in addition to the 12,750 dollars which he was to pay them for Blythe's moiety; but, if they could not procure the legal title of Miss Young's moiety within a year after the contract, Rogers should be at liberty, in their names or his own, to institute any proceedings against Blythe [only] for his own benefit and advantage; and, in case they should not be able to procure the title of Miss Young's moiety, Rogers should pay them only the 12,750 dollars, the purchase money stipulated for Blythe's moiety;—they had used 627 their *best endeavours to procure the title of Miss Young's moiety, in the only way in which it was possible to obtain it, namely, by procuring the petition to the legislature at the session of 1815-16, praying a special act to authorize her guardians to sell and convey the same; and when they failed in that effort to procure a conveyance of her title, within the year, the contract between them and Rogers, according to the true construction thereof, so far as it related to the sale of Miss Young's moiety, was at an end: they had no longer any right to demand of Rogers the purchase money for that moiety, nor he to require them to procure and convey the title thereof to him. That, though they covenanted with Rogers, that, in case the title of Miss Young's moiety could not be procured, he might either in their names or his own, institute any legal proceedings against Blythe, yet such proceedings were to be for his own benefit and advantage; consequently he was to incur any responsibility which those proceedings should impose on the plaintiffs; he had no right to institute such proceedings in their names, for his own benefit, and to throw the responsibility on them. That they covenanted, that Rogers might institute such proceedings against Blythe only, not against Miss Young also; they had no right to demand of her specific execution of Blythe's contract as to her moiety, nor had she any right to demand specific execution thereof from them; she was only entitled to demand her moiety of the lands in question, and the profits of her property, from Rogers, who held the property, and had received the profits. That, consequently, the proceedings which Rogers instituted and prosecuted in their names, were wholly unauthorized. That, by sinking the fact of his purchase of the property from them, and the terms of the purchase, he had contrived to subject them, instead of himself, to Miss Young's demand; and, by calling on her, in their names, for specific execution of Blythe's contract, had, in effect, made a purchase of her moiety from her, which they never made. And that Rogers now insisted, that, though he had enjoyed 628 the whole profits of the whole *property since May 1815, when he received possession, yet he was only bound by his contract with Brockenbrough and Taylor, to pay them the principal sum of 6750 dollars for Miss Young's moiety, and they were bound to pay Miss Young that sum and all the interest which had accrued thereon, and which the chancellor had directed them to pay her; whereas, they insisted, if Miss Young was entitled to demand interest from the purchasers (which, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, they denied) Rogers was the person bound to pay it. Therefore, they prayed the court to suspend and inhibit, by injunction, all proceedings on the decree in the other suit, prosecuted in their names by Rogers, against Blythe's representatives and Miss Young; and to declare and decree, that, as Rogers was the real plaintiff in that cause, and was the only person justly bound to pay the purchase money to Miss Young for her moiety, and whatever interest was justly due thereon, he and not Brockenbrough and Taylor, should pay the same to her; and general relief.

The injunction was awarded.

Miss Young answered, that she had consented to ratify Blythe's contract of September 1813, for the sale of her moiety of the lands, only upon condition, that the purchase money thereof should be paid to her, with interest from the time stipulated by the contract; and that she would part with her property on no other terms.

Blythe's representatives, in their answer, insisted, that they had a right to the money which had been paid Stribling for Blythe's moiety, whatever might be the result of the controversy as to the other part of the subject.

Rogers, in his answer, insisted, that he had a right, by the terms of the contract of May 1815, between him and Brockenbrough and Taylor, to prosecute the suit, in their names, against Blythe's representatives and Miss Young, for a specific execution of Blythe's contract of September 1813, according to the terms of that contract. That whatever duty a specific execution 629 thereof would impose on *Brockenbrough and Taylor, they were bound to perform it: if Miss Young was entitled to interest on the purchase money of her moiety, they were bound to pay it; for, by their contract with Blythe, they had stipulated to pay the interest as well as the principal of the purchase money for Miss Young's moiety, when the title thereof should be conveyed to them, after her attainment to full age. And that he, Rogers, by his contract of May 1815, was only bound to pay Brockenbrough and Taylor, the principal sum of 6750 dollars, when they should procure and convey to him Miss Young's moiety. He admitted, that he had been in possession of the whole of the lands, enjoying the whole profits, from May 1815, the date of his purchase; but he insisted, that he was not bound on that account, any more than by his contract, to pay interest; for the uncertainty of the title had rendered it impossible to improve the property without gross imprudence, and so had in a great measure disappointed him of the profits.

The chancellor, upon the motion of Blythe's representatives and Miss Young, dissolved the injunction, which had been awarded to Brockenbrough and Taylor in this suit, to suspend and inhibit the execution of the decree in the other suit. And from this decree Brockenbrough and Taylor appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Wickham and Leigh for the appellants, by Johnson for the appellee Rogers, and by Stanard for Blythe's representatives and Miss Young.

I. The counsel for the appellants examined the contract between them and Rogers of May 1815, and insisted, that the just construction and effect of that contract, was, that Brockenbrough and Taylor should sell Rogers the moiety they had bought of Blythe, of which they had acquired the legal title, for 12,750 dollars; and that they should endeavour to get in the title to Miss Young's moiety, within the 630 ensuing year; if they should succeed in getting the title of *that moiety within the year, they should sell and convey that also to Rogers, for 6750 dollars; if they should fail to get in Miss Young's title within the year, their contract with Rogers, in respect of her moiety, should be at an end; and he should pay them the stipulated price for Blythe's moiety, 12,750 dollars, only. If they should fail to get in Miss Young's title within the year, and if, in consequence of such failure, their contract to sell Rogers her moiety should be at an end, they, indeed, authorized Rogers to institute proceedings against Blythe, in their names, but for his own benefit, not for their's; and, as he was to have all the benefit, they were not to incur any reciprocal duty or obligation which might result from the benefit that Rogers should derive from such proceedings. They had a right to call upon Blythe, for a specific execution of his contract to procure a conveyance of Miss Young's moiety, or to give them good and sufficient security that a conveyance thereof should be made when Miss Young attained to full age, or for damages for his breach of the contract in that particular; and this was the right which they authorized Rogers to assert against Blythe, in their names. But they had no claim whatever against Miss Young; and, therefore, did not pretend to authorize Rogers to assert any claim, in their names, against her. They had no right to call upon Miss Young for a specific execution of Blythe's contract to sell them her land; and, by consequence, she had no right to call upon them for a specific execution of their contract with Blythe to purchase it; for there should be no specific execution, where the remedies are not mutual; Watts v. Kinney, ante, 272. Rogers, by exhibiting the bill against Miss Young, asking of her specific execution of Blythe's contract for the sale of her property, in truth, proposed and made a bargain with her, for himself. And, as he exhibited the bill in the names of Brockenbrough and Taylor, without their knowledge, and without any manner of authority from them, Miss Young had no right to hold them to a specific execution of their contract with Blythe for the purchase of her moiety, because 631 *Rogers, in their names, thought proper to propose specific execution. That bill of Rogers ought to be considered as Roger's bill, to all intents and purposes; not Brockenbrough and Taylor's, to any purpose whatever. As they had no claim against Miss Young, and she had none against them, Rogers could not give her a claim against them, by asserting a claim in their names against her. The only right she had, was, to demand her property from the person who held it, and the profits of it from him who had received them. She had no claim to purchase money for her property, and interest upon it; because she had never sold it. But if Rogers thought proper, in order to keep the property, and to exempt himself from an account for profits, to propose to take the land upon the terms of Blythe's contract with Brockenbrough and Taylor, as he did by his bill (for it was his bill), and she thought proper to assent to those terms, Rogers, and he alone, was bound to pay her the purchase money. If Rogers had exhibited his bill against Blythe's representatives and Miss Young, in his own name, instead of Brockenbrough and Taylor's; or, if in the bill he exhibited in their names, he had disclosed the fact and the terms of his purchase from Brockenbrough and Taylor; and, in either case, had asked specific execution, for his own benefit; the chancellor should, in that suit, have imposed on him all the duties which resulted from a decree of specific execution at the instance of the purchaser, and ought to have imposed no duty whatever on Brockenbrough and Taylor: and therefore, when the truth was disclosed in this suit, he ought to have so corrected the decree in the other suit, as to exonerate them from the performance of any duty, and to impose on

Rogers, who alone ought to bear it, the whole duty to be performed.

The counsel for Rogers argued, that the just construction and effect of the contract between him and Brockenbrough and Taylor, was,—that they sold him the whole of the lands in question; the moiety which had belonged to Blythe, and of which they had acquired the legal title, for 632 *12,750 dollars, and that which belonged to Miss Young, and which Blythe sold them, and bound himself to have conveyed to them, for 6750 dollars: that Brockenbrough and Taylor were to get in the title of Miss Young's moiety if they could, and then to convey it to Rogers for the stipulated price; if they could not get it in, within the year, they authorized Rogers to institute proceedings in their names against Blythe, for his own benefit; and if by such proceedings he could get in the title of Miss Young's moiety, no matter when he should succeed in getting it in, he was to pay them 6750 dollars for it: that the authority to institute proceedings in their names, against Blythe, was an authority to exhibit a bill against him for a specific execution of his contract with them for the sale and conveyance of Miss Young's moiety; and as Miss Young was a proper and necessary party to such a bill, it was an authority to exhibit a bill, in their names, against her as well as Blythe: that the limitation of a year from the date of the contract, was the limitation of the term at which Brockenbrough and Taylor's duty to make endeavours to get in Miss Young's title, was to cease, and Rogers's right to institute proceedings to get it in, to commence; not the appointment of a time, at which, if Miss Young's title was not previously procured, the contract with respect to the sale of her moiety by Brockenbrough and Taylor, was to be at an end; and that, therefore, the suit which Rogers had brought, in the names of Brockenbrough and Taylor against Blythe's representatives and Miss Young, was authorized by their contract with him; he had a right to demand specific execution of Blythe's representatives and Miss Young, in their names; they were bound to perform the duty which the vendors had a right to demand of them as purchasers asking specific execution, according to their own contract; and Rogers was only bound to perform what he had covenanted to perform as a purchaser from them, namely, to pay them the principal sum of 6750 dollars, according to his contract with them.

633 II. The counsel for the appellants, and for Rogers, contended, that, though Brockenbrough and Taylor had held the possession from September 1813 to May 1815, and Rogers had held the possession ever since, yet Miss Young was not entitled as against them, because Blythe would not have been entitled to interest on the purchase money of her moiety. They thought, that the english doctrines on this subject, however equitable there, could not be applied in this country, without producing the greatest hardship and injustice; since here, the rents of real estate, rarely if ever, equalled the interest of the purchase money; the rents of unimproved lands were almost nothing; and any uncertainty in the title, was a bar to all permanent improvements, without which no profit could be derived from them. The present case was very peculiarly circumstanced. Blythe, being tenant in common with Miss Young, contracted to sell and convey, not only his own moiety; but a good title in her moiety also, or to give good and sufficient security that it should be conveyed, when she should attain to full age. He did neither. It was impossible for the purchasers to improve the property, with any safety to themselves, so long as they had no conveyance of Miss Young's moiety, nor any security that a conveyance would ever be made. Yet it was agreed on all hands, that the value of the property, its capacity to yield profits, depended, chiefly, on improving it as a watering place: this was stated in the petition to the legislature presented by Miss Young's friends in 1815-16, and assigned as the reason why authority should be given to her guardian to sell her interest in it. The purchasers were thus prevented from persisting in the improvements necessary to render the property profitable, and so deprived of the chief benefit of their purchase, during the ten years of Miss Young's minority. Their duty to pay interest on the purchase money could only arise from the full enjoyment of the profits. Indeed, Miss Young ought not to be considered as having been, at any time, out of possession of her moiety of the land; for the 634 purchasers being entitled "by purchase from Blythe to his undivided moiety, were tenants in common with Miss Young; their possession was that of tenants in common, and no wise adverse to her's; and as to her moiety, they ought not to be regarded as vendees in possession. But if any body ought to be charged with interest on the purchase of Miss Young's moiety, it was Blythe. For he contracted to sell Miss Young's moiety, and to convey the title, or to give good security for the conveyance of it; and by his breach of his contract in that respect, he, in effect, put it out of the power of the vendees to improve the property to the degree of which it was susceptible, and to enjoy the full profits of it. At any rate, Blythe's estate should be responsible to the purchasers, for so much as the amount of the interest may have exceeded the actual profits.

The counsel for Blythe's representatives and Miss Young, advertising to the contracts between Blythe and Brockenbrough and Taylor of September 1813, said, it was obvious, that Blythe sold the whole of the lands, Miss Young's moiety as well as his own; that the purchase money of her moiety was to be paid in instalments with interest; and that Blythe's covenant was, that until he should convey Miss Young's moiety, or give security that it should be conveyed when she should attain to full age, the purchasers should retain the purchase money. If he had given the security, he would have been entitled to demand the instalments, as they fell due; as he did not do so, they had a right to retain the purchase money; which was their security, and security exactly adequate. Meantime, he put the vendees in full possession of the whole lands. It could hardly be doubted, that if on Miss Young's attainment to full age, Blythe had purchased her title of her, and tendered it to the vendees, he would have a right to claim specific execution of them; and her ratification of Blythe's contract, upon condition that she should receive the benefit of it, and the conveyance of her interest directly to the vendees, came to the same thing as if she had conveyed to Blythe, to enable *him to perform the contract, and he had tendered a conveyance to the vendees, and claimed specific execution. That Blythe, and, by consequence, Miss Young ratifying his contract, was entitled to interest on the purchase money of her moiety, resulted from the express terms of the contract of September 1813, and from the best settled principles of law. Powell v. Martyr, 8 Ves. 146; Fludyer v. Cocker, 12 Ves. 25; Hughes v. Kearney, 1 Scho. & Lef. 132, 4; Burnell v. Brown, 1 Jac. & Walk. 168; Selden v. James, 6 Rand. 465. Therefore, as between Brockenbrough and Taylor, and Blythe's representatives and Miss Young, the chancellor's decree in the first suit was perfectly right. The vendor had no concern in the controversy between his vendees, Brockenbrough and Taylor, and their vendee Rogers; and a decree just with respect to them, ought not to be suspended till their controversy with Rogers should be determined. And, in fact, there was no decree directing Brockenbrough and Taylor to pay any money; the decree was, that if they should not pay the money, the lands should be sold; so that the decree, in its direct operation, affected only Rogers, who held the subject, and they had no right to complain of it.

III. Johnson objected, that it did not appear that the vendors, especially Miss Young, had any good title in the lands, which a purchaser should be bound to accept; and as to the parcel called Greenwoods, the title appeared defective or doubtful.

Stanard answered, that there never had been any objection made to the title, by the pleadings or otherwise.

IV. It was objected to the decree in the first suit, that it authorized and directed the sale of the whole of the lands, to pay the purchase money of Miss Young's moiety thereof: that her own moiety only ought to be held subject to her claim.

636 *It was answered, that Blythe's contract was one and intire, to sell the whole of the lands; and that he had a lien on the whole of them for the purchase money of each and every part.

CARR, J. In the examination of this case, as between Blythe and his vendees, Brockenbrough and Taylor, I shall put out of view their contract with Rogers, and shall consider it, as if they had continued to hold the lands, and had exhibited the bill in the first suit, and prosecuted it to a decree: I shall so consider the case, in order to simplify it, and because it can do no injustice to Brockenbrough and Taylor; since their contract with Rogers could no wise vary Blythe's rights; and, as to him, they must be considered as having exhibited the bill that was filed in their names, and as having prosecuted that suit. From the date of Blythe's sale, in September 1813, he took no step to perform his contract in respect of Miss Young's moiety; made no conveyance thereof to the vendees, with warranty; gave no security that her title should be conveyed when she should attain her full age. The subpoena against him was sued out in July 1815. The bill was filed in 1819. It made Blythe's representatives and Miss Young parties defendants: it contained an earnest call for a specific execution of Blythe's contract, as to Miss Young's moiety; and it was only in case Blythe should be unable to execute it specifically, that it asked damages for his breach of contract. Miss Young came of age in 1823, and put in her answer in 1824; in which, while she denied her obligation to do so, she consented to convey her title, upon receiving the purchase money with interest, which by the contract of September 1813, was to be paid to Blythe; and she filed a conveyance in court, to be delivered to the vendees, upon their paying the purchase money with interest. The chancellor's interlocutory decree in that suit, pronounced in July 1825, was a decree for specific execution.

637 *The principal objection to that decree, was, that interest was thereby given to Blythe (or, which is the same thing in effect to Miss Young), from the dates from which the instalments were to bear interest by the contract of September 1813, though Blythe had made no conveyance of Miss Young's moiety with warranty, nor given security that the title should be conveyed, nor procured Miss Young's title till 1824, but had in these particulars, broken his contract, to the serious injury of the vendees. It is true that Blythe's contract binds him to make a deed to the vendees, with general warranty, for Miss Young's part of the land: but it names no time for doing this. It was well known, that the title was in her, and that she was an infant: it could not be the meaning of the parties, that Blythe should make the deed before he got the title; this was not the security the parties contemplated; that was, to hold the purchase money until the deed should be made, or until Blythe should give sufficient security for a good title, when Miss Young attained her age. The vendees took possession of the property under the contract, and have never been disturbed in it. They say, indeed, that they have suffered damages, by being prevented by the uncertainty of the title, from making the various improvements necessary for a watering place, and reaping the golden harvest, which would have followed: but we have no evidence upon this point; and these speculative damages are the most difficult of all things to be estimated. Perhaps, they might have made thousands; perhaps, they might have sunk every thing. But this is certain, they have had possession of more than 900 acres of land; some of it among the most fertile I have ever seen. The record tells us, this land adjoined the Sweet Springs, a long established watering place; which, we may fairly presume, would furnish a ready market for the products of the soil. Be all this as it may, the vendees have not brought an action for damages: they have filed their bill for a specific execution, praying that the title, if it can possibly be had, 638 may be decreed to them; and it is only in case they cannot get this, that damages are asked for. This suit they prosecute in such a lingering way, as not to bring it to hearing till 1824; waiting (it would seem) till Miss Young (whom, without legal or equitable claim upon her, they had made a party) should come of age. She attained her age in the latter part of 1823, and before the hearing, her answer is filed agreeing to ratify the contract, and tendering a deed, to be delivered, on receiving her purchase money and interest. To this deed there is no exception taken, no reference asked as to title: and the question is, was the chancellor wrong, under these circumstances, to decree interest on the purchase money? It is most clear, that against Miss Young, he could make no decree, except such as she assented to; and the plaintiffs knowing this, and still making her a party, and praying for her title, must be considered, as consenting to take it, on such terms as she should prescribe. But independently of all this, it is the settled rule, that a vendee, in possession of both land and purchase money, coming for a specific execution, shall pay interest, even though the vendor has been in default, unless he has not only kept the purchase money idle, but has given the vendee notice that it was so. I think the rule a sound one, and applicable to this case. There was no error then in decreeing interest.

But it was objected, that the decree directs the sale of the whole of the land, unless the purchase money should be paid within a given time. This objection would seem to come with a bad grace from vendees, who have insisted on the specific execution of the contract. They could only expect to get the title which they have prayed for on paying for it. The purchase money was a lien upon the whole land.

Thus I am of opinion, that, as this case appeared upon the record in the first suit before the chancellor, his decree was right.

But, before the institution of that suit, other circumstances had occurred, other transactions had taken place; 639 *and these have been made the subject of the new bill filed by Brockenbrough and Taylor, seeking to suspend the decree in the first suit, and, so far as it affects them, to set it aside. And we are now to consider the case in this new aspect.

In this bill of Brockenbrough and Taylor,—after setting forth their contract with Rogers of May 1815, and the proceedings and decree in the first suit, and alleging that that suit was brought and prosecuted by Rogers, in their names, without their knowledge or consent,—they charge Rogers with misconduct in several respects: 1. in bringing the suit in their names alone, concealing from the court every trace of his contract with them, his possession of the property, and enjoyment of all its profits, making himself no party, and so stating the case, as to make them appear still the owners and possessors of the property: 2. in making Miss Young a party, against whom they pretended no claim whatever; and 3. in procuring a decree for her title, and putting upon them the burden of paying the purchase money of her moiety with interest, whereas Rogers was the person bound to pay both, and the person against whom the court would have decreed such payment, if he had made himself a party and fairly stated the whole case. Therefore, they prayed, that the decree in the first suit should be set aside, so far as it affected them, and that the execution thereof should be suspended and inhibited by injunction. The injunction was awarded; but the chancellor afterwards dissolved it; and it is from this order of dissolution in this cause, that the appeal was taken to this court. Was the injunction properly dissolved?

It was said that Blythe's representatives and Miss Young, who are in pursuit of the money justly due to them, ought not to be delayed by the disputes between the plaintiffs and Rogers. But it must be remembered, that those parties have ample security, and are getting interest on their money. We must remember, too, that "the constant aim of a court of equity, is, to do complete justice, by deciding 640 "upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject of the suit to make the performance of the order perfectly safe to those who are compelled to obey it, and to prevent future litigation:" Mitf. Plead. 144. And we may well say with this court, in Lane v. Tidball, Gil. 133, that, "compared with these objects, a little delay is deemed of no account, in a court of equity."

It was said also, that the original decree did not touch Brockenbrough and Taylor, and that therefore the dissolution could not hurt them. I cannot assent to this position: I think the decree does touch them, and very nearly too. The decree, to be sure, does not say, in so many words, that they shall pay the purchase money: but it says, that upon their paying the purchase money with interest, the title deeds shall be delivered to them, and that, unless they pay it by a certain day, their lands (as the chancellor supposed them) shall be sold. Is not this, in substance, a decree against them for the money? Suppose the marshal sold these lands for half the purchase money due; upon the confirmation of his report, would not an execution issue at once against Brockenbrough and Taylor? I doubt, whether even an order of the court would be necessary; but if so, it would be an order merely in execution of the decree.

But I place this point upon broader ground: I think Rogers was clearly wrong in bringing this suit in the name of Brockenbrough and Taylor solely, and concealing from the court his purchase of the land, and possession under it. I think this omission has operated injuriously to them; and that they had a right, by such a bill as they have filed, to have it reheard and corrected; and this without waiting till an execution had issued against them. I have already stated that the great object of equity is, to settle the rights of all persons interested, and cut up future litigation. Another ground of rehearing laid down in the books, is, where any facts materially affecting the case have been kept back. Suppose Rogers had made himself a joint plaintiff with Brockenbrough and Taylor, or made 641 himself plaintiff, and them *and the other parties defendants; had stated his own contract, and his possession under it; and had prayed a specific execution: what ought to have been the decree of the court? Clearly, I think, that Rogers should pay the 6750 dollars of purchase money due, with interest; that upon such payment, Miss Young's conveyance should be delivered to him; that upon his failure to make such payment by a given day, the land should be sold to raise the purchase money; and that, if that did not bring the amount, Rogers and Brockenbrough and Taylor should be personally liable to the vendors. Can it be doubted, that such a decree against Rogers would be correct? I cannot imagine the ground of such a doubt. He had bought of Brockenbrough and Taylor, the moiety of the land to which they had the legal right; and as to the other half, he had bought their rights, their contract; and on the terms of paying the same sum, which they were to pay on getting a title: he had enjoyed possession under the contract, and now came into equity for the title: must he not pay the purchase money with interest. When he was asking the execution of one part of the contract, must he not execute the other part, which he had taken upon himself? This seems to me the clearest equity in the world. All the remarks which I made on this part of the subject, as between Blythe and Brockenbrough and Taylor, apply emphatically to Rogers—because, instead of pursuing Blythe for damages, he has gone out of his way, and out of the power given him by Brockenbrough and Taylor, in making Miss Young a party, and praying for her title; as there was no obligation whatever on her, she had a right to make her own terms; and, surely, Rogers had no right to throw any part of this burden off his own shoulders.

It was objected, that there was not a perfect title to the lands. The answer given was a very satisfactory one; that there was not the slightest objection to the title in the bill, or any of the pleadings; that the parties had not put it in issue, and could not now raise the objec- 642 tion. When *Miss Young and the representatives of Blythe filed their answers, setting out their titles, and tendering their deeds; if Rogers had doubted on the subject, he might have asked a reference of the title; and before the master, it might have been shewn, that the defects now imagined, did not exist; the evidence might have been furnished there in a moment, which not being required, may not appear in this record. The chancellor expressly predicates his decree upon the fact, that no exception was taken to the deeds filed. Nay more, Rogers in his answer to Brockenbrough and Taylor's bill (an answer filed after a full disclosure of the title) makes no objection to the title, nor to any thing else, except the payment of interest on the purchase money. That, in truth, is the only point in difference between him and Brockenbrough and Taylor. Surely, we ought to suffer parties to judge for themselves, and say with what titles they will be satisfied.

I am therefore of opinion, that the order dissolving the injunction was erroneous, and that it ought to be reversed, the injunction reinstated, and the cause remanded, to be proceeded in according to the principles now declared.

CABELL, J. I am of the same opinion. If we were now deciding this case as on an appeal from the interlocutory decree of July 1825, in the first suit of Brockenbrough and Taylor against Blythe's representatives and Miss Young; or, in other words, if we are to be intirely uninfluenced by a regard to the contract between Brockenbrough and Taylor and Rogers; it would be perfectly clear, that that decree must be affirmed. For it would be nothing more than the common case of a vendee of land coming into a court of equity for specific execution of the contract; praying a conveyance of the land, on the terms of paying the purchase money. In that aspect of the case, Brockenbrough and Taylor cannot complain: they get the title which they ask, and with which they are satisfied, and they are directed to pay no more than the balance of the purchase money which 643 *is confessedly due, with interest from the time indicated by their contract. And, if we could suppose Brockenbrough and Taylor to be out of the case, and that in the original suit, Rogers, as the sub-vendee of Brockenbrough and Taylor, was the nominal plaintiff on the record, as he was the real plaintiff in fact, the decree of July 1825 would be equally free from objection; for he would stand in their shoes, and could object to no decree which would be proper as to them.

Has any thing been exhibited in the injunction case, calculated to shew, that the decree of July 1825 is in any respect wrong, so far as it may affect Rogers? I think not. It does not appear from his answer to the bill, that he has any objection whatever to the decree, either as to the title of the land, or as to the balance of the principal due from him, for the purchase money. He seems to be perfectly satisfied with the decree, provided he is not made to pay interest on that balance. An exemption from interest, is claimed, on the ground, that the land owed its principal value to its mineral waters, which could not be rendered valuable without expensive improvements; and that these improvements could not be safely made so long as the title was in a state of uncertainty. But this objection seems to be the effect of an after thought. It certainly had no influence with Brockenbrough and Taylor, during their occupation of the land; for they say, they expended large sums in improvements. Nor does Rogers pretend, that it had any influence with him, between the years 1815 and 1818. He does however say, that after that, he in a measure abandoned the land, in consequence of the uncertainty of the title. If this be so, why did he not communicate the fact to Blythe's representatives, and file a bill for the rescission of the contract, instead of a bill for specific execution? If he had then filed a bill for rescinding the contract, there is very little doubt but that Blythe's representatives would have acceded to his wishes. He must submit to the consequences of his own acts. He made no complaint; he made no offer to rescind the contract; he retained possession 644 of the land, preferred *a bill for specific execution of the contract, and has now got all that he asked by that bill; a title with which he is satisfied. Under such circumstances, it would be without precedent and contrary to equity, that he should not pay the purchase money with interest.

But Rogers was not a party on the record in the first suit; and, consequently, the decree, so far as it relates to the payment of the purchase money, does not operate on him, the real plaintiff, but on Brockenbrough and Taylor, the nominal parties. When, therefore, it appeared from the bill in the second suit, that Rogers was the real party in interest, the chancellor ought to have reheard the original suit, so as to make the decree for the purchase money and interest fall exclusively on him; unless, indeed, he should be unable to pay it.

TUCKER, P. I am clearly of opinion, that interest upon the purchase money of Miss Young's undivided moiety of the estate ought to be paid. To this conclusion I am equally led, in whatever aspect I view the transaction between the parties. If we look upon her acquiescence in the contract upon the terms of receiving the principal and interest, as of the nature of a new contract, then it is obvious, that she must be entitled to receive that interest, upon which she insists as an indispensable part of the consideration of her conveyance. Whether Blythe ought to be charged with it to the exoneration of the appellants and of Rogers, will best appear by the examination I propose of the conduct and obligations of Blythe. Whether, Rogers or the appellants ought to bear the burden, will appear hereafter.

Looking upon Miss Young's acquiescence in the contract, not as a new contract, but as confirming and carrying the contract of Blythe into execution, how does the case stand? Taking the contract of September 1813, as one made by Blythe's authorized agent (for though Stribling's authority was questioned, yet all parties have united in waiving that question) what was Blythe's engagement as to that 645 portion *of the estate which belonged to Miss Young? "For her undivided two-fourths," it is provided "that Blythe should make to Brockenbrough and Taylor a good and sufficient deed with general warranty." And for the security of the purchasers, it is also provided, "that none of the deferred payments" [which, without doubt, was regarded as the price or consideration of her interest] "shall be demanded, until he shall either make a deed, or give good security that a good title will be made when Miss Young shall come of age." Here then, the fact that he had not title to Miss Young's portion is disclosed: the fact that she was an infant is avowed, and the means of security for the purchasers is provided.

These means are, either the retention of the purchase money, the execution of a deed with general warranty, or the giving of good security that a good title would be made when Miss Young should come of age. Here are clearly three distinct modes of indemnity, of which Blythe, by the frame of the instrument, clearly had the option. He was not bound by its terms to do which they pleased. He was intirely at liberty to do which he pleased. If he chose to give security, or to execute a deed with warranty, he would then have been entitled to receive the purchase money: but if he chose to waive the receipt of the purchase money, he was at liberty to do so, and then it was unnecessary to give the security or to execute the deed. It could not be a reasonable interpretation of the contract, that he should leave the money in their hands, and give the security also. The money was the best security, and the amount was precisely that which they would have recovered back, had he gone on to receive it. For, having only engaged for the title of a third person, the measure of damages, if he failed to get it in, would be the purchase money of the land.

Blythe, then, did not break his contract by failing to give security or to execute a deed with warranty. Has he failed to comply with it since? I think not. Miss Young arrived at age in 1823. Until that 646 *her title, though he united in the effort to effect that object by petition to the legislature. Within a very reasonable time after her maturity, his representatives did procure her acquiescence, and she executed a conveyance accordingly. There has been a more than customary punctuality and precision in the fulfilment of his engagements, and Rogers, the vendee of the appellants, is now in full enjoyment of the whole title. I say nothing of the minor objections to the obscurity of part of the title, since if Rogers had had any doubt about it, the matter should have been distinctly brought before the court by a reference of the title, or otherwise. The failure to do this, must be taken as a proof of Rogers's consciousness, that there was no material difficulty or defect.

In the short view of the transactions which I have taken, it appears, then, that Blythe and his representatives have been in no default. He has procured the title of Miss Young, within a reasonable time. How that title was procured, how her acquiescence was obtained, is matter of no concern to the vendees. He did not represent himself as the owner. He fairly represented a minor as the owner, and engaged for her executing a title when the legal impediment of infancy should be removed. That engagement has been complied with.

Then, how does the question stand as to interest? The record presents the case of a vendor, who has delivered possession of the premises to the purchaser, which he has continued to enjoy without molestation; of a vendor, who has also faithfully complied with his engagement, that a good title should be made upon the happening of a particular event; until which event, he has left the purchase money in the hands of the vendee, as his security; and that vendee has thus, for more than eighteen years, by himself or his vendee, received the rents and profits, and heid the purchase money also. Is there any principle of law or equity, which can justify us in saying he shall keep both? Shall the purchaser for so long a period receive the profits, while 647 *he is enjoying the interest of the purchase money?—for it would be wilful blindness to the ordinary course of transactions, to suppose, that this money has lain idle. If raised at all, it has been put to interest beyond question; if not raised, the interest has been saved to the party, which amounts to the same thing: for, in either event, he would have enjoyed the vendor's estate for eighteen years for nothing. The injustice of such a proceeding has long since given rise to the rule, that, as to interest and profits, the vendor is to be considered the owner of the money and entitled to the interest, while the vendee is regarded as the owner of the land and entitled to the profits. But he cannot have both. The principle is too familiar to require more than a reference to the cases which were cited at the bar. They establish, beyond question, the general rule, that where the purchaser is let into the possession, and the perception of the rents and profits of the purchased estates, he must pay interest for his purchase money; and if the rule be not universal, the party who claims an exemption from its operation, must bring himself within some established exception. This has been attempted, in the argument of the case; but it has moreover been contended that the english rule is too rigorous for our country.

That rents and profits ordinarily bear but a small proportion to the interests of purchase money, cannot be denied. This is very strikingly the case in Virginia. Hence, where there has been a sale and delivery of possession, and the contract has been disaffirmed, there can be no propriety in the application of the rule. Accordingly it never has been so applied. But where a man purchases land, he has made up his mind to give his money, which would produce a good interest, for land, which will produce much less. Thus, in the present case: had the title been made, and the money paid, the purchaser must have been content with the scanty rents, while the seller would have been receiving full interest. Now, since a court of equity looks upon the sale, as complete so soon as the parties have contracted, it is, 648 quoad *this matter, the same thing as if a conveyance had been actually made; provided the vendee has had actual possession, and uninterrupted enjoyment, and there are no particular circumstances to take the case out of the general rule. From the moment of the contract, the buyer is the owner of the land, and must rest satisfied with his rents; and the seller is the owner of the money, and is entitled to his interest.

But it is said in this case, there were objections to the title which prevented the vendees from proceeding to improve the property, so as to render it profitable. To this there are many answers: 1. The difficulty in the title was one contemplated at the very inception of the transaction, and yet it was not provided that interest should not be paid. 2. If there were objections to the title, Blythe, I have shewn, was in no default. 3. The vendees have always had ample indemnity in their power; for they have not only retained the purchase money of the portion of which the title was doubtful, but they have also attached the whole purchase money of the residue, for the purpose of securing themselves. Had the title ultimately failed, they would have had, at this day, the 6750 dollars in Stribling's hands, with the accumulated interest of eighteen years, to indemnify them for their improvements; or, if the whole contract had been rescinded, so that this sum would have become their's again, then the land would have become Blythe's, and that would have become liable. I cannot, therefore, but consider this as a pretext on the part of Rogers, who seems to have made no progress in improving; and as to Brockenbrough and Taylor, they were obviously not arrested in their measures, as in less than two years they had laid out 4500 dollars. Upon the whole, I am satisfied, that Blythe's representatives, or (which amounts to the same thing) Miss Young is entitled to interest as decreed by the chancellor.

We come next to inquire who must pay it. Shall the burden fall on Brockenbrough and Taylor or on Rogers?

649 *By their contract with Rogers of May 1815, Brockenbrough and Taylor recited their contract with Blythe, and thus distinctly announced, that their title was imperfect as to Miss Young's moiety; with respect to which, it was also provided, that they were to use their best endeavours to procure the legal title, to be conveyed to Rogers; and if the legal title could be obtained, Rogers was then to pay them 6750 dollars; but, if a legal title could not be procured by them within one year from the date of that agreement, Rogers was then to be at liberty, in their name or his own, to institute any legal proceedings against the said Blythe, for his own benefit and advantage; it being understood, that in the event of their not procuring the legal title to more than Blythe's moiety, Rogers was to pay for that moiety only. It was also provided, that, as it might be necessary to attach the money in Stribling's hands to secure performance of the contract by Blythe, or obtain damages for non-performance thereof, it was agreed, that any proceedings might be had for that object, and that they should be for the benefit of the party entitled thereto, according to the purport and intent of that agreement.

By these articles, then, as I understand them, Brockenbrough and Taylor were bound to use their best endeavours for one year, to procure the legal title of Miss Young's moiety, to be conveyed to Rogers; and if they succeeded, they were to receive 6750 dollars: if they did not, then they passed over to Rogers their rights as against Blythe, to be pursued by him in their names, if he pleased, but at his own risque, and for his own account; and in this event, they were to receive nothing for

Miss Young's moiety. If no title could be procured eventually, Rogers would have been entitled to any damages he could recover in their names, and they would neither have participated in those damages, nor received any equivalent for them. Or, if he proceeded for the title and recovered it, he would recover it "for his own benefit and advantage," and for his own account; and, of course, upon his own responsibility for *the performance of the contract on the part of Brockenbrough and Taylor with Blythe. For it is observable, that although in the event of their procuring the title to be made to him, he was to pay them the 6750 dollars, since they would have to pay it to Blythe; yet, after the year expired, when he was authorized to sue on the contract for his own benefit and advantage, there is no obligation on him to pay them one cent. He is left to the responsibilities of the contract, which he was authorized to enforce, and charged with its obligations which he was bound to fulfil.

Such, I think, is the clear interpretation of this contract. In compliance with it, Brockenbrough and Taylor, within the year, issued the attachment against Stribling. I attribute the act to them, because it was their duty to do it by the contract; and the compliance with that duty may be presumed, as the act was a proper one, as the suit is in their names, and there is no testimony going to fix the act on another. They also in further fulfilment of their contract to endeavour to get the legal title for Rogers, made an effort to procure an act of assembly authorizing a sale of Miss Young's title. This was the only practicable mode of getting that title, within the year; and when they failed in this, and the year had elapsed, their rights and obligations were both at an end. From that moment, Rogers stood in their shoes, with full title to the benefit of their contract with Blythe, and of course bound by all its provisions. He acted accordingly. In 1819, he procured counsel, and instead of instituting a new suit, grafted his bill upon the proceedings already instituted against Blythe and Stribling. From that moment, the suit was his. It stood, indeed, in the names of Brockenbrough and Taylor, but not improperly, as Rogers had a right to use their names. It was for his own benefit and advantage, and under his exclusive management and control. They were not entitled to meddle with it, because they had contracted to permit him to sue in their names "for his own benefit;" and he, and not they, was the proper judge of what was so. On *the other hand, they were not bound to concern themselves with it, because they had passed over their rights to him pro bono atque malo,—for better, for worse: and had excluded themselves from any right of interference. Whether, therefore, as it respects Blythe's representatives, this was the suit of Rogers, or of Brockenbrough and Taylor, it was as between those parties, unquestionably the suit of Rogers from the time the bill was filed.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that from the expiration of the year after the date of their contract with Rogers, Brockenbrough and Taylor were cut loose from the transaction, except so far as they might have been liable to Blythe. The chancellor, however, has not decreed against them personally, but only against the land; and I think he has rightly considered the contract as intire, and the whole liable for the purchase money yet due with interest.

But although this view of the case would absolve the appellants from any liability except to Blythe's representatives, in case the whole lands, and Rogers himself, should prove inadequate to the discharge of the purchase money; yet it is by no means a consequence of this opinion, that the chancellor erred in dissolving the injunction, obtained by the appellants to the decree in favor of Blythe's representatives and Miss Young. This is, in truth, the only question before this court. There is no reason afforded by that bill for longer postponing their recovery of the equivalent for their estates, now for eighteen years in the uninterrupted enjoyment of their vendees, and of the claimant under them. I am clearly of opinion, that the injunction was properly dissolved. Whether the original decree was erroneous or not, we are not entitled to inquire, as it has not been appealed from, and as it is clear, that it was a matter of no concernment to the appellants, if I am right in my view of their rights and responsibilities. That decree, though rendered in a cause in which they were nominal plaintiffs, was not personally against them.

It decrees, indeed, a sale of the lands, in the event of the purchase money not being paid *by them: for Rogers was unknown in the case. But it does not decree, that they shall pay it; and no execution can be taken out against them. Had it done so, then their bill would have been perfectly proper. At present, it acts, in effect, upon Rogers only, by directing a sale of his land. It is proper that it should do so, and he must pay the purchase money, or submit to a sale; for the decree is rendered in a cause emphatically his own, and over which the appellants had no control; and while they, on the one hand, are not entitled to appeal from the decree, because it does not affect them, and because they have no right to meddle with the cause which was prosecuted in their names by their own assent, he on the other hand, has acquiesced in the decree, by asking no appeal. Therefore, I am of opinion, that the order dissolving the injunction should be affirmed.

The decree entered by the court, declared, that the interlocutory decree of July 1825 in the first suit, was correct, so far as it decreed the payment of the purchase money to Miss Young, with interest on the instalments thereof from the dates when they were payable, or from which they were to bear interest, by the contract of September 1813, between the appellants and Blythe, and so far also as it subjected the whole of the land to sale, for payment of the purchase money and interest thereon remaining due; and there was no just grounds for a further delay of the sale. That, according to the just construction of the contract of May 1815, between the appellants and

Rogers, and considering the possession of the lands taken and held by him,—Rogers, after the lapse of a year from the date of that contract, and the failure of the appellants to get in Miss Young's title within the year, was entitled to all their rights under their contract with Blythe, and liable (as between him and them) to all their responsibilities under it, and to all responsibilities that might arise out of any remedy he might select to enforce it. That the suit in which the decree of July 1825 was made, was one that Rogers had a 653 *right to prosecute, and did in fact prosecute, for his own benefit; with which suit the appellants did not, and could not, interfere. That Rogers (as between him and the appellants) was liable to all the responsibilities arising out of the first suit so prosecuted, and was bound to exonerate the appellants from them all. That the purchase money and interest due, ought to be sought for, out of the lands, and from Rogers, before resort should be had to the appellants. That the injunction awarded to the appellants in the second suit, ought to be continued, until resort to them should become necessary, so as to protect them from personal responsibility, but no further; it being the opinion of this court, that the decree of July 1825 in the first suit, ought in no other respect to be longer suspended, unless Rogers should, within a reasonable time, to be appointed by the court of chancery, pay the purchase money and interest thereon due; in which case, the court ought to decree, that the appellants shall convey to Rogers the title conveyed to them by Miss Young. But that this decree while it expressed the clear opinion of the court, as to the construction of the contract between the appellants and Rogers of May 1815, and on the points now in controversy between them, was not intended to preclude Rogers from any defence, of which it might be in his power to avail himself, by adducing new evidence, or in any proper way giving a new aspect to the case. Therefore, the chancellor's order dissolving the injunction in the second suit, so far as it conflicted with the principles here declared, was reversed, and the cause was remanded &c. And the court decreed the appellants their costs against Rogers.

This was the sequel of the case of Chowning v. Cox, which was before this court in February 1823, and is reported 1 Rand. 306. A reference to that report will be necessary in order to understand, fully, the report of the subsequent proceedings.

Elizabeth Thompson, by deed dated the 18th November 1801, conveyed a parcel of land called Laurel Grove in Westmoreland, to Peter P. Cox, to secure a debt of 1500 dollars, money of certain wards of Cox, which she had borrowed of him; and thereby entrusted and empowered Cox himself to sell the mortgaged subject to pay the debt. In 1803, Chowning purchased Laurel Grove of Mrs. Thompson for £876, out of which he undertook to pay certain debts she owed, and among them the debt of 1500 dollars to Cox. Chowning exhibited a bill in chancery in 1806, to enjoin Cox from selling the land under the deed of November 1801, upon the ground of some alleged defect in Mrs. Thompson's title. This injunction was dissolved in April 1812. And on the 29th May 1812, Cox proceeded to sell the land at public auction to William Taylor. In August 1812, Chowning exhibited his original bill in this cause, against Cox and Mrs. Thompson, wherein he alleged, that Cox had sold the land to —, 655 whether on the purchaser's *own account or on that of Cox, he professed not to know, and he objected, that Cox being the creditor secured by the deed of November 1801, could not lawfully act as trustee for himself, and had no rightful power to make sale of the mortgaged subject; and, therefore, he prayed that he should be permitted to redeem the land, upon payment of the principal and interest of the debt remaining due on the mortgage. Cox, in his answer to this bill, stated all the circumstances of the sale of May 1812, and that the purchaser was William Taylor. Yet Chowning did not make Taylor a party defendant in the suit. The chancellor, on the hearing, dismissed the bill, as to so much thereof as sought to set aside the sale. Chowning appealed from the decree. This court declared, that the deed of November 1801, did not give Cox any rightful power to sell the land for payment of a debt due to himself, so as to bar Chowning's right of redemption: but it added, "If there were no other persons than the debtor and creditor, interested in this controversy, the court would not only reverse the decree, but provide for a sale under the directions of the court of chancery. But the person who purchased under the former sale, and who has the legal title, has not been made a party. Had he been before the court, he might have given a different aspect of the cause. He might have shewn, that, although the sale cannot be justified on the sole ground of the powers derived from the deed, yet it ought to be confirmed in his favor, in consequence of the subsequent acts of the appellant. He ought, therefore, to have been a party; and the chancellor erred in pronouncing a final decree, without affording an opportunity to bring him before the court." The chancellor's decree was accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded to the court of chancery.

Chowning then exhibited a supplemental bill and bill of revivor, setting forth the former proceedings, and the decree of this court of February 1823; and stating, that, at the sale of the land in question, by Peter P. Cox, on the 29th May 1812, 656 *William Taylor, late of Westmoreland deceased, was the purchaser, at a very inadequate price; that Taylor was well apprised of the authority under which Cox pretended to make the sale, and that Cox was acting as a trustee under a deed in which he himself was a mortgagee, and, therefore, had no rightful power to make the sale; and that Taylor had taken possession of the land, and he and his representatives had enjoyed the profits thereof for many years; and that Cox also was now dead. Therefore, this bill made the administrator with the will annexed of Taylor, and his heirs, and the executors of Cox, parties defendants; and prayed, that Taylor's real and personal representatives should be ordered to account for the profits of the land, since the same came to Taylor's possession; that an account of the debt due by Chowning for which the land was mortgaged, should also be taken; and that Chowning should be allowed to redeem the land, upon payment of any balance of debt, which, after crediting him for the payments he had made, and for the profits which should be found to have accrued to the holders of the subject, should be found due from him.

The administrator and heirs of Taylor, in their answers, insisted, that whatever might be the merits of the controversy as between Chowning and Cox, Chowning had no just claim to the relief he asked as against Taylor and his representatives. For, they alleged, the sale of the land made by Cox, was a sale at public auction for cash, fairly conducted in all respects; that Taylor became the purchaser at that sale for the full cash value of the property, without notice or suspicion of any defect in Cox's title, or in his power to make the sale, and Chowning himself was present at the sale, and made no objection whatever to Cox's proceeding; and that Taylor had paid the whole purchase money to Cox. They stated, that Taylor died in 1814, and they exhibited his will, whereby it appeared, that Taylor devised this land to two of his sons.

657 *Cox's executors answered, that their testator sold the land to Taylor, at public auction, for cash, in Chowning's presence, without any objection on his part; that Taylor paid Cox the purchase money, which was £626. and Cox acting as a trustee, conveyed the land to Taylor, with a covenant of special warranty; that the debts charged upon the land, and to satisfy which it was sold, amounted to £571. 6. 9.; that their testator was, therefore, accountable to Chowning for the balance £54. 13. 3. with interest from the date of the sale of the mortgaged subject; and they insisted, that Chowning had no other just claim against their testator's estate. They also alleged, that they had fully administered the assets of their testator's estate; and they exhibited their accounts of administration, audited and settled by a commissioner of the county court of Westmoreland, by which it appeared probable, that Cox's estate was insolvent.

Cox's deed of conveyance of the land to Taylor, was dated the 13th October 1813. This deed recited Mrs. Thompson's deed to Cox of the 8th August 1801, whereby she conveyed the land to Cox, as a security for 1500 dollars due to him, and constituted him the trustee to make sale of the mortgaged subject; the sale of the 29th May 1812, made to Taylor by Cox, as trustee, in pursuance of that deed; and the payment of the purchase money, £626. by Taylor to Cox; and in consideration thereof conveyed the land to Taylor, with a covenant of warranty in the following words—"And the said Cox, as trustee aforesaid, and in pursuance of the written terms and stipulations of the sale aforesaid, published and declared, and by the said Taylor read, known and understood, on the day of sale of the said land under the said deed of trust" [the deed of the 8th August 1801] "and before the biddings were opened, doth, for himself and his heirs, especially warrant the title of the said land against him the said Cox and his heirs, but against no other person or persons."

Taylor, by his will, dated the 24th March 1814, devised this land in these words:

I give unto my two sons, William
658 *and David, my plantation in Westmoreland county called Laurel Grove, to be equally divided between them; and in case the land should be recovered by William Chowning or his heirs, I give them the money with interest from the purchase or sale of the said land by Peter P. Cox, trustee: if there should be a judgment, and the said land ordered to be re-sold, it is my desire that my executors should attend the sale, and bid to the amount of my claim (with interest) on the said land, or more if they think proper to do so for my said sons; which sum, in case it should exceed the claim on the land, to be paid out of their estate, say William and David's estate or proportion—all over what has been paid for said land, to be paid by them."

It was proved, that Cox's sale of the 29th May 1812, was made in pursuance of public advertisement duly made, of the time, place and terms of sale, and of the authority under which Cox undertook to make the sale: that the sale was attended by a number of persons, and there were other bidders besides Taylor; that the sale was, in all respects, fairly conducted; that the price was an adequate one; that Cox professed to sell as a trustee, under the deed of the 8th August 1801, and declared that he would only make a conveyance with special warranty against himself and his heirs; that Chowning was present at the sale from first to last; that after twelve o'clock of the day of sale, when Cox proposed that the sale should commence, Chowning requested a postponement for an hour, saying he had hopes of being able to raise 1000 or 1200 dollars, which it was understood Cox was willing to receive, and to give further time for the payment of the balance of the debt; that Cox consented to this postponement; that Chowning left the place and was absent some two or three hours, and upon his return, stated that he had been disappointed in his expectation of raising the money, and that the sale of the land must go on, and then, and not till then, the sale was commenced and proceeded; that Chowning did not make or hint any objection whatsoever to the sale.

659 *The chancellor was of opinion, that the aspect of the case as between Chowning and the representatives of Taylor, was not substantially different from that which it bore, at the time of the decree of the court of appeals, as between Chowning and Cox; and that, upon the principles of the decree of the court of appeals, Chowning was entitled to redeem the land, upon the payment of the balances due by him upon his contract with Mrs. Thompson, to the representatives of Taylor, the purchaser of the land, so far as it should appear that the purchase money paid by Taylor had been applied to the discharge of Chowning's debts, and the interest thereon accrued and accruing; and that Chowning was entitled to a credit and set-off against the debt he owed, for the rents and profits of the land received by Taylor in his lifetime or by his representatives since his death. Therefore, he directed a commissioner to take an account of the rents and profits of the land since the sale thereof made by Cox to Taylor, ascertaining by whom the same were received; to inquire and report, whether Cox had paid Mrs. Thompson the whole of the debt due to her, and had paid the same out of the purchase money paid him by Taylor; and to set-off the amount of the rents and profits against the balances of debt due by Chowning, so as to shew how much was now due from or to Chowning to or from the defendants or either of them. From this decree Taylor's administrator and devisees appealed to this court.

Leigh, for the appellants. Taylor's representatives, in defending themselves upon the supplemental bill, have, in the language of this court, "given a different aspect to the cause." For, though the circumstances attending Cox's sale of May 1812, which Taylor's representatives have relied on in their defence, were alleged by Cox in his answer to the original bill, yet he adduced no proof of them whatever; and this court neither did nor could pay any respect to them, except so far as they served to shew the propriety 660 *and necessity of convening Taylor as a party before the court. Whatever was the defect of Cox's power, his sale was, in itself, perfectly fair, in all respects. The only objection to it, was, that Cox being himself the creditor and mortgagee, could not rightfully act as trustee in selling the mortgaged subject, though Mrs. Thompson the mortgagor, and Chowning, who purchased of her subject to the mortgage, both, undoubtedly, intended to confide that trust and power to him. Chowning was exactly apprised of all the facts, and had ample time for deliberation. He had suspended the proceedings of Cox, by an injunction, for six years, during which time he never hinted this objection. After this long delay, Cox proceeded to make the sale, regularly, and in execution of what he deemed his power and trust; a sale at public auction, for cash; so that the purchaser was to part with the purchase money the instant the biddings were closed, to be applied to the discharge of Chowning's debts. Chowning, present at the sale from first to last, so far from making any objection to Cox's right to make the sale, after a vain endeavour to raise money to pay the debt, and so to prevent the sale, declared publicly, that the sale must proceed. Nay more, though he was apprised by Cox's answer to his original bill, that Taylor was the purchaser, he forbore to make him a party for years, and thus deprived him of all pretense to prefer any claim against Cox, to refund the purchase money he had paid him, or to demand security that it should be refunded: he never made Taylor a party, till Cox was dead, and his estate insolvent. Chowning's objection to the sale, was founded on the equity he had to insist, that Cox, who was interested as a creditor, should not exercise the powers of a trustee—that the trust should be executed by some disinterested person; an equity not founded on his own contract, but on the policy of the law, which, in spite of the contract of the parties, denies to a person standing in the relation Cox did, the character or powers of a trustee. He waived this equity by wilful acquiescence in Cox's sale, without objection; nay, by positive assent to it. He barred himself from asserting it against Taylor, by his subsequent conduct: seeing Taylor purchase the land, knowing he was to pay cash, knowing that the purchase money was to be applied to the payment of his own debts, he stood quietly by till all this was done, and never asserted his equity against Taylor, until, by reason of Cox's death and insolvency, if Taylor shall lose the land, he must lose his money too. To these obvious objections to the equity, so late asserted by Chowning against Taylor, it is no answer to say, that he was ignorant of the incompatibility of Cox's interest in the trust with the character of trustee, and of his own legal right to object to his proceedings on that ground. For, in the first place, Chowning, was certainly apprised of his rights, at least as early as August 1812, when he exhibited his original bill against Cox, and willfully forbore to make Taylor a party; and, in the next place, he was exactly informed of all the facts, from the beginning, and he cannot be allowed to excuse himself for neglecting to assert his rights, and thereby involving the innocent purchaser in loss or difficulty, on the ground of ignorance of the law. 1 Fonb. Eq. book 2, ch. 3, § 4, pp. 151-6, and the cases collected in the notes. If it be said, that Taylor also, as well as Chowning, was apprised of all the facts, and therefore he, no more than Chowning, shall be allowed to allege ignorance of the legal defect of Cox's power to sell; the answer is, that the objection to Cox's proceeding as trustee, lay for Chowning only; and as he alone had a right to make the objection, so he had a right to waive it; and the bidders at the sale had a right to infer that he did waive it. Chowning must be considered as the actor; for Cox was in effect acting as his trustee, since he stood in the place of Mrs. Thompson, who had expressly constituted Cox the trustee to sell the mortgaged subject, to pay the debt which Chowning undertook to pay out of the purchase money he contracted to pay her for the land. In the cases in which it has been held, that money paid under a mistake of the law, cannot be recovered back, the receiver as well as the payer has been consensual of the facts: and it is because the payer is the actor, and because to permit him to recover it back, would be to allow him to involve the receiver in a debt or duty which but for his own mistake he never would have incurred, that the receiver is exempted from all obligation to refund the money. Brisbane v. Dacres, 5 Taunt. 144, 1 Com. Law Rep. 43.

Johnson, for the appellee. Though the sale was made in May 1812, yet Cox did not make a conveyance to Taylor till October 1813. Hence it is to be inferred, that the terms of sale which required the purchase money to be paid in cash, were not strictly complied with; that the purchase money was not in fact paid, till about the time when the conveyance was executed. And the very peculiar covenant inserted in Cox's deed, evinces, that Taylor was as well apprised as Cox himself, of the equity asserted by Chowning in his original bill filed in August 1812, and that Taylor contracted and intended to take on himself the hazard resulting from Chowning's claim. Taylor's will too, made in March 1814, clearly indicates his knowledge of Chowning's suit then in prosecution for the recovery of the land, and that his rights were to abide the result of that suit. Therefore, Taylor was no wise injured by, and had no just ground to complain of, Chowning's neglect to make him a party to his original bill. And he must be considered as having not only purchased, but as having also paid the purchase money, and taken his conveyance, with actual notice. He made the purchase at Cox's sale, with actual and exact knowledge of the power under which Cox professed to make the sale; that is, in other words, with full notice of Chowning's equity to redeem the land, notwithstanding the sale thus made without competent authority. He saw the authority under which his vendor was acting: it was his business to inquire and to ascertain, whether that authority was legal and sufficient to warrant the vendor

 663 in proceeding to sell; and he *must bear the consequences of his neglect to do so, or, if you please, of his ignorance of the principle of law which condemned Cox's proceedings. Chowning was passive, and there was no necessity that he should be otherwise. For the sale made by Cox, being made without lawful power to sell, could convey no just right to the vendee; and whether the title should remain in Cox, or be by him conveyed to the vendee, Chowning's right to redeem the subject would remain the same. Why should he be bound to interfere to prevent a sale, which no wise impaired his rights? Cox and Taylor, the unauthorized vendor and the negligent or wilful purchaser, were the actors, if indeed, it be material to determine which of the parties is to be considered as the actor. But, in truth, the cause depends on very simple principles: here was a mortgaged subject sold by the mortgagee, who had (acknowledgedly) no power to sell it, and purchased by a person who had exact notice of the power under which the sale was made, and who meant to take, and did take, the hazard of any defect in the power of the vendor; and the plain legal consequence is, that the mortgagor has, in equity, the same right to redeem as against the purchaser, which he had as against the mortgagee. The former decree of this court is decisive of the controversy. The court indeed declared, that "had Taylor been before the court, he might have given a different aspect to the cause." But how? by shewing, "that, though Cox's sale could not be justified on the sole ground of the powers derived from the deed, yet it ought to be confirmed in Taylor's favor, in consequence of the subsequent acts of Chowning." Now, certainly, Chowning has done no act whatever, subsequent to the sale, that can have the remotest tendency to the confirmation of it.

CARR, J. When the case of Chowning v. Cox (of which this is the sequel) was formerly before this court, I consider that the court decided a mere abstract principle. This is apparent from the whole 664 opinion. It commences thus: "This case presents the general question, whether a deed executed by a debtor, conveying land to his creditor, and purporting to constitute him the trustee for selling the land, and applying the proceeds of the sale to the payment of the debt due to himself, can be regarded otherwise than as a mere mortgage, to which the right of redemption is incident." Such a deed was decided to be a mortgage. But when the court came to apply the general principle to the case before it, it said, "If there were no other persons than the debtor and creditor interested, it would reverse the decree, and provide for a sale under the directions of the court of chancery. But the person who purchased under the former sale, and who has the legal title, has not been made a party. Had he been before the court, he might have given a different aspect to the cause. He might have shewn, that, although the sale cannot be justified on the sole ground of the powers derived from the deed yet, it ought to be confirmed in his favor, in consequence of the subsequent acts of the appellant. He ought, therefore, to have been a party, and the chancellor erred in pronouncing a final decree, without affording an opportunity to bring him before the court." The decree was therefore reversed, and the cause sent back.

It is thought, that by the words "the subsequent acts of the appellant," the court meant to limit the defence of the vendee to the acts of Chowning done after the sale. I do not believe the court meant any such restriction. It had said, in a prior sentence, that if the vendee had been a party, he might have given a different aspect to the cause; thus throwing the whole open to him. It proceeded afterwards to particularize one of the means by which this new aspect might be given; namely, by shewing Chowning's acts of confirmation or assent subsequent to the sale. But, suppose the vendee before the sale, had gone to Chowning, and said, "I see that Cox has advertised your land for sale; is it your purpose to suffer him (who is the creditor) to act also as the trustee? if so, I am inclined to buy:" and Chowning had answered, "Yes; you may buy safely:"

665 Can it be imagined, "that this court meant to shut out such a defence? Is it not a fundamental maxim, that no man shall be affected by res inter alios acta? Had not the court pronounced, that Chowning had done wrong in bringing this cause to hearing, without making the vendee, who had the legal title, a party? And would it enable him to profit by his own wrong? which he surely would do, if by omitting to make Taylor a party to his original bill, he could cut him off from a defence, which as an original party he would unquestionably have had. It is clear to me, then, that Taylor comes to his defence, wholly unprejudiced by what has been done; and free to avail himself of any matter of fact or law arising out of the old case or the new.

Taking the general principle to have been correctly decided by the court, we are to inquire, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the sale of the land made by Cox, shall stand or be set aside? That the parties to the deed intended to give Cox the full power to sell and convey the land, no body can doubt. They expressly swear, that such was their intention. Nor is this an unheard of thing: in the state of New York (as their reported cases shew us) nothing is more common than to give to the mortgagee a power of sale: and in such cases, if he is proceeding to sell, improperly, as the debtor thinks, he files his bill, stops the sale, and brings the matter into equity, just as the debtor does here in deeds of trust. In the case before us, it is the less strange that Mrs. Thompson should place so much confidence in Cox, as to make him the trustee, because he was not, in his individual character, the creditor: the answers and the deed itself declare, that it was the money of his wards, which he was lending out upon the security of this land. Chowning bought the land with a full knowledge of this incumbrance, and it was a part of his contract to discharge it. He went on to pay a part of the money; but failing to pay the rest, Cox advertised the land for sale. Chowning then filed a bill of injunction to stay the sale, on the ground of defect of title; but made no objection to Cox's selling as trustee. This injunction was dissolved: Cox again advertised to sell the land for cash, to discharge the incumbrance. The sale took place on the 29th May 1812, Chowning being present and making no objection. Taylor became the purchaser; and in August after, the original bill was filed to set the sale aside, not for unfairness, but because the deed was a mortgage, and the plaintiff had a right to be let in to redeem. I am clearly of opinion, that under all the circumstances, it would operate a cruel injustice to set aside the sale. This deed being in law a mortgage, we must presume, that Chowning knew it to be so; for every man is bound to know the law, and ignorance does not excuse. This is laid down in many cases. In Bilbie v. Lumley, 2 East, 471, the court said, "Every man must be taken to be conversant of the law. Otherwise there is no saying to what extent the excuse of ignorance might be carried. It would be urged in almost every case." But, besides the conclusion of law, we have the statement of the plaintiff in his original bill, that he did know this to be a mere mortgage: after describing the deed as having a power of sale, he says, "that at the time of entering into the said agreement [with Mrs. Thompson] your orator understood, that there was a mortgage on the said land, as evidenced by this indenture, and that it was nothing more." Possessing this knowledge, he made no objection in the first bill he filed, to a sale by Cox. Failing in that bill, he attended the sale; stood by, and saw an innocent purchaser buy and pay his money, and receive his deed, and made not one word of objection. The sale too, we are told by witnesses, was well attended, and conducted with perfect fairness. After this, can he be heard to object to this sale? It is not worth while to quote the cases which decide, that a man thus concealing his right shall be bound: they are too familiar. If we were even to say (contrary to the conclusion of law, and the statement of the bill) that Chowning did not know that this was a mere mortgage, and therefore was not guilty of fraudulent concealment, still I should be of opinion, that he could not succeed; for where equity is equal, the law must prevail; and here the vendee has the legal title, and far superior equity, since Chowning, to say the least, was guilty of gross negligence.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that the decree be reversed; that the sale of the land made by Cox to Taylor be confirmed, and so much of the bill as sought to set it aside, dismissed.

The other judges concurring, decree reversed.

Robertson v. Hogsheads.

March, 1832.

Chancery Practice—Contract—Rescission—Fraud—Case at Bar—Upon a bill in chancery by vendee against vendor of land, after the contract fully executed by conveyance of the land and securities given for the purchase money, alleging fraud practised by vendor's agents on the vendee, in the original agreement, and praying that the contract may be rescinded for the fraud, and general relief: the court having held, that plaintiff, under the circumstances of the case, was not entitled to a rescission of the contract, held further, that he was not entitled to ask, that the damages he had sustained by reason of the alleged fraud, should be ascertained by the court of chancery, and decreed to him, in abatement from the purchase money.

Same—Same—Jurisdiction to Decree for Breach.—A bill, in any form, claiming damages for breach of contract, cannot be entertained in equity: neither can unliquidated damages be set-off in equity.

In March 1824, James Robertson exhibited a bill against Thomas Hogshead, John Hogshead and James Cochran, in the superior court of chancery of Staunton, setting forth, that in the year 1817, Robertson made a contract with Thomas and John Hogshead, for the purchase of a parcel of 424 acres of land in Augusta, then belonging to their father, Michael Hogshead, for 6360 dollars, which was a high price,—Thomas and John, the sons, being the agents of Michael, the father, in making the sale. That Michael Hogshead, executed a conveyance of the land to Robertson son, *in December 1817, and very shortly afterwards died, having by his will, made in 1810, directed this same parcel of land to be sold, and appointed his sons, Thomas and John, his executors. That, after the death of Michael, the father, Robertson paid Thomas and John Hogshead 3000 dollars of the purchase money; and in May 1818, gave them his bonds for the balance, 3360 dollars, payable in long instalments, and executed a deed conveying the land to James Cochran, in trust, to secure the payment thereof. That Robertson had paid off some of the instalments, but a considerable balance was still due, and Thomas and John Hogshead were about to coerce the payment thereof, by a sale of the trust subject under the deed of trust. That before the contract for the sale and purchase of the land was concluded, Robertson made inquiries of Thomas and John Hogshead, to ascertain whether there was a sufficient supply of water upon it, for the use of a family, and of stock upon the farm, and as the only running water upon it flowed from a single spring, he inquired, particularly, whether that was a never failing spring, affording a sufficient supply of water at all seasons, declaring that he would not

Chancery Practice—Jurisdiction to Decree Damages.—In the principal case, in which a bill was filed by a vendee alleging fraud in the original agreement and praying that such agreement be rescinded for the fraud, the court held that the bill, so far as it related to the rescission, was never sustainable, and taking away that ground, there could be no propriety in filing a bill in equity for the purpose of obtaining compensation of damages. For this proposition, the principal case is cited in Campbell v. Rust, 85 Va. 668, 8 S. E. Rep. 664; Washington City Savings Bank v. Thornton, 83 Va. 165, 2 S. E. Rep. 193; *Cleaver v. purchase any land which had not the advantage of such a supply of water; upon which they assured him, that the spring was a never failing one, and furnished a plentiful supply of water, and that there was besides another smaller spring on the land, that contributed an additional supply, and rarely failed. That this was a wilful and fraudulent misrepresentation on their part, designed to induce him to make the purchase at a high price. That Robertson, having taken possession of the land, ascertained in the summer of 1818, that the water flowing from the larger spring was very much diminished, and that the smaller one afforded little or no water; and about the year 1819, the larger spring also failed almost intirely; and then he ascertained, that it had often failed in former years, before his purchase, and that Thomas and John Hogshead were well apprised of this fact, when they so positively and confidently assured *him of the contrary, in order to induce him to make the purchase. And for this fraud practised upon him by them, Robertson prayed, that his contract for the purchase of the land should be rescinded; that Thomas and John Hogshead should be compelled to refund him so much of the purchase money as he had already paid them, and to surrender his bonds for the balance, to be cancelled; that the trustee Cochran should be enjoined from proceeding to sell the land for the balance of the purchase money, under the deed of trust of May 1818; and general relief.

The defendants Thomas and John Hogshead, in their answer, denied the fraud imputed to them: they denied, that they made any such representation with respect to the springs, as that charged in the bill: they denied, that they were aware of the failure of the springs to furnish a sufficient supply of water, at any time previous to the sale: they denied that the springs had failed since the sale, in the manner, or in any thing like the degree, stated in the bill: and they imputed the bill to the depreciation of the value of the land, and of all other real property in that country, which alone, they said, rendered Robertson desirous to avoid his contract, and suggested to him the complaint of fraud alleged in the bill, as a pretext for rescinding it.

There was a great deal of evidence upon the contested questions of fact: what was the representation in fact made by the Hogsheads to Robertson, with respect to the springs? and what was the real state of them, in dry seasons, both before and after the contract? But whatever was the true state of the springs, it appeared in proof, that Robertson was fully apprised of it, partly by experience and partly by information from others, as early as 1819 or 1820, some four years before his bill was filed: and that in the course of that time, there was a great, general and continuing depreciation of landed property in that country. It also appeared, that Robertson, in 1819, sold and conveyed about an acre of the land.

670 *The chancellor, upon the hearing, dismissed the bill, without prejudice to any action at law which the plaintiff might institute, to recover damages for the fraud therein complained of. Robertson appealed to this court.

Johnson for the appellant, insisted, that the fraud complained of in the bill, was proved to have been practised by the Hogsheads upon Robertson; and that, considering the known scarcity of water in the particular tract of country where the land in question lies, and the importance universally and justly attached to an abundant or even a sufficient supply of water, this was such a fraud as ought to be redressed by rescinding the contract. Neither was the time which elapsed from the date of the contract till the filing of the bill, any sufficient reason for withholding such relief: for it was impossible for the purchaser, in one or two years, which might be years of peculiar drought, to know the permanent character of the springs: the experience of a course of years was necessary to ascertain, that the water always ceased to flow in the dry seasons of the year. But if the purchaser was not entitled to a decree rescinding the contract, he was entitled to damages for the injury he had sustained from the deceit practised upon him; he was entitled to an abatement of the price, proportioned to the diminution of the value of the land resulting from the defect of the supply of water. And the chancellor ought to have given him this relief, by directing an issue to ascertain the amount of injury, instead of turning him round to an action at law for redress, where he might encounter the bar of the statute of limitations.

Leigh, for the appellees, said, that supposing the allegations of the bill exactly and fully proved (which, however, he denied) it seemed to him impossible, without an utter disregard of the leading circumstances of the case, to listen to the claim to rescind the contract; and, in truth, the appellant had not so shaped his case, 671 that such relief could be *decreed to him—he had not made the heirs of the vendor parties. The contract was completely executed in the winter of 1817-18; the purchaser received his conveyance, took possession, paid near half the purchase money, and gave his bonds for the deferred payments, and a deed of trust of the property to secure them: in 1819 and 1820, according to his own shewing, he became apprised of the fraud practised upon him by the Hogsheads: yet he continued to pay the deferred instalments of the purchase money, without a breath of complaint, and to pay them to Thomas and John Hogshead, who (as he must have understood) were bound to dispose of the money as part of their father's estate. And then he waited till the property had depreciated to a fourth, perhaps a tythe, of its value at the time of the contract, or probably even at the time he discovered the fraud now complained of, before he preferred his bill to rescind the contract. As to the claim for the damages he has sustained by reason of the alleged misrepresentation with respect to the sufficiency of the springs, and their actual deficiency, he could only ask that relief, under the prayer for general relief; but if there had been a particular prayer for such relief, in the alternative, the court of chancery could not have given it; for a bill in equity would not lie for damages in such case, or, indeed, in any case.

CARR, J. I think the decree in this case intirely correct. Taking up the case, either upon the bill and answer, or upon the whole evidence, there is no ground furnished for a rescission of the contract, in any stage; but after it was executed by the giving and receiving a deed, taking possession, paying good part of the purchase money, executing bonds for the balance, and a deed of trust to secure the payment, there is not the shadow of a cause for rescission; more especially as the purchaser acquiesced upwards of four years after the fraud (if there was one) was known to him, during which time a great change had taken place throughout the country, affecting deeply the value of lands; and most 672 *especially, after he had sold part of the land. The bill, then, so far as it related to the main end of it, was never sustainable; and taking away that ground, there could be no propriety in filing a bill in equity, for the sole purpose of obtaining compensation in damages for an alleged fraud, and to tie up a part of the purchase money until these damages were liquidated. This is law too well settled to require that I should cite cases to support it. Upon the subject of the fraud charged, I do not choose to pronounce an opinion. The appellant having a right to sue at law for it, ought to go before that tribunal, without prejudice from an intimation of opinion by this court; and the appellees have an equal right not to be prejudged on that point.

CABELL, J. I intirely approve the decree.

TUCKER, P. It is obvious, that no rescission of the contract could have been decreed, or properly asked for, in this case. If the conduct of the purchaser—his delay, his acquiescence, and his sale of part of the land—were not conclusive against the right to rescind in any form in which the bill might have been filed, it is certain, no such right could have been enforced in the form in which this bill has been framed. In the question of rescission, the heirs of Michael Hogshead, the actual vendor, have a deep interest. Whether Thomas and John Hogshead are the heirs and the only heirs of their father, does not appear. Even if they be, they are not made parties in that character. Had the facts of the case justified a rescission, a re-conveyance by the purchaser to Michael's heirs must have been decreed. But as the court knows not who they are, and as they are not before it, this could not have been done: for, peradventure, they might have been interested in resisting the rescission, and might have been more fortunate in combating the pretensions on which it was asked.

As the form of the proceeding, then, excludes the possibility of rescission, the bill can only be looked on as a bill

been settled by an issue to be directed by the court. But it has been long settled that unliquidated damages cannot be set-off in equity. Duncan v. Lyon, 3 Johns. C. R. 351; Livingston v. Livingston, 4 Id. 287; Webster v. Couch, 6 Rand. 519. The party aggrieved should have instituted the proper proceedings and ascertained his damages, before he attempted to arrest the payment of the instalment of the purchase money remaining due. Were a contrary practice allowed, an instalment of 3000 might be tied up, though the damages might eventually be only as many cents, or nothing.

Moreover, I take it, a bill for damages only will not lie in equity. The court could only ascertain those damages by sending the case to a court of law. To that court, therefore, the party should apply, instead of clogging the litigation by a suit in equity, which could only end where he ought to have begun. Would it be just (even though the fraud be established) that the defendants should be charged with the costs of this unnecessary proceeding? I think not. Had an issue been directed, and found for the plaintiff, surely the plaintiff ought to be charged with the additional costs unnecessarily incurred by going through the court of chancery to get into the court of law; since he might at once have got into the court of law by issuing his writ for the deceit.

It is no answer to this view of the case, that the answer of the defendant might have been important: the case is not placed on that ground, nor do the facts justify its being now assumed; for there seems to be no deficiency of evidence as to the facts that really occurred in the transaction.

Whether the statute of limitations will bar any action at law which the appellant may now bring, it would be premature to say. But, though this inconvenience should follow, it ought not to lead the court to establish a precedent sustaining a mere action for damages in equity. Such a 674 *proceeding has been questioned even in a suit for specific performance, where the defendant, after the bill was filed, had disabled himself to perform, and has been distinctly reprobated, where he had so disabled himself before filing the bill, and the plaintiff knew of the fact before he commenced the suit; for, says chancellor Kent, "the case is then reduced to that of a bill filed for the sole purpose of assessing damages for a breach of contract, which is a matter strictly legal and not of equitable jurisdiction"—"If this court is to sustain such a bill, I do not see why it might not equally sustain one in every other case sounding in damages and cognizable at law." Kempshall v. Stone, 5 Johns. C. R. 193. In Gwillim v. Stone, 14 Ves. 128, the bill as to the damages was dismissed, though the court exercised its jurisdiction in directing the contract to be delivered up. In the case at bar, as I have already shewn, the bill is, in effect, a bill for damages only. See also the commentary in Todd v. Gee, 17 Ves. 273, upon the case of Denton v. Stewart, Id. 276, in notis.

Decree affirmed.

675 *Carpenter and Others v. Sims.

May, 1882.

Roads—Petition—Failure to State Purpose of Road—Waiver of Objection.—Tho' authority is given to the county courts to open only such new roads as may be wanting for a public right of way to some one or more of the places mentioned by the statute, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 236, § 1, yet the purpose for which the road is wanting, need not be stated in the petition of the applicant, if it appear in any other part of the record, or be proved to the court; and if this was a defect in the petition, the party opposed to the application having appeared, and prayed an ad quod damnum, waived the objection.

Same—Inquest—When Notice of Need Not Be Given.—The party opposed to opening a new road, appears and prays an ad quod damnum, which the court awards, and appoints a day for holding the inquest; the defendant shall be presumed to be present in court at the time the writ is awarded and the day of inquest appointed; so that the sheriff need not give him notice of the day of holding the inquest.

Same—Authority of Court to Erect Gates across.—The authority of the county courts to allow gates to be erected on a public road, to save fencing to the owners of lands thro' which the road passes, applies to cases of roads already established; the courts have no authority to order gates to be erected on a road ordered to be opened, to save the county the expense of making compensation to the owners for the additional fencing which such new road will render necessary.

Sims made application to the county court of Madison, to have a new road opened "from Michael Utz's to Hughes' river" in that county, without alleging, that the way was wanted for the convenience of travelling to any of the places mentioned by the statute concerning roads and landings, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 236, § 1, p. 233.† And thereupon, the court appointed viewers, to view the proposed road, and to report to the court, the conveniences and inconveniences, as well public as private, that would result from opening and establishing the same.

676 *The viewers reported, that the road was proposed to be opened "from Michael Utz's to the main road near Hughes' river," through the lands of one Mrs. Klugh, and of the German Lutheran Church, describing its course very exactly; that the opening of the road could produce injury to no other persons, and Mrs. Klugh had no objection to the opening of it through her land; that the road would be a great convenience to the petitioner, Sims, to the neighbourhood, and to the public generally (without stating for what purpose); and that they had also viewed the way along which the present road passed, and were of opinion, that it would be impracticable to make it passable for loaded wagons.

This report of the viewers being returned, the court ordered Mrs. Klugh and Carpenter and others, trustees of the German Luth-

Roads—Petition—Failure to State Purpose of Road—Waiver of Objection.—On this question the principal case is cited in foot-note to Lewis v. Washington, 5 Gratt 265: Jeter v. Board, 27 Gratt. 916.

†The statute provides, "That where any person or persons shall make application to any county court, to have a new road opened, or a former one altered, within their county, for the convenience of travelling to their county court house, to any public warehouse, landing, ferry, mill, coal mines, lead or iron works, or to the seat of government," the county court "shall appoint three or more fit persons, to be sworn before a justice of the peace, to view the ground along which such road is proposed to be conducted, and to report, truly and impartially the conveniences and inconveniences, that will result as well to individuals as to the public. If such way shall be opened" &c.—Note in Original Edition.

erans to be summoned to shew cause against the opening of the proposed road. The trustees, Carpenter and others, appeared to contest the opening of it through their land; and upon their motion, the court, in pursuance of the statute, Id. § 2, awarded a writ of ad quod damnum, to be executed on a particular day appointed in the order.

The sheriff proceeded to execute the writ on the appointed day, without giving the trustees, Carpenter and others, any previous notice of the time of holding the inquest. And a jury, regularly impaneled and sworn, by their inquisition found, that the proposed road, if opened thirty feet wide, would occupy four acres of the land of the German Lutherans, which they valued at 24 dollars, and would require additional fencing there, estimated at 150 dollars: that, if the road should be opened only fifteen feet wide, it would occupy only two acres, worth 12 dollars: that a road fifteen feet wide, with three gates erected, would be sufficient and satisfactory to the petitioner, Sims, and all others interested in the road, the cost of which gates they estimated at five dollars each, and by the erection of the gates, no additional fencing would be necessary: that the opening of the 677 "proposed road would afford the petitioner, and many others of the neighbourhood, the only way to their nearest meeting house and merchant mill: and that the plantation [of the German Lutherans] would not be injured, in the least, by opening the road.

Upon the return of this inquisition, Carpenter and others, the trustees for the German Lutherans, moved the court to quash it; but the court overruled the motion. And then, upon a hearing of the parties, and of the evidence upon both sides, the court was of opinion, that the road ought not to be opened and established, and therefore dismissed the petition. Sims appealed to the circuit court.

There, the witnesses for both parties were again examined; but, neither party desiring it, the testimony was not stated on the record, according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 64, § 18, p. 194. The circuit court was of opinion, that the county court erred in refusing to open and establish the road, according to the terms of the inquisition of the jury; and, therefore, reversed the order of the county court; and, proceeding to make such order as the county court ought to have made, ordered, that the road should be opened and established from Utz's along the course proposed, through the lands of Mrs. Klugh and of the German Lutherans, to the main road near Hughes' river; and that the several sums found in the inquisition, as an equivalent for the land condemned for the road, and for the necessary gates (if they should be allowed by the county court, being summoned for the purpose*) or for the fencing, should be

*The statute 2 Rev. Code, ch. 236, § 21, p. 240, authorizes "the county courts, when they shall deem it necessary, to permit gates to be erected across any roads in their respective counties, which shall not be turnpiked nor used for the transportation of public mails: and such gates to discontinue, at pleasure: provided, that no such permission shall be granted by any court, except upon application levied for, and paid to, the trustees of the German Lutherans.

678 *The trustees, Carpenter and others, applied to this court for a supersedeas to the order of the circuit court; which was allowed.

In the argument by Stanard, for the plaintiffs in error, and Briggs for the defendant, Stanard made three objections to the proceedings, and the order of the circuit court founded thereon.

1st Obj. The statute gives the county courts jurisdiction to open new roads through the lands of individual proprietors, only when such roads are wanted for the convenience of travelling to some of the places specified in the statute; and Sims, in his application for the road in question, did not allege that it was wanted for any of those purposes: therefore, the county court ought not to have appointed the viewers, and the proceeding was erroneous in the very first step.

Ans. The objection comes too late. Besides, though the statute gives the authority to open new roads only for the purposes therein specified, and the county courts ought not to open such roads, unless it appear that they are wanted for such purposes; yet, it is not required, that the applicant shall state the purpose in his petition. It is enough if he make it appear to the court by proof. Here, the purpose does appear on the record: the inquisition of the jury finds, that the proposed road would afford the petitioner, and many others in the neighbourhood, the only way to their nearest meeting house and merchant mill.

Reply. The writ of ad quod damnum gave the jury no charge to make inquiry upon that point: therefore, that finding in the inquisition was, at most, only an ex parte affidavit of the jurors, which was not evidence.

2nd Obj. The sheriff did not give notice to the parties, through whose land the road was to be opened, of the time of holding the inquest; which the statute expressly requires, and that, notwithstanding the writ of ad quod damnum is awarded always at the instance of the party whose 679 land is *to be condemned for the way, and the court is required to appoint a day for the execution of the writ. 2 Rev. Code, ch. 236, § 2. It does not follow, that the party who prays the writ, is present in court in person.

Ans. If the parties have notice of the time of executing the writ, it is immaterial how it is given to them. Here the parties appeared to contest the opening of the road, and prayed the writ of ad quod damnum; and it must be presumed, that it was ordered in their presence, in open court, to be executed on the particular day appointed in the order. And the writ was executed on the day appointed. The statute requires the sheriff to give notice to the proprietors of the land, only in case they are not present in court, at the time of the order made for the writ of ad quod damnum.

previously entered of record, and then only when a majority of the acting magistrates of such county shall concur therein, the whole number having been, by order of such court, previously summoned for that purpose."—Note in Original Edition.

3rd Obj. The 21st section of the statute giving power to the county courts to permit gates to be erected across public roads, and to revoke the permission at pleasure, relates to roads already established, where the proprietor has been compensated for the land appropriated to the way, and for the additional fencing, which the court may, at its pleasure, put him under the necessity of keeping up. The power is given, obviously, to be exercised only at the instance of the proprietor of the land, to save fencing. The court, in opening a new road, cannot, in order to spare the county the expense of making compensation for the additional fencing which the proprietor of the land may, at any time, and at the pleasure of the court, be obliged to keep up, order gates to be erected. The order of the circuit court, to open the road, and then to levy, and pay to the proprietors, the estimated expense of the fencing, or of the necessary gates, if allowed, is with respect to the latter alternative, wrong in principle. This alternative also makes the order uncertain, conditional and interlocutory.

Ans. This is a point in which Sims and the other persons who want this new road, have no interest: it is a question between the plaintiffs in error and the 680 county. Therefore, *if the order is right in other respects, but must in this particular be corrected, the defendant in error must still have his costs, as being the party substantially prevailing in this court.

BROOKE, J. The objection taken by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, that Sim's application for the road, did not designate either of the places, to which, by the statute, he was entitled to have a way opened, is obviated by the motion made by the plaintiffs in error, for a writ of ad quod damnum to ascertain the damages they would sustain by the opening of the proposed road, without making this objection to the terms of the application; especially, as the report of the viewers describes the proposed road as terminating in the main road near Hughes' river, which main road must be presumed to lead to some of the places designated by the statute, and the inquisition of the jury, states the proposed road to be the only way to a merchant mill.

The county court erred in refusing to open the road. But the order of the circuit court was also erroneous, in so much as it provides, that gates may be established by the county court. That part of the inquisition of the jury which relates to the erection of gates, was mere surplusage.

Therefore, both the order of the circuit court, and that of the county court, were reversed; and this court proceeding to make such order as the circuit court ought to have made, ordered, that the road should be opened and established, thirty feet wide, from and to the points, and along the course, designated in the report of the viewers, and that the sums of 24 dollars for the land condemned for the road, and 150 dollars for the extra fencing, should be levied by the county court for, and paid to, the plaintiffs in error; and that the defendant in error should recover of the plaintiffs in error, his costs in prosecuting his petition in the county court, and his costs expended in his defence upon the supersedeas in the circuit court. But the court gave the plaintiffs in error their costs in this court.

681 *Stanard v. Timberlake.

May, 1832.

Forthcoming Bond*—Confession of Judgment*—Effect.—A confession of judgment on a forthcoming bond is a release of all errors in the previous proceedings.

Timberlake having recovered a judgment against Stanard, for debt and costs in the county court of Spottsylvania, sued out a writ of fieri facias thereon, which was returned nulla bona: and thirteen years after the return of that execution, without any proceeding in the interval, he sued out a capias ad respondendum on the judgment; which being served on Stanard, he delivered property to the sheriff in discharge of his body, and gave a forthcoming bond for the delivery of it at the day and place appointed for the sale thereof. Stanard then moved the county court to quash this execution, on the ground, that after such a lapse of time, without any proceeding on the judgment, no execution could regularly be sued out: the court overruled the motion. Afterwards, the forthcoming bond having been returned forfeited, Stanard confessed judgment upon the bond, and the court awarded execution upon it. Then Stanard applied for a supersedeas from the circuit court to the order of the county court overruling his motion to quash the execution; which was allowed: but the circuit court affirmed the judgment. And then he applied to this court for a supersedeas to the judgment of the circuit court; which was allowed.

Briggs, for plaintiff in error.

Stanard, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. The case of Edmonds v. Green, 1 Rand. 44, is in point and decisive. The confession of judgment on the forthcoming bond, was a release of all previous errors in the proceedings, if any there were. Judgment affirmed.

Depositions—De Bene Esse—Infirm Witness—Proof of Inability to Attend.—Plaintiff having taken the deposition of an aged and infirm witness to be read de bene esse, fails to take out a subpoena and have it served on the witness to attend at the trial: yet HELD, that upon satisfactory proof of the witness's inability to attend the trial by reason of ill health, the deposition shall be read—Dissentiente BROOKE, J.

Same—Same—Same—Hearsay Evidence of Inability to Attend;—Quere.—Whether upon the question of the witness's inability to attend in such case, hearsay evidence as to the state of his health may properly be heard by the court?

Executors—Assent to Particular Estate—Effect upon Limitation Over.—Testator bequeaths a slave to an infant son, and then that his wife shall hold the slave bequeathed to his son till he shall attain to full age; the ex'or delivers the slave to the wife, and never resumes possession: HELD, this is an assent of the ex'or to the legacy to the son, and that whether the will be understood to give a present estate in the slave to the son, with a direction that the wife shall hold it for him, or an estate to the wife during the minority of the son with remainder to the son.

Statute of Limitations.—Infants.—The act of limitations never could begin to run against the claim and title of the son to the slave and her increase, till he attained to full age.

Detinue.—Proof.—If in detinue for chattels, the plaintiff prove that he had title at the time of the action brought, and that defendant then had the possession, defendant to defeat the action must shew that he had been divested of the property by due course of law.

Detinue for four slaves, brought in May 1819, by Thomas against Lynch, in the circuit court of Henrico. Declaration in the usual form. Plea, the general issue. At the trial, Lynch filed two bills of exceptions to opinions of the court.

1. The plaintiff offered in evidence, the deposition of one Wilson, which had been taken under a commission, de bene esse. The notice, on which the deposition was taken, informed the defendant, that it would be taken at &c. on the 16th April 1824, between the hours of nine in the morning and sunset of that day, and if that should not be a fair day, or the witness should be unable to attend on that day, then at the same place, and between the same hours of the next day: the caption of the deposition stated, that it was taken at the place and on the day appointed "pursuant to the notice," but it nowise appeared, that it was taken between *the

683 hours of the day specified in the notice, or that that was a fair day. No subpoena had been taken out to require the attendance of the deponent Wilson, at this trial: it appeared, that he had attended as a witness in the cause, at the preceding term; and to prove his inability to attend at this, the plaintiff proved, by a witness present in court, that Wilson was about

SAMUELS, J., says: "If necessary for the decision of this case, it might be a question how far the assent to the legacy for life of the slaves to Mrs. Johnson enured to the benefit of the slaves who were to be manumitted at her death: whether the assent to the legacy for life should be regarded as an assent to the ulterior disposition of the property. See Bishop's Ex'or v. Bishop, 2 Leigh 484; Lynch v. Thomas, 3 Leigh 682; Nicholas v. Burruss, 4 Leigh 289. In the opinion of a majority of the court it is not necessary for the decision of this case to pass on the question. I content myself, therefore, with a reference to these cases on the subject."

seventy years old; that his residence was about a hundred miles distant from Richmond, where the circuit court was held; that sixteen days before the trial, Wilson rode on horseback to the house of the witness, about two miles from his own; that he was then sick with a bilious fever; that the witness had since heard from a neighbour, that he was more unwell; and that, in the witness's opinion, if he had rode to Richmond, he would never have been able to return, by reason of his sickness, age and infirmity. The defendant's counsel objected to the reading of Wilson's deposition: the court overruled the objection, and admitted the evidence: and they excepted to the opinion.

2. The plaintiff, to prove his property in the slaves in question (a woman named Tabb and her three children) gave in evidence the will of his father, John Thomas, who died in 1796; whereby the testator bequeathed to the plaintiff, the woman Tabb and her increase, and other slaves to other sons; and then bequeathed, that his wife should hold the slaves bequeathed to his sons, till they should attain to full age. And the plaintiff adduced evidence, that he was born in 1794 [so that he attained to his full age in 1815]; that the executor of his father, the testator, shortly after his death, delivered the woman Tabb to the plaintiff's mother, who died in 1815; and that, shortly before this action was brought, the defendant Lynch was in possession of the woman Tabb and her three children, in the declaration mentioned and demanded. Whereupon, the plaintiff's counsel prayed the court to charge and instruct the jury,

1. That the statute of limitations "never began to run during the plaintiff's minority," and if five years had not elapsed

684 since "he attained to full age, and before this action was commenced, that statute was not a bar to his action. 2. That, if the executor of the plaintiff's father consented, that the plaintiff's mother should take into her possession the woman Tabb, bequeathed by the testator's will to the plaintiff, and the mother accordingly took possession, then the legal title of Tabb was so vested in the mother, as to enable the plaintiff, when he attained to his full age, to maintain this action for Tabb and her increase, as bequeathed by his father's will to the plaintiff, though the slaves had never been actually in his possession. And 3. That if the jury should find, that at the time this action was brought, the right to the slaves in question was in the plaintiff, and that the defendant then had the possession of the slaves, the defendant to defeat the action must shew that he had been divested of the property in due course of law. The court gave these instructions to the jury, in the words in which they were prayed; and the defendant's counsel excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff; from which the defendant appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Stanard for the appellant, and by Daniel for the appellee: but the reporter was not in court at the time, and no note of the argument was preserved.

CARR, J. The first question is, as to the admission of Wilson's deposition taken de bene esse. It was contended, 1. that no subpoena having been served on the witness, this was an absolute and peremptory objection to reading the deposition, and disabled the party from going into evidence, to prove that the witness was unable to attend; and if not, 2. that he failed in his proof of the inability of the witness to attend, and therefore could not read the deposition. I consider the first position as contrary both to the reason and the law of the case. In jury trials, the general rule is, that the testimony of witnesses 685 shall be given in viva voce. To *compel their attendance, a subpoena issues; but there are many causes, which may render this process ineffectual: the witness may be beyond its reach, or he may be utterly unable to attend; and it would be unjust, that, owing to such accidents, the party should be deprived of his evidence. Therefore, the law has provided, that when a witness, by age, sickness, or otherwise, shall be unable to attend the court, upon affidavit &c. the clerk may, on request of either party award a commission for taking the deposition of such witness de bene esse, to be read as evidence at the trial, in case the witness should be unable to attend. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 131, § 15, p. 519. Here we see the remedy plainly provided: if the witness be unable to attend, the deposition may be read. Of the fact of inability, the court must judge upon the proofs. The court is not confined to any particular kind of proof. How, then, can it be said, that a subpoena must issue, and that without it, no other proof can establish the inability? Is there any special virtue in that process? If it be served on a man bedridden for years, can he obey? Or will the service of it furnish proof of his inability, superior to all other? So far from it, this court decided, in Minnis v. Echols, 3 Hen. & Munf. 31, that the mere return of a subpoena duly executed was not sufficient proof of inability. And, surely, if not itself proof of that fact, it cannot be necessary to resort to it, in order to let in that which is proof. It is clear to me, then, that the first objection has no weight. But was there sufficient proof before the court, to justify it in admitting the deposition? In Collins v. Lowry, 2 Wash. 75, it was decided (and very properly) that hearsay evidence that the deponent has left the country, and has not returned, is not sufficient to authorize the reading his deposition; in Minnis v. Echols, that the service of a subpoena will not do, but it must be proved, that the witness is dead, or if living, unable to attend; and in Butts v. Blunt, 1 Rand. 255, that depositions ought not to be read in a suit at law, unless it appear that the witness could not attend at the 686 trial. We see, then, both by the *statute and the decisions upon it, that to authorize the reading of the deposition, nothing more is necessary than that the witness should be unable to attend; nor is any higher or more cogent proof required to establish this than any other fact. Now, throwing out of view, the hearsay in this case, as to the continuance and increase of the deponent Wilson's sickness (though I do not mean to say, that, on this incidental question, addressed to the discretion of the court, it could not hear such evidence, and give it the weight, which, in connexion with the other proof, it might think it deserved) I think the facts proved fully sustained the court in considering that Wilson was unable to attend, and permitting the deposition to be read; it being, in my opinion, regularly taken in all respects.

The next point I shall notice is the exception to the opinion of the court, as to the assent of the executor to the legacy of the slaves in question to the plaintiff. It was contended, that the instruction given to the jury on this point, was glaringly incorrect; that under it, the bare permission of the executor to the widow, to take possession of the slave, though but for a day, and by whatever condition qualified, would prove assent, and so vest the legal title, that it could not afterwards be recalled or contradicted. If I understood the opinion thus broadly, I should agree with the appellant's counsel, that it was incorrect: but I do not so understand it. To judge of it fairly, we must take it in connexion with the context, and according to the subject matter; first the will; then, the proof going to shew assent by delivery under the will; and then the motion to instruct. Thus taken, I think it may be fairly understood, as telling the jury, that the possession to the mother to take possession of the slave, without more, was such an assent as enabled the son at his full age, to sue for the property. Taking it in this extent, was the instruction correct? With respect to what shall constitute the assent of an executor to a legacy, the law has prescribed no specific form: a very slight assent is held sufficient; and it may be either

687 express or implied, absolute *or conditional. He may, not only in direct terms authorize the legatee to take possession, but his assent may be inferred, either from indirect expressions, or particular acts, and such constructive permission will be equally available. His assent may be implied: as, if the executor congratulate the legatee on his legacy; or, if a horse is bequeathed to A. and the executor requests him to dispose of it; or if B. propose to buy the horse of the executor, and he direct him to buy it of A. or if the executor himself purchase the horse of A. or merely offer money for it; either of these amounts to an assent, by implication, to the legacy. The assent may be absolute or conditional; but if conditional, the condition must be precedent: as where an executor assents to the devise of a term, if the devisee will pay the rent in arrear at the testator's death; the condition must be performed, or there is no assent. But assent upon a subsequent condition, as, provided the legatee pay the executor a certain sum annually, is void as to the condition; for, though the state of the fund may authorize the executor to withhold the legacy, or to impose a condition precedent to his paying it, yet if he once part with it, he has no right to clog it with future stipulations, and thus make the legacy conditional, which the testator gave absolutely. Toller's law of ex'ors, Book 2, ch. 4, § 2, p. 306-312, and the authorities there cited. It was said, that though he might assent to the particular interest of the mother in the slaves, that would not enure to the son, so as to vest his title. Without stopping to inquire whether the will gives the mother any separate estate in the slaves, and taking it to be so, I answer, that the assent to the particular interest does operate as an assent to the bequest over. Thus, if a term be devised to A. for life, remainder to B. the assent of the executor to the devise to A. shall operate as an assent to the devise over to B. and vest his interest. So, also, if there be a devise of a term to a widow, so long as she continues unmarried, and if she marry, then of a rent payable out of the land; the executor's assent to the devise of the 688 term, is *an assent to that of the rent, in case of the devisee's marriage. Toller, p. 309, 10; Com. Dig. Administration, C. b, 1 Roll's Abr. 620; Plowd. 545; Lampet's case, 10 Co. 47, b; Adams v. Price, 3 P. Wms. 11. These authorities seem to me to sustain the instruction on this point completely.

As to the other instructions, I shall content myself with saying, that I see nothing to disapprove in them.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

BROOKE, J. There are two points in this case, on which I differ from the judge who has preceded me.

I do not think, that the deposition of Wilson taken de bene esse, was admissible evidence, on the proof adduced by the plaintiff, of his incapacity to attend. It is a fact stated in the bill of exceptions, that he had attended at the preceding term, when summoned, I presume, since it is not said that he attended of his own accord. The defendant was entitled to have him examined viva voce, in open court, where he might be cross examined by counsel, in the presence of the jury; and, in excepting to the reading of his deposition, he put the onus on the plaintiff to shew, that every thing had been done, required by the law to compel his attendance, and that he was unable to attend. The first thing required by the law was, that a subpoena should have been served on the witness, to fix on him the obligation to attend. Without this, he is not called on to excuse himself for not attending. I admit, that a case may be stated, in which previous and permanent disability to attend would render it superfluous to summon the witness: but that is not the case before the court. To lay a proper foundation for the excuse offered by the plaintiff, for his failing to attend, a subpoena served on him to oblige him to attend, if able, ought not to have been dispensed with. But what was the evidence of his inability to attend? It was proved by a witness who resided two miles from him, that the witness had seen him about sixteen days before the trial; that he 689 *rode to the witness's house on horseback, that he was then sick with a bilious fever (not very sick, it must be presumed, or he would not have been on horseback two miles from home); that he was seventy years old; and that his residence was a hundred miles distant. I put out of the case what the witness had heard, on the authority of Collins v. Lowry, 2 Wash. 75, and also the opinion of the witness, that, if he had attended on this trial, he would never have returned. I know that questions of this sort are addressed to the discretion of the court; but it is to a discretion, that does not listen to the opinions of witnesses, unless they are professional opinions; which was not the case here. Then, the whole of the evidence was, that the deponent was sick sixteen days before the trial, riding on horseback, two miles from his home; that he was about seventy years of age; and that he had attended the court at the preceding term. On what ground it was inferred from these facts, when it did not appear that he was under any legal obligation to attend, by the service of a subpoena on him, that he was unable to attend on this trial, I am at a loss to conjecture. It could not be inferred from the circumstance, that he was sick, but on horseback, two miles from his home sixteen days before, nor from his age, because, if so, in every like case, a party may be deprived of the viva voce testimony of a witness, in the presence of a jury, which, in many cases, is of the utmost importance in the trial of a cause. On this point, then, I think the judgment ought to be reversed.

The other point on which I differ, is, the instruction of the judge to the jury, that, in this action, the statute of limitations never began to run during the minority of the plaintiff &c. Now, on what facts in the bill of exceptions, this instruction was given, I am utterly unable to perceive. It is the settled rule of this court, that if the facts stated in a bill of exceptions be so imperfectly stated, that the court cannot discover how the case ought to be decided, the judgment should be reversed.

690 Barrett & Co. v. Tazewell, *1 Call, 215; Beattie v. Tabb's adm'r, 2 Munf. 254. This instruction implies, that the statute of limitations had begun to run at some time, but not in the minority of the plaintiff. Though it did not begin to run in his minority, it may have begun to run, in the lifetime of his mother, the tenant for life; and if so, was not affected by the minority of the plaintiff; as it is a settled rule, that if the statute of limitations legally begins to run, there is no incapacity afterwards, that can stop it. The fact stated in the bill of exceptions, that the defendant was in possession of the slaves in question, shortly before the institution of the suit, gives no light on this point; because it does not negative his possession in the lifetime of the tenant for life. The omission to state the facts, on which the instruction was given, brings it within the cases cited. But the instruction assumes a fact which ought to have been left to the jury: the time when the statute began to run, depended on the adverse possession of the defendant, and of those under whom he might claim. To tell the jury, that it did not begin to run in the minority of the plaintiff, was to tell them, that the possession of the defendant did not commence before that period; and there is no evidence stated, on which even the jury could find that fact. If the judge had not assumed it, it could not be inferred from the fact stated, that the defendant was in possession of the slaves, shortly before the institution of the suit. On this point, also, I think the judgment ought to be reversed.

TUCKER, P. I am of opinion, that there is no error in the proceedings of the circuit court.

It was, in the first place, contended, that Wilson's deposition was improperly admitted at the trial; both because of its intrinsic irregularity, and because a proper foundation was not laid for the introduction of it. These objections appear to me to be groundless.

The deposition was taken on the day, and at the place, fixed by the notice. It was objected, that it does not appear 691 *to have been taken within the hours specially appointed, and that the notice having intimated that it would not be taken if the day was unfair, the fairness of the day should also have appeared. These objections, it must be admitted, are very nice. They do not seem insurmountable. The caption of the deposition, which must be regarded as the act of the magistrates, certifies that it was taken in pursuance of the notice: and their certificate of this fact is conclusive. Moreover, as to the fairness of the day, that was not necessary to be certified, since the deposition was fixed for the 16th April 1824, when it was taken; and the notice only provided, that if it proved unfair, the deposition would be taken the next day. Had it not been taken till the next day, then, indeed, it must have appeared that the first day was unfair.

It seems to have been supposed, that a deposition taken de bene esse, could not be read, unless the witness had been summoned. I myself thought there had been such a decision: but there has been none such in our courts. My impression had been derived, I am sure, from the two cases of Penn's lessee v. Ingraham, 2 Wash. C. C. R. 487, and Banert's lessee v. Day, 3 Id. 243. On examination, however, even those do not seem to consider the subpoena as indispensable. It would have been strange, if such an opinion should have prevailed under our statute, which authorizes the deposition to be read if the witness be unable to attend. Why should that fact be held to be susceptible of proof in no other way but by a subpoena returned executed? So far from entertaining such an opinion, our courts have expressly decided, that a return of a subpoena duly executed, is not sufficient to establish the witness's inability to attend; as well indeed they might decide, upon testimony so equivocal. They call, therefore, for extrinsic proof; which, if satisfactory of the fact of inability, brings the case within the statute. Suppose the witness was eighty years of age, palsied and bedridden for years: of what service would the subpoena be? It 692 surely could not be necessary *to fortify the conviction, that the attendance of the witness could not be had. In this case, the witness was seventy years old; his residence a hundred miles distant: sixteen days before the trial, another witness in the cause had seen him. He was then riding out, it is true, two miles from home, but he had then, a bilious fever (an intermittent, I presume). Afterwards, this witness heard from his neighbours, that he was more unwell; and, in the opinion of the witness on oath, if he had come to court, his age, sickness, and infirmity would have prevented his returning. These facts appear to me to require no comment. The judge fairly concluded, that the witness was unable to attend, and, therefore, admitted the deposition to be read.

The other complaints of the appellant grow out of the instructions given by the court to the jury, at the trial. They have been ingeniously and rigorously criticised; but, I think, they were substantially correct. They arose out of the character of the plaintiff's title, and the defendant's possession.

The plaintiff claimed the slaves under his father's will. By that will, they were specifically bequeathed to him; but the testator declared it to be his desire, that his mother should hold them, until he attained to full age. He was born in 1794; attained his full age in 1815, in which year also his mother died; and he sued for the slaves in May 1819. As, however, the assent of the executor of his father to his legacy, was essential to complete his legal title, and to enable him to sue, the fact of that assent was a material point in the action brought by him, and was attempted to be sustained by proving that his mother received possession from the executor. Upon the trial, he introduced evidence to establish the facts above succinctly stated, and then moved the court for three instructions.

The first was as to the statute of limitations. It must be understood secundum subjectam materiam. It cannot fairly be construed to refer to any other person than the infant himself; and if so, the instruction was not erroneous; *for the statute could not commence running against him, until he attained his full age.

The second instruction was as to the assent of the executor. Whatever doubts have been expressed on the subject of actions at law for money legacies, by legatees against the executor himself, no reasonable doubt can be entertained of the right of the legatee to sue a third person for a specific legacy, when the executor has completed his legal title to it, by assent and delivery of possession. In this case, therefore, the plaintiff, having produced proof going to establish the fact, that the executor had assented to the legacy of the female slave being delivered to his mother, under the will, and that she accordingly took possession, moved the court to instruct the jury, that the legal property in the slave became thereby so vested in the mother, as to entitle him to sue, although he never had himself the actual possession. It is perfectly clear, quacunqve via data, that the assent of the executor, and delivery of the possession of the property to the mother, under the will, enured to complete the plaintiff's legal title. For, if the possession which the will directed the mother to hold till his maturity, was designed to be in right of her son, then the assent of the executor, to her taking possession under the will, was an express assent to the son's legacy; and ipso facto invested him with a complete title, if the testator had good title. On the other hand, if the possession bequeathed to the mother was in her own right, then she had an estate in the chattel for years, with remainder to the son forever: and it seems to be well established that an assent of the executor to the first taker's possession and enjoyment of the legacy, is an assent to the legacy to the remainderman. Toller's law of ex'ors, book 2, ch. 4, § 2, and the authorities there cited. See also 4 Bac. Abr. Legacies, L. p. 445; Bishop's ex'or v. Bishop, 2 Leigh, 487. Now, although the instruction moved for, and assented to by the court, was not asked in the most appropriate terms, yet I see nothing in it, of which the defendant can complain.

694 It might have been more explicit *as to the plaintiff's rights, but certainly does not carry them too far. It cannot be denied, indeed, that the assent of an executor may be limited or qualified or clogged with conditions, which his own security, or the situation of the estate, may require; and so it might happen that the testator might give a priority between the particular estate and the remainderman, in relation to liability for debts, which might affect such a transaction. But it may well be doubted, whether the legal title of the legatee is not so far complete even by the qualified assent of the executor, as to be unquestionable, in an action against a third person; and I think it at least clear, that if the defendant had any interest in the annunciation to the jury, of those modifications of the general principle, he ought himself to have applied to the court for a further instruction. It cannot be necessary, surely, when an instruction is asked on a particular point, that the court should deliver an instruction upon the whole law of the subject, in its remotest ramifications.

The third instruction cannot be distorted to mean more, than that where possession is proved on the part of the defendant, before suit brought, the plaintiff's action cannot be defeated by his parting with that possession, unless he has been divested by due course of law. This is the well established doctrine. Burnley v. Lambert, 1 Wash. 308. I do not understand it to be contested, though the counsel have deemed the language of the instruction liable to criticism, and has drawn from it other inferences, which I deem inadmissible.

I see nothing more in the case that requires comment; and conclude with again expressing my opinion, that this long litigation should be terminated here, by an affirmance of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

Banks—Right to Set Off Debt Due Bank by Depositors*—Case at Bar.—W. G. having contracted

*Banker's Lien or Setoff.—In Nolting v. National Bank of Virginia, 99 Va. 60, 37 S. E. Rep. 804, it is said: "The banker's lien (which, where it relates to balances due on accounts, is a right to set off, rather than a lien—Ford v. Thornton, 3 Leigh 696) is defined a debt to a bank by note payable sixty days after date discounted by the bank for his accommodation, dies before the note comes to maturity, having on deposit in the bank, at the time of his death, a sum of money exceeding the amount of the note: Held, that, in case W. G.'s estate prove insolvent, the bank has a right, in equity, to retain the amount of his note out of the money it held for him on deposit, whether there be debts of W. G. of superior dignity to the debt he owed the bank, or not; equity, in such case, regarding the bank as debtor to W. G. only for the excess of his money on deposit above the contents of his note.—Dubitante BROOKS, J. If it appeared, that the decedent's estate owed debts of superior dignity.

John Ford and John Thornton were indorsers of a promissory note, for 540 dollars, at sixty days, made by William Gregory, and discounted for his accommodation, by the bank of Virginia at Fredericksburg. Gregory died before the note came to maturity. He had, at the time of his death, a sum of money in the bank, exceeding the contents of his note. But the note coming to maturity before administration of his estate granted, Ford and Thornton retired the note, by giving their own note with an indorser, for the same sum, at sixty days, which the bank discounted for their accommodation. Before this last mentioned note came to maturity, administration of Gregory's estate was granted to Ford and James Maury; and by the joint act of these administrators, when the note of Ford and Thornton came to maturity, the money of Gregory's estate at bank, was applied to the discharge of it. After this Ford died. And then, Ford's administrator, considering the money that had been due on the last mentioned note of Ford and Thornton, as having been jointly and equally due from both, and discharged by Ford alone, brought an action at law against Thornton, to recover a moiety thereof; and recovered judgment against him for the same, by default.

Whereupon Thornton exhibited his bill against Ford's administrator, in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, shewing that the judgment at law 696 had been recovered *against him by surprise; setting forth the facts of the transaction as above stated; insisting, that, as the note of Ford and Thornton was given for a debt due from Gregory's estate; as that note had not been discharged by Ford out of his own funds, but discharged, as it ought to have been, by Gregory's administrators, out of Gregory's money standing at his credit at bank at the time of his death; as the bank, if Ford and Thornton's note had not been given to it in lieu of Gregory's, would have had a right, in any event, and would indeed have been bound, in duty towards the indorsers for Gregory's accommodation, to have retained and applied the money it owed Gregory at his death, pro tanto, to the discharge of Gregory's note indorsed by Ford and Thornton.

when it came to maturity; therefore, Ford's administrator had no just claim against Thornton, for contribution towards the payment of Ford and Thornton's note. And the bill prayed an injunction to inhibit Thornton's administrator from executing his judgment at law.

Ford's administrator, in his answer, stated, that the money in bank standing to Gregory's credit at the time of his death, had been applied to the payment of Ford and Thornton's note given for Gregory's debt, by an arrangement and agreement between Gregory's administrators, Ford and Maury, that the money might be so applied by Ford, but that, if the money due from the bank to Gregory, should be found necessary to pay debts of Gregory's estate, of superior dignity to the debt he owed the bank upon his note indorsed by Ford and Thornton, and discounted for his accommodation, in that case Ford should, out of his own pocket, refund the amount, to be applied to the payment of such debts of superior dignity, in due course of administration; that it had turned out, in fact, that there were debts of superior dignity due from Gregory's estate that required the whole amount of the funds he had left in bank; that, thus, the money left by Gregory in bank, was transferred to Ford, and made his own; and, as it had been applied by him, to the discharge of a debt 697 for which he and Thornton *were jointly and equally bound, his administrator was entitled to demand contribution from Thornton.

There was no proof of the special arrangement or agreement between Ford and Maury, alleged in the answer, with respect to the application of Gregory's money in bank, and the refunding thereof by Ford, in case it should be wanting to pay debts of Gregory's estate, of superior dignity to the debt he owed the bank. It was probable, however, that there was some understanding between them on the subject.

But it did not appear that there were debts of superior dignity due from Gregory's estate, for the payment whereof this fund was necessary, though there was a good deal of documentary evidence relative to that point.

Upon the hearing, the chancellor perpetuated the injunction; and Ford's administrator appealed from the decree.

Patton and Briggs, for the appellant.

Stanard, for the appellee.

TUCKER, P. The money that was standing at Gregory's credit in bank, at the time of his death, was drawn out and applied to the discharge of the note given by Ford and Thornton, to retire Gregory's note, after his death, by the joint act of Gregory's administrators, Ford and Maury, upon some (I think it unimportant what) arrangement or understanding between the two administrators. It is contended, that by this arrangement, this fund was lent by the joint administrators to Ford individually; that thus he has paid out of his own funds, the debt for which he and Ford were jointly and equally bound; and that, consequently, his administrator has a right to contribution of a moiety from Thornton.

According to my view of the case, no part in 1 Morse on Banks and Banking, as 'a mere right of the bank to retain in its own possession, property, the title of which (absolute or special) is, or in the case of negotiable paper, purports to be, in one against whom the bank has some demand, until that demand is satisfied.' "

The principal case is also cited in 1 Va. Law Reg. 780. See also, monographic note on "Banks and Banking" appended to Bank of the Valley v. Marshall, 26 Gratt. 378; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 835, title Banks and Banking.

of Gregory's deposit in bank, constituted, upon his death, general assets of the estate, except the excess above what was sufficient to liquidate the note of Gregory due to the bank. The *bank, in fact, was only a debtor for the difference. Bull. N. P. 179. Had Gregory, in his lifetime, sued the bank for deposit, though it could not set-off at law, because his note was not due, yet upon shewing in a court of equity, that Gregory and his indorsers were insolvent, there could be no question of its right there, to stop the amount in its own hands. Equitable set-offs or discounts existed prior to and independent of the statute; Ex parte Stephens, 11 Ves. 24; Ex parte Blagden, 19 Ves. 466, 7; Ex parte Flint, 1 Swans. 30, 4. And the doctrine of stoppage in equity has always been far more extended than the doctrine of set-off, even under the broad language of the english statute respecting mutual credits, and our own statute respecting discounts, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 127, p. 487. Thus, in the case just put, although the bank could not, at law, set-off a debt payable in futuro against a debt due in present; yet it will scarcely be denied, that upon proof of danger of insolvency, equity would stop the payment; for, in equity, it matters not that the debt due to the defendant, which he seeks to set-off, is payable in futuro. Thus, in cases of bankruptcy, which are always settled very much upon equitable principles; this is admitted; as in Ex parte Prescott, 1 Atk. 230, the petitioner was a creditor in present, for £110.; the bankrupt, on the other hand, held his bond for £340. payable in futuro: if the debts were set-off against each other, the balance against the petitioner would be £230. but if he had been forced to prove his debt under the commission, and take a dividend only upon it, the result would have been very different: he would have been a considerable loser. The question was considered in reference to the statute of 5 Geo. 2, relating to mutual credits; a phrase, which appears to me not more comprehensive than the word discount, used in our statute, which embraces (I incline to think) all cases of mutual money demands due at the time of the plea; and the statute of 5 Geo. 2, did not do more. Yet, by the equity of that statute, it was decided by lord Hardwicke, 699 that the petitioner *should be allowed to set-off, and be held debtor only for the balance after deducting the bankrupt's debt to him.

If, then, in ordinary cases, where there are mutual debts between two persons, a discount would be allowed, upon its appearing that there was risque of insolvency, although one of the debts may be solvendum in futuro, the bank might in Gregory's lifetime, and to the moment of his death, have insisted on retaining his deposit if there was danger of loss. The only doubt that could arise about this, is, that the deposit of a dealer is, by the usage and custom of the bank, held always subject to his check, notwithstanding he is debtor on an accommodation note. But this usage or custom of dealing cannot be more obligatory on the bank, than an express promise to pay the amount of the deposits. And yet an express promise to pay, does not exclude the creditor from the right of stoppage or retainer. This has been often decided. Thus, in Atkinson v. Elliott, 7 T. R. 378, Elliott, in May, sold goods to Hodges, for £430. at six months credit; and, in September, he sold him another parcel for £230. also at six months: in November, when the first was due, and the last not due, Hodges gave him a bill of exchange for £600. payable in December, long before the amount for the last parcel of goods became due; and Elliott promised in writing to pay Hodges the excess of the bill when received. Elliott received the amount of the bill in December, when it became due: and Hodges became bankrupt two days after. The assignees demanded the excess of the bill, and Elliott claimed to retain it. His right to do so was resisted because of his express stipulation to pay it; it not having been in the contemplation of either party, at the time of the transaction, to do more than pay off the first sum, which was due. It was, in effect, an agreement, that the excess of the bill should not be applied to the second sum which was not due. Nevertheless, the court held it so applicable, and the retainer was allowed accordingly. "Justice," says lord Kenyon, "requires that the whole account on both sides should be stated, and that 700 *the balance should be the only thing to constitute the debt." It was, therefore, considered as within the case of Ex parte Prescott, and within the equity of the statute of set-off.

The case of Lechmere v. Hawkins, 2 Esp. Rep. 626, is to the same effect. That case did not arise under the bankrupt law. The case of Taylor v. Okey, 13 Ves. 180, corresponds with both of them. The point was upon a claim to set-off against a debt, a sum of money borrowed by the creditor from the debtor under an express promise to pay: the lord chancellor said, "My opinion is that this claim of set-off must be allowed in equity; and except from the circumstance that the parties are not the same, it would do at law under the authority of Lechmere v. Hawkins, which is precisely this case. The argument addressed to me yesterday for dissolving the injunction, was the same that I used; that the express promise bound the party, making it an absolute payment under all circumstances; but lord Kenyon answered, that he knew no such law; and did not think there was any legal obligation, and the mutual demands were within the statute of set-off. But what weighs with me, is what was said by lord Kenyon, who was perfectly acquainted with the rules of equity; that if he should refuse the set-off, it would drive the party into equity."

If then the bank could in case of Gregory's insolvency, have insisted on retaining, that right was not lost by his death. They had a right to say, "We are debtors only for the excess;" and they, doubtless, would have retained, but for the payment of Gregory's note by the proceeds of that of Ford and Thornton. Ford and Thornton having paid it, stood in the shoes of the bank, and, on the well established principles of this court, were entitled to all its rights and remedies. Tompkins v. Mitchell, 2 Rand. 428; Enders v. Brune, 4 Rand. 438; Watts v. Kinney, ante, p. 272. The bank had a right to apply the deposit to the payment of the debt due to it: therefore, Ford and Thornton had a right to demand that it should be so applied. There was no ground for considering those 701 funds part of the general "assets, as in point of fact, the bank was only the debtor of Gregory for the balance. If so, there has been no misapplication of those funds, admitting that they have been paid in discharge of this debt, by the joint check of both administrators. They cannot be responsible for the amount of them to creditors of superiour dignity, because no such creditor, if there be any, could have any right to the application of funds, which were appropriate to the discharge of this bank debt.

For these reasons, I am of opinion, that the decree should be affirmed.

CABELL and CARR, J., concurred in the opinion of the president.

BROOKE, J. I am also of opinion, that the decree should be affirmed, because I think the appellant has not shewn, that there were any debts due from Gregory's estate, of superiour dignity to that which he owed to the bank. But if such debts of superiour dignity had been shewn to exist, requiring the money which Gregory left in bank, to satisfy them, the question would then, have been, Whether upon the death of Gregory, before his note indorsed by Ford and Thornton came to maturity, his money deposited in the bank, was assets of his estate, subject, so soon as there was a representative of his estate, to the payment of his debts, in the order prescribed by law? Had Gregory's debt to the bank fallen due in his lifetime, it is admitted, that the bank might have insisted on applying a portion of his money on deposit there, to the payment of the debt he owed it, either in a court of law or equity. But the true point of inquiry in this case, is, What were the rights of the bank, and Gregory's creditors claiming debts of superiour dignity, upon his death before his debt to the bank had fallen due? Would a court of equity disregard the debts of superiour dignity? Would it allow the bank to take payment of the simple contract debt due to it, out of Gregory's money held 702 *by it on general deposit, in preference to his creditors whose claims were of superiour dignity? Of this, to say the least, I have great doubt. If the priority of right to satisfaction out of the assets of a deceased debtor, attaches on them the moment he dies, I cannot see upon what principle (there being equal equity) this priority can be overlooked by a court of equity. The cases that have been decided under the bankrupt laws in England, do not exactly apply. In trade, among merchants, a credit is equivalent to money. A debt in presenti though solvendum in futuro, may be considered as a payment, and a good set-off against money in the hands of the creditor. In the other cases that have been mentioned, it does not appear, that there was any question of priority or dignity of debts: they were cases, in which the substitution of a surety to the rights and remedies of the creditor, was alone in question.

Decree affirmed.

703 *The Auditor &c. v. Dryden and Another.

Same v. Same and Others.

(Absent CABELL, J.)

Clerks of Courts—Official Bonds*—To What Duties It Extends.—The official bond of a clerk of a county or circuit court, with condition for the faithful execution of the office, required by the statutes of 1792, ch. 66, § 18, and ch. 70, § 3, was not intended to secure the collection of taxes on law process &c. though it has been made the duty of the clerk ex officio to collect and account for such taxes, nor are the clerk and his sureties liable upon this bond, for his failure to collect, account for, and pay such taxes into the treasury: the bond required by those statutes, extends only to those duties of the office that are properly clerical.

Official Bonds—Right of Commonwealth to Summary Motion—Quere.—Whether under the provision of the statute 2 Rev. Code, ch. 189, § 4, the summary remedy by motion lies for the commonwealth, on any bond but such as are required and taken for the benefit or security of the commonwealth exclusively?

Samuel Dryden was appointed clerk of the county court of Kanawha on the 11th May 1812, and thereupon, with Andrew Donally his surety, executed an official bond, payable to the governor for the time being and his successors, in the penalty of 3000 dollars, with condition, "that he should duly and faithfully execute his said office, and should not remove or carry, or suffer to be removed or carried, out of the county aforesaid, the records or papers of the said court, or any part thereof, except in cases allowed by law."

The same Samuel Dryden was also appointed clerk of the circuit court of Kanawha, on the 1st May 1812, and with Andrew Donally, John Reynolds and David Ruffner, his sureties, executed an official bond to the governor for the time being and his successors, in the penalty of 10,000 dollars, with condition "that he should duly and faithfully perform the duties of his said office."

In the years 1818, '19, '20, and '21, Dryden, as clerk of the county court, collected and received the public taxes, upon houses of private entertainment, on merchants' licenses, and on law process of the 704 county court, (which taxes the laws made it the duty of the clerks of the county courts, respectively, to collect and account for to the treasury) to the amount of 1043 dollars, which he failed to account for and pay into the treasury.

And in the years 1819, '20 and '21, as clerk of the circuit court, he also collected and received the public taxes on law process of the circuit court (which the laws made it the duty of the clerks of the circuit courts, respectively, to collect and account for to the treasury) to the amount of 742 dollars, which also he failed to account for and pay into the treasury.

The auditor of public accounts made two motions in the general court, on behalf of the commonwealth, at November term 1828—the one against Dryden, as clerk of the county court, and Donally his surety in his official bond for his due and faithful execution of that office, for 3000 dollars the penalty of the bond, forfeited, as he alleged, by Dryden's breach of the condition, in failing to account for and pay into the treasury, the sum of 1043 dollars of taxes, by him collected and received as clerk of the county court: the other, against Dryden, as clerk of the circuit court, and Donally, Reynolds and Ruffner, his sureties in his official bond as clerk of the circuit court, for 10,000 dollars the penalty of this bond, forfeited, as he alleged, by Dryden's failure to account for and pay into the treasury, the sum of 772 dollars, collected and received by him for and on account of taxes on law process of the circuit court.

To the first motion, two objections were made by the defendants; 1. that the condition of the bond of Dryden as clerk of the county court, did not extend to the default complained of, that condition relating only to the duties of the office properly clerical; and 2. that the court had no jurisdiction of the case by way of motion. And to the other motion, the same two objections, mutatis mutandis, were made by the defendants therein, and a third, namely, that the bond executed by Dryden as clerk of the circuit *court was not a good statutory bond, there being no statute authorizing the taking of it, or the proceeding upon it.

The general court held, that the condition of neither bond extended to the defaults complained of, and that the defendants in the motions, respectively, were no wise bound by the bonds for Dryden's faithful collection, accounting for and paying into the treasury, the public taxes by him collected and received; and for that reason, without giving any opinion on the other objections, overruled both motions, and gave judgments for the defendants.

From these judgments the attorney general, on behalf of the auditor, appealed to this court.

The causes were argued here, by the attorney general, for the appellant, and by Johnson for the appellees.

I. The principal question was, Whether the official bonds of the clerks of the county and circuit courts, according to the statutes existing at the time these bonds were executed, were a security for the due collection of public taxes, which the clerks, as clerks, were required by law to collect and account for? This question depended on the construction and effect of the several statutes relating to the subject; namely, the statute of 1792, Rev. Code of 1794, ch. 70, § 3, Pleasants' edi. p. 94, 5, requiring official bonds of the clerks of county courts; the statute of 1792, Id. ch. 66, § 13, p. 75, requiring official bonds of the clerks of the district courts; the statute of 1808, Pleasants' collection of public acts,* ch. 120, § 12, p. 152, and of 1809, Id. Supplement, ch. 6, § 6, p. 13, requiring official bonds of the clerks of the circuit courts; the statute of 1820-21, ch. 4, § 4, Seas. Acts, p. 8, requiring the clerks of courts to give bond with surety for the due collecting and accounting for the public taxes which the laws make it their duty to collect; and the statutes making it the duty of the clerks of the county courts, to collect the public taxes on merchants' *licenses &c. and on law process of those courts; and the duty of the clerks of the circuit courts, to collect the taxes on law process of the same; 2 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 185, § 1, 12, 16, 17, pp. 41, 3, 4. In the argument of the point, all the legislation of the country any way relating to the subject, from a very early period, was referred to, and very minutely examined.

II. The second question discussed at the bar, was, Whether the bond which Dryden gave as clerk of the circuit court, was a good statutory bond? Whether there was any statute which required or authorized any such bond to be taken? A question which depended on the construction of the two acts of 1808 and 1809, above cited, requiring official bonds of the clerks of the circuit courts.

III. A third point, very earnestly debated at the bar, was, Whether any remedy by motion at the suit of the auditor, was given on such official bonds as those in question? bonds which may be put in suit at the relation of any individual injured? The statute 2 Rev. Code, ch. 189, § 4, p. 50, provides, that "it shall and may be lawful for the general court, to give judgment with costs, at the motion of the auditor, on ten days previous notice, against any person or persons indebted to the commonwealth, by bond or other specialty, whether the same be taken in the name of the governor or treasurer, or any other person acting in a public character for or on behalf of the commonwealth, and also to give judgment for all bills of exchange and notes, and also for the penalty of all bonds entered into by any person or persons, conditioned for the rendering accounts or other duties." The attorney general insisted, that the summary remedy was given by this statute, upon all bonds whatever, where the commonwealth was injured by the breach of the condition thereof, though a remedy by action of debt on the bonds, lay also at the relation of individuals injured by breach of the condition. Johnson contended, that the remedy by motion on behalf of the commonwealth, lay only on such bonds wherein she alone was interested; for instance, *he said, no motion could be maintained by the auditor, on the bond of an executor or administrator of a public debtor, to charge the executor or administrator and his sureties, for a devastavit. On all such bonds, in which individuals as well as the commonwealth might be interested, the commonwealth, if injured by breach of the condition, must, like individuals, proceed by action of debt.

CARR, J. Upon the argument, I was a good deal inclined to think, that these judgments were erroneous; but an attentive and minute examination of the various laws on the subject, for fifty years back, has changed my first impression. Various points of objection, were discussed at the bar: I shall confine myself to that on which the cases were decided by the general court. The clerks of courts were made collectors of the taxes on ordinary licences and various kinds of law process, as early as 1769 (8 Hen. stat. at large, p. 345,) and were to account for them half yearly to the treasurer. That statute, after enumerating taxes to be collected by the sheriffs, inspectors of tobacco, and clerks, enacts, that if such sheriffs, clerks, or inspectors, shall fail to account and pay &c. it shall be lawful for the general court or court of the county where they reside, upon motion and ten days notice, to give judgment against them and their sureties respectively &c. But, at this time, the clerks gave no official bond; the term sureties, therefore, could not apply to them. In 1777 (9 Id. 350, 362,) the clerks were made collectors of the taxes on ordinary and marriage licences &c. and they were to account and pay half yearly; and for failing to account they were to forfeit £500. and for failing to pay the money (having accounted) they should be proceeded against as delinquent sheriffs. Then the act subjects delinquent sheriffs to a judgment against them and their sureties &c. Here again we see, that though clerks are subjected in like manner as sheriffs, there could only be a recovery against them individually, for as yet they gave no official bond. In 1784, an act passed changing materially the situation of clerks;

708 *11 Id. p. 464. The preamble states, that many inconveniences had arisen from their residing out of their counties, and the permission given them by some county courts, to remove the records without the county &c. to correct which evils, the statute prescribes the form of the oath, which every clerk thereafter admitted into office should take, and also enacts that every county court clerk shall, on his appointment, give bond and security, in the sum of 3000 dollars, with condition for the due and faithful execution of his office, and that he will not carry the records out of his county, except in cases allowed by law &c. We see here, that no part of the mischiefs to be corrected by this law, was a failure of the clerks to pay up the taxes of which they had been made collectors. Nor does the condition of the bond, nor the words of the oath, point at all towards those taxes. This is pretty strong to shew, that the legislature had not that subject at all in view in passing this law. But there is still stronger evidence, that, instead of looking to this bond, they looked distinctly to another manner of correcting the delinquencies of clerks, as collectors of the revenue. In an act passed at the same session (Id. pp. 378, 9,) the clerks are made collectors of taxes on law process &c., are allowed five per cent. for collecting, accounting for and paying those taxes into the treasury; are required to account and pay them twice a year, and on failure, are subjected to the forfeiture of all their commissions, and also to suspension from their office of clerk, until such payment be made. There is another conclusive reason to shew, that the bond of office was not taken as a security against these failures: that bond was not to be given by any clerk then in office, but only by those subsequently appointed; and as they held their offices during good behaviour, such new appointments would only be made (in the general) as the then incumbents should die; so that, for a length of time, a great majority of the clerks would consist of those who had given no bond of office. To this majority, the law could not apply, and to the minority it would not; for we could never suppose, 709 pose, that *the legislature meant, that some of the public collectors should be subjected in one way and some in another. I might follow the series down to 1820, and shew that in all the subsequent tax laws, and different editions, the same form of bond and oath has been prescribed for clerks, and the like penalties for failures to pay taxes collected by them; the laws always looking to different methods, for protection against delinquencies as clerks, and delinquencies as revenue officers. It is a very strong fact too, in proof of the general understanding of these laws, and practice under them, that this is the first attempt ever made, to subject the sureties bound in the official bond of a clerk to a recovery for his failure to account for and pay the taxes collected by him. The act of 1820, shews that the legislative attention was at length called to the danger of suffering clerks to hold so much of the public money, without giving bond and surety for the payment of it; and it then remedied the evil. I am for affirming the judgments.

BROOKE, J. I am of the same opinion.

TUCKER, P. I am also of opinion, that there is no error in the judgments of the general court overruling the motions of the auditor in these cases: I think the judgments right, and for the reason given by the court.

The bonds on which these motions were made, were not taken under the act of 1820, ch. 4, which requires the clerks of the circuit and inferior courts to execute bond with surety for the faithful accounting for and payment of the taxes on law process, ordinary licences and other public monies. They are founded on the general official bonds of the clerk. Such bonds were first required of the clerks of the prescribed county courts by the act of 1784, 11 Hen. stat. at large, p. 465, and required by all the subsequent statutes, contained in the several revisals, in relation to the office and duties of clerks. By these acts it is ordained, that every clerk shall enter

710 into bond with *condition for the due and faithful execution of his office, and that he will not permit the records to be removed out of the county except in cases allowed by law. And it is contended, that these words embrace every description of official duty; that they comprehend not only such official duties as then existed, but such as might from time to time be superadded; and that the collection and payment of taxes on law process &c. is as much an official duty as any other imposed upon the officer. These positions cannot be denied as general propositions. The terms are certainly broad enough to comprehend that case at bar, unless it can be shewn, by reasonable deduction, that the language, however broad, was not employed in this extended signification. This, I think, may be done.

When a statute of the legislature requires the execution of a bond, and prescribes its terms or its character, the interpretation of the instrument is in fact the interpretation of the statute itself. The party who executes it, cannot deny that it should have the interpretation which the legislature designed: and a fortiori, the sovereign power, who prescribed it, cannot fairly extend it to cases which were obviously not intended to be embraced by its provisions. However broad then those provisions, if it shall appear, that the legislature did not intend the bond prescribed, to embrace a particular case, it will be construed not to embrace it: for the true construction of the statutes gives the fair interpretation of the bond. We shall then have occasion to look into our course of legislation, to arrive at just conclusions in this matter. It is not my purpose, however, to go minutely into them, but to refer only to certain general and notorious principles of our legislation, which cannot have escaped the most negligent observer.

The system of requiring security from public collectors, was very early established in the administration of our government. To go no farther back than 1705, we find that sheriffs, in whom was vested the power of collecting the public levies, were also required to give a separate bond 711 *with surety, for the due performance of that duty. 3 Hen. stat. at large, p. 264. But this prudential measure was not more ancient than the distinction observed, and I think uninterruptedly adhered to, between what I will call the revenue bond, and the official bond. The sheriff was an officer not less known to the common law, in his connexion with the administration of justice, than the clerk, and not more known, I believe, in the collection of the revenues of the state. This duty was imposed upon him by statute of early date, as the collection of certain taxes has been imposed upon the clerk by some more recent. Moreover, the sheriff, before he had been invested with the powers and duties of a collector, had been required by statute to enter into a general bond like this of the clerk, for the true and faithful performance of his office. 1705, ch. 3, Id. p. 247. Yet at the very same session, when it was declared that the sheriffs should be the collectors of the public levies, it was provided, that he should enter into bond with two sureties, in double the amount of the public and county levies, with condition to collect and pay them &c. Here then is a clear legislative exposition, more than 125 years ago, that a bond for the true and faithful performance of the sheriff's office, was not deemed to comprehend the collection and faithful payment of the public taxes, though this duty was imposed on the sheriff ex officio. Whether the words might embrace them or not, the legislature shewed, by a simultaneous act, that they did not use them in any such sense. And as words are but the signs of ideas, and our business is with the ideas and not with the words, it matters not what language is used, if we can only certainly learn in what sense it is used.

The distinction I have adverted to as having been observed between the revenue bond and the official bond given by the sheriff, runs through our subsequent legislation in relation to that officer. See 5 Hen. stat. at large, p. 516; 6 Id. pp. 464, 482, 483; 7 Id. pp. 11, 79; 8 Id. p. 39; 9 Id. pp. 67, 222, 357; 10 Id. pp. 167, 253, 506; 712 11 Id. 93, 168. *In all these acts, distinct bonds are scrupulously required, with condition to collect and pay over taxes, notwithstanding the official bond, regularly entered into by the sheriff for the faithful performance of his office. At the revival of 1792, the distinction is broadly marked, by the consolidation and juxtaposition of the various statutory provisions before prevailing in relation to this matter. In the act concerning sheriffs, Rev. Code of 1794, ch. 80, § 8, 9, 10; Pleasants' ed. p. 121, it is provided, that the sheriff shall give three bonds; one, for duly collecting and accounting for the public taxes; one, for duly collecting all levies, and also all fines &c. due to the commonwealth; and one for collecting and paying officers' fees, executing and returning process, paying all money received on process, and generally for the faithful performance of his office; and in the act concerning county levies, Id. ch. 134, § 10, p. 252, the county courts are authorized to appoint the sheriff, or any other person, collector; taking a fourth bond for the faithful collection and payment of the county levies: thus clearly evincing, that the official bond was not designed to embrace the collection of taxes and public dues.

Another feature of the system is to be traced in some of these statutes, and is worthy of observation: the provision requiring the official bonds to be recorded in the records of the county, 3 Hen. stat. at large, p. 247, and the revenue bonds to be certified to the auditor of public accounts. The official bonds are not required to be so certified, because the treasury had no concern with them; but the revenue bonds were to be so certified, that the officers of the government might know against whom to move, and be in possession also of the evidence with which to charge them, before the general court.

It is this view of the systematic distinction taken by the legislature, between official and revenue bonds, with which every one at all conversant with public affairs is familiar, that satisfies my mind, that the official bond of the clerk was not designed to cover his collections of 713 taxes. This opinion *is strongly fortified by the first act which required a bond from the clerk. In May 1784, the act passed imposing taxes on law process, and requiring the clerks to collect them. No bond was then required of the clerk, but the payment was enjoined under the penalties of loss of commission and suspension from office. In October 1784, bond was first required from the clerks of the county courts; but the preamble shews, that it was not so required with a view to secure accountability for the revenue collected but to secure the records from removal and destruction, and to ensure the faithful discharge of the ordinary official duties. Moreover, though the sheriff's bond for revenue, was directed to be certified to the auditor, whose business was with the revenue, this bond was directed to be transmitted to the clerk of the council, merely for safe keeping.

The contemporary exposition of this act, and of the bond to which it gave rise, is irresistably to be inferred, if (as it was confidently alleged in the argument) this is the first case, in which a motion has been ever attempted to be sustained, upon the ground that the clerk's official bond embraced the duty of collecting and paying the taxes collected by him. It can scarcely be possible, that no instance of default has ever before occurred. Hence I infer the universal understanding that the bond did not comprehend the case. Accordingly, in 1820, an act, requiring a revenue bond to be given by every clerk, was passed by the legislature. This, though not authoritative, is pregnant evidence of what the law was understood to be. It is to my mind conclusive evidence of the light in which it was viewed, and always had been viewed, by the intelligent and vigilant officers of the auditor's department. It is well known, that most of the salutary provisions enacted on the subject of the revenue, have been suggested by them. Their situation brings them acquainted with the defects of the laws, and their sagacity suggests the remedy. Such was, probably, the case in relation to the act of 1820: the auditor found the former law defective, and suggested an effectual remedy 714 *to the proper authority. This is much better than straining to extend the operation of a statute beyond its obvious design.

Maitland and Another v. Newton, Adm'r &c.

(Absent TUCKER, P.)

Deeds of Trust—Construction—What Passes*—Case at Bar.—A deed of trust and assignment of effects, made by a debtor to trustees, for the benefit of his creditors. In 1800, conveys and assigns to the trustees, all the debtor's estate real and personal in Virginia or elsewhere, upon trust, that the trustees shall collect all the debts due or to become due to the grantor, on account of transactions prior to the deed, and shall sell the real and personal estate, and institute suits at law or in equity for the recovery of the debts due the grantor, to be applied to the purposes of the trust: the board of commissioners sitting under the treaty between the U. States and Spain of February 1819, award a sum of money to the adm'r of the grantor, for and on account of claims on the spanish government for spoillations before the date of the deed of trust—HELD, this money passed by the deed to the trustees for the purposes of the trust.

By deed, dated the 25th November 1809, William Pennock late of Norfolk, conveyed and assigned to Maitland, Armistead and Wilson, trustees, and the survivors or survivor of them, all his estate real and personal whether the same were in Virginia or elsewhere; upon trust, that the trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, should collect all the debts due or to become due, to Pennock, for or on account of any matter or thing prior to the date of the deed, and should sell the said real and personal estate, when and on such terms as they should think most conducive to the purposes of the trust, and out of the proceeds of the collections of debts and of the sales, after defraying expenses incurred in the execution of the trust, should pay, 1st, certain debts to certain preferred creditors

715 specified in *a schedule annexed to the deed; and 2ndly, all other debts due from Pennock; provided the creditors of the second class, before they should be entitled to receive the amounts due them, or dividends thereof, out of the trust fund, should, in consideration thereof, release Pennock from all further demands. And Pennock thereby constituted the trustees his attorneys (without power of revocation) for him and in his name, and for the purposes of the trust, to demand and receive all sums of money to him due, or to become due and payable, from any person or persons whomsoever, for or on account of any matter or thing prior to the date of the deed; and on receipt of payment, to give acquittances; or, in cases of non-payment, to institute suits in law or equity for recovery thereof.

Pennock died in 1816, and Newton, who was one of his creditors not provided for by the deed, took administration of his estate.

The board of commissioners sitting at Washington, under the 11th article of the treaty of amity, settlement and limits, between the U. States and the king of Spain, of February 1819, awarded to Newton, as the administrator of Pennock, the sum of 15,471 dollars, for and on account of claims of Pennock, which originated before the date of the deed of trust; and Newton received the money from the treasury of the U. States.

And upon a bill exhibited in the superior court of chancery of Williamsburg, by Maitland and Wilson, the surviving trustees named in Pennock's deed of trust (the other trustee Armistead being dead) against Newton as administrator of Pennock and in his own right, the question was, Whether the money received by Newton, under the award of the commissioners, belonged to him as assets of Pennock's estate, to be disposed of in due course of administration, or to the trustees, to be applied to the purposes of the trust? in other words, Whether Pennock's claims against Spain, passed by the deed of trust?

716 *The chancellor was of opinion, that those claims did not pass by the deed, and therefore dismissed the bill. And Maitland and Wilson appealed to this court.

Stanard, for the appellants, said he had no doubt the chancellor's decree was founded on the authority of Mr. justice Washington's opinion in Vasse v. Comegys, 4 Wash. C. C. R. 570, but the judgment of the circuit court in that case, had been reversed by the supreme court of the U. States; Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Peters, 193. The authority of this judgment of the supreme court, and the reasoning on which it was founded, he said, were directly in point to the present case, and decisive, that the appellants were entitled to the money in question, for the purposes of the trust declared by Pennock's deed of November 1809.

Johnson, for the appellees, argued, very strenuously, 1. That Pennock's claims upon Spain, out of which the money in question arose, were not, in their nature, debts due to Pennock, in any sense of the word; they were not claims founded on contract, but claims for losses incurred by illegal seizures made by the spanish government; by spoliations, in fact, on american commerce. 2. That these claims of Pennock, whatever the nature of them might be, did not pass to the trustees, by Pennock's deed of trust of November 1809, either by the words of that instrument fairly interpreted, or by the intent of the parties to be collected from it, upon the most liberal construction. The case of Comegys v. Vasse turned upon the construction of the bankrupt law of the U. States; this case depends on the construction and effect of a deed of assignment; and every such deed must operate according to its own peculiar provisions. He argued, that these claims on Spain did not pass under the general description of the subject contained in the deed of trust, all Pennock's estate, real and personal, whether in Virginia or elsewhere; for 717 the provision, that the trustees *should sell the said real and personal estate, plainly evinced, that those general words were intended to comprise specific property only; property capable of sale. Neither did these claims pass among the debts which the trustees were to collect, and apply to the purposes of the trust; since it was obvious that the debts which it was intended they should collect, were such debts, as that, in case payment thereof should be refused, the trustees might institute suits, in law or equity, for the recovery of them. Now, certainly, Pennock's claims upon Spain, claims for retribution from a foreign sovereign, for property taken by force, in violation of the laws of nations, could never be asserted in any form of judicial proceedings.

CARR, J. The simple question is, Whether the deed of trust conveying all Pennock's estate, real and personal, in Virginia or elsewhere, comprehended his claim on the government of Spain, for spoliations committed on his property by her vessels, and retained under unjust decisions of her courts? That the deed does pass this claim, I can have no shadow of doubt. I have no idea of a right or interest vested in a man, which would not pass under a conveyance of all his real and personal estate, more especially when we consider, that this was the deed of an insolvent debtor, conveying and assigning his effects, for the payment of his debts, so far as the fund would go, and obtaining for such conveyance, a complete release from his creditors. This opinion is intirely supported by the decision of the supreme court in Comegys v. Vasse. This was a case under the bankrupt law, which conveyed to the assignees, "all the estate real and personal, of every nature and description, to which the bankrupt may be entitled either in law or equity;" words not a whit more comprehensive than those used in this deed. Upon those words of the bankrupt law, judge Story, delivering the opinion of the court, says, they "are very general and comprehensive"—"broad enough to cover every description of right and interest attached to and growing *out of property. Under such words, the whole property of a testator would pass to his devisee. Whatever the administrator would take, in case of intestacy, would seem capable of passing by such words."

I am, therefore, for reversing the decree, and remanding the cause, with a declaration, that Pennock's claims on the spanish government passed by the deed of trust to the trustee, for the purposes of the trust; that, therefore, the appellee is liable to the appellants, for the money he has received on account of those claims, or for so much thereof as shall be necessary to discharge and satisfy the debts due to the creditors entitled to the benefit of the trust fund, with interest on such debts; and that, if there shall be any residue remaining after those debts shall be fully discharged and satisfied, such residue shall be considered as assets in the hands of the appellee, to be applied in due course of administration.

The other judges concurred. Decree reversed.

Partnership—Attachment for Debt Not Due—Right of One Member to Sue Out.—One member of a mercantile house to which a debt has been contracted but has not yet fallen due, is competent to make complaint on oath and to sue out an attachment against the debtor, under the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, § 14.

Attachments—Oath—Objection for Want of—Waiver.—Tho' the statute requires that such complaint shall be made on oath as the foundation of the process, it does not require that the fact of the complaint having been verified by oath shall be certified by the justices, and made part of the record: if, on the trial objection be made that the attachment was issued without complaint verified by oath, the fact that the oath was administered may be proved: if no objection be then made on that ground, it is too late to take such objection in an appellate court.

Partnership—Attachment Sued Out by One Member of Firm—Bond—Validity.—As one member of a mercantile house to which a debt has been contracted is competent to sue out an attachment for the house against the debtor, so that member is the proper person to execute the attachment bond required by the statute, id. § 7. And the bond of the partner suing out the attachment, with surety, conditioned that that partner shall pay all costs, in case the house shall be cast in the suit, and all damages that shall be adjudged against him for suing out the attachment, is a good bond.

tracted but not due, when the attachment has been laid on goods of the debtor, and on moneys due him in the hands of garnishees, where the value of the effects attached is uncertain, and may exceed the plaintiffs' claim.

Upon the complaint and at the instance of Hugh Campbell, one of the partners in the mercantile house of W. & D. Kyle & Co. two justices of the peace of the county of Amelia, issued an attachment against the goods and chattels of Daniel Connelly of that county, for a debt which had been contracted by him to that house but had not yet become payable, under the 14th section of the statute concerning attachments &c., 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, pp. 478, 9.*

720 *The process,—reciting that H. Campbell, one of the partners of W. & D. Kyle & Co. had complained to the two justices, that Connelly was indebted to the house, in the sum of 1103 dollars, which would become due and payable at a future date, and that he had just cause to suspect, and verily believed, that Connelly would remove himself with his effects out of the commonwealth, before the debt would become payable, and also that he (Campbell) had no knowledge when the debt was contracted of the intention of Connelly so to remove,—therefore, required the sheriff to attach Connelly's estate, or so much thereof as would be sufficient to satisfy the debt &c. and to make return of the process, and how he should have executed the same, to the county court, at its then next ensuing term. The process did not recite, nor did the justices in any way certify, that the complaint was made by Campbell on oath, nor did they return any affidavit of the truth of the complaint, as the foundation on which they granted the attachment.

Before the attachment was issued, the justices took a bond of Campbell with approved surety, in the penalty of 2206 dollars, payable to Connelly, with condition in the following words: "The condition of the above obligation is such, that whereas the above bound H. Campbell, one of the firm of W. & D. K. & Co. hath this day obtained from A. T. T. and J. B. justices of the peace for the county of Amelia, an attachment against the estate of the above 721 named D. *Connelly, for the sum of 1103 dollars, returnable to the next county court; if, therefore, the said H.

*The 14th section of the statute provides, that "whenever any creditor, whose claim amounts to ten dollars or 400 pounds of tobacco, shall have sufficient grounds to suspect, that his debtor will remove, with his effects out of the commonwealth, before his debt will be payable, or whenever such debtor shall have so removed leaving effects, it shall be lawful for such creditor to go before any magistrate of the county or corporation where his debtor resides, or in case such debtor has removed, where he last resided, or where his effects may be found, and make oath to the true amount of his debt, and that he has just cause to suspect, and verily believes, that such debtor will remove himself with his effects out of the commonwealth before the said debt will become payable, or hath actually so removed, and also that he had no knowledge, when the said debt was contracted, of the intention of such debtor so to remove; and thereupon, such magistrate, taking bond and security from such creditor as in other cases of attachments, shall issue an attachment against the goods and chattels of the debtor, returnable to the next court to be held for such county or corporation, which attachment may be served on any goods and chattels of such debtor, or any garnishee or garnishees." The section then proceeds to prescribe the manner of proceeding on such attachments.—Note in Original Edition.

Campbell, one of the partners of W. & D. K. & Co. shall satisfy all costs which shall be awarded to the said D. Connelly, in case the said H. Campbell, one of the partners of W. & D. K. Co. shall be cast in the said suit, and also all damages which shall be recovered against the said H. Campbell, one of the partners of W. & D. K. & Co. for his suing out this attachment, then the foregoing obligation to be void, else to remain in full force and virtue." This bond was duly returned by the justices to the county court.

The sheriff made return upon the attachment, that he had attached a quantity of merchandize (specified in a schedule) belonging to Connelly, and sundry debts due to him from divers persons, in the hands of the debtors as garnishees, whom he had summoned to attend the court, on the return day of the process. It no wise appeared what was the value of the merchandize attached; it seemed to exceed the amount of the debt due W. & D. K. & Co.

When the county court was proceeding to render judgment upon the attachment and the return thereupon made, James Robertson appeared as attorney at law for sundry other creditors of Connelly (who did not appear himself or offer any defence) claiming the effects attached, under a deed of trust, which he alleged, had been executed by Connelly for the benefit of his clients, and had been duly recorded in the hustings court of Petersburg, but the deed was not produced; and, on their behalf, he moved the court to quash the attachment, and the attachment bond, or to dismiss the proceeding, on the ground, that the bond did not bind the whole firm of W. & D. K. & Co. but was executed by H. Campbell only, one of the partners of the house, in his individual name, and therefore did not conform with the requisitions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, § 7, p. 477.† This motion being overruled by the court, Robert-722 son, *for his clients, filed a bill of exceptions to the opinion, in which he set out the attachment, the bond, the return of the sheriff, his motion to quash the process and the bond, and the judgment of the court overruling it.

The court then proceeded to judgment on the attachment and return. The entry of the judgment was as follows: Hugh Campbell one of the firm of W. & D. Kyle & Co., having obtained an attachment in favor of the said W. & D. K. & Co. against the estate of Daniel Connelly, whom the said Campbell had just cause to suspect and verily believed was about to remove himself with his effects out of the common-

†The 7th section of the statute provides, "that every justice of the peace, before granting such attachment, shall take bond and security of the party for whom the same shall be issued, in double the sum to be attached, payable to the defendant, for paying and satisfying all costs which shall be awarded to the said defendant, in case the plaintiff suing out the attachment therein mentioned shall be cast in his suit, and also all damages which shall be recovered against the said plaintiff, for his suing out such attachment: which bond shall be by the said justice returned to the court to which the attachment is returnable: and the party entitled to such damages, may thereupon bring suit and recover: and every attachment issued without such bond taken, or where no bond shall be returned, is hereby declared illegal and void, and shall be dismissed."—Note in Original Edition.

wealth, for the sum of 1103 dollars due by single bill, on the — day of — next, to the said W. & D. K. & Co. This day came the said W. & D. K. & Co. by their attorney, and the said D. Connelly being solemnly called, and not appearing to replevy the said attached effects; therefore, it is considered by the court, that the plaintiffs recover against the said defendant, the said sum of 1103 dollars, together with their costs &c.' And it was ordered, that the sheriff should make sale of the merchandize attached, on a credit till the date when the debt to the plaintiffs should become payable, and should take bonds of the purchasers with good surety for the proceeds, and assign the same to the plaintiffs, to the amount of the debt due them and their costs, and if the proceeds should exceed that amount, should assign the bonds for the surplus to the defendant, and return an account of his proceedings to the court. And it appearing, that there were debts due to the defendant, from the 723 garnishees *who appeared according to the summons, to the amount of 332 dollars, the court ordered those garnishees to pay to the plaintiffs the several debts by them respectively due to the defendant, with a stay of execution against the garnishees till the date when the defendant's debt to the plaintiff should become due and payable; and several of the garnishees who had been summoned, not having appeared, the proceeding was as to them continued till the ensuing term.

To this judgment of the county court, the circuit court, upon a petition presented in the name of Connelly, awarded a supersedeas, and afterwards reversed the judgment, and quashed the attachment, and all the proceedings upon it. And then W. & D. K. & Co. applied to this court, for a supersedeas to the judgment of the circuit court; which was allowed.

The argument here, by Bacchus and Leigh for the plaintiffs in error, and Johnson for the defendant, turned on objections taken by the latter, to the regularity of the proceedings, and to the judgment of the county court.

The counsel for the defendant in error, premised, that the statute which gives this summary remedy of attachment,—a new remedy contrary to the course of the common law, and one obviously liable to much abuse,—ought to be strictly pursued; Asberry v. Calloway, 1 Wash. 74; Stuart v. Hamilton, 2 Hen. & Munf. 48; Mantz v. Hendley, Id. 308. And then he insisted, 1. That, as the statute requires, that every complaint on which an attachment shall be issued, shall be made on oath, and as it no wise appeared that the complaint on which the process was issued in this case, was made on oath, the attachment was therefore irregularly issued, and ought for this cause alone to be quashed. 2. If it could fairly be presumed, that the complaint was made on oath, yet it was not the complaint of the creditor, but of one of several creditors; a complaint by Campbell one of the house of W. & D. K. & Co.

724 to whom the debt *was due. Campbell could not have taken the oath required by the statute: the creditor praying the attachment, is required to make oath, that he had no knowledge, when the debt was contracted, of the intention of the debtor to remove himself with his effects out of the commonwealth before the debt shall become payable. But, in this case, the house of W. & D. K. & Co. was the creditor: all the partners should have joined in the affidavit to the justice of the complaint: Campbell might, indeed, have made oath, that he had no knowledge of the debtor's intention to remove, but he could not have known, and therefore could not with truth have deposed, that all his copartners were alike ignorant as himself, of that intention. 3. The attachment bond was naught. Though Campbell obtained the attachment, it was an attachment for W. & D. K. & Co. They were the plaintiffs. The costs would be adjudged to the defendant only in case they were cast; and they, not Campbell alone, would have been liable for damages at the suit of the defendant, for abuse of the process. But the bond bound Campbell and his surety to pay the costs, in case Campbell one of the partners in the house, not in case the house, should be cast, and to pay the damages which should be recovered against Campbell one of the partners, not such as should be recovered against the house, which was certainly liable to the action for damages. 4. The condemnation of the attached effects was excessive. The court ought to have directed the sheriff to sell only so much of the merchandize attached, as together with the debts due from the garnishees, would have satisfied the debt due the attaching creditors.

The counsel for the plaintiffs in error, maintained, that the proceedings, and the judgment of the county court, were perfectly right. And, in answer to the objections made to them, they said—1. That though the statute required that the complaint should be made on oath, to justify the issuing of the attachment, it did not require, that the affidavit should be returned to court, or that the fact of the 725 complaint *being made on oath, should be certified, and made part of the record; and the objection came too late. Hawkins v. Gibson, 1 Leigh, 476. Had it been made at the trial in the county court, it might have been obviated by proof, that the complaint on which the attachment was issued, was in fact verified by oath. 2. One partner of a mercantile house to which a debt has been contracted, might sue out an attachment in such a case as this; and to hold that he could not, would be, in effect, to deprive such creditors of the benefit of the remedy. For aught that appeared in this case, Campbell may have been the partner with whom this debt was contracted; and if so, he was the proper person to depose, and the only person that could depose, that the creditor was ignorant, at the time the debt was contracted, of the debtor's intention to remove. 3. Campbell had a right to sue out the attachment for the house: he, therefore, was the party from whom the attachment bond was to be taken. Tate's Dig. Attachment, p. 35, note (b), and the cases there cited, of Wilson & Co. v. Turpin, in the circuit court of Henrico. Twiss v. Massey, 1 Atk. 67; Pleasants v. Meng & al., 1 Dall. 381; Ex parte Hodgkinson, Coop. Ch. Ca. 99; Ex parte Roberts, Id. 102. The bond bound Campbell and his surety to pay the costs, in case he should be cast in this proceeding for W. & D. K. & Co. They, being the plaintiffs, would be bound by the judgment for the costs, if they had been cast, without any bond. As to the damages, Campbell who resorted to this remedy, would alone have been liable for damages, if the process had been sued out without just cause; it was a wrong, and he was the wrong-doer: therefore, the bond properly bound him and his surety to answer for the damages resulting from such wrong. It would be found, on examination of the provisions of the 7th section of the statute, that the bond could not have been conformed with them, more literally and precisely. 4. The judgment of the county court was entered exactly according to the directions of the 14th section of the statute, which prescribes 726 the *judgment to be entered in such cases, and prescribes also the duty of the sheriff in executing the judgment, and in the directions to the sheriff, guards the debtor against any injury that may arise from the condemnation of all his effects attached for the debt, when part will suffice to satisfy it.

CARR, J., delivered the opinion of court, That the judgment of the county court was right, and the judgment of the circuit court reversing it, wrong.

We are bound, in the construction of every statute, to look at the mischief, and the remedy; and so far as the words are not plain and peremptory, to consult the meaning of the legislature. The mischief here, was, that a debtor frequently absconded before his debt became due, and thereby defeated his creditor of the common law remedies. This statute enacts, that, in such case, the creditor may go before a justice, and make oath to the true amount of the debt and when it will become due, and that he believes the debtor is about to remove himself and his effects out of the commonwealth &c. and also that he had no knowledge when the debt was contracted, that the debtor had an intention so to remove; and thereupon, the justice, taking bond and security from the creditor, as in other cases of attachment, shall issue an attachment against the goods &c.

In this case, the attachment was issued, levied on goods and debts in the hands of garnishees, and returned to the county court. There an attorney appeared for certain persons claiming to be creditors of the absconding debtor, and objected to the proceeding. The county court gave judgment, which was reversed by the circuit court on a supersedeas obtained in the name of the debtor.

The first objection I shall notice, is, that it does not appear on the record, that any oath was made by the attaching creditor, before the justices who issued the attachment. The answer is, that the law requires the oath to be made, and that thereupon the attachment shall issue; but does not 727 require, that the affidavit shall be certified or returned by *the magistrate to the county court, or shall in any way appear upon the record of the proceedings. If on the return of the attachment, it had been objected before the county court, that no oath had been made, the court would, no doubt, have required evidence of the fact: but no such objection having been taken then, it comes too late before this court.

The next objection is, that the law requiring that the oath shall be made by the creditor, one partner of a mercantile firm cannot make it; because the whole firm (and not an individual member) constitute the creditor contemplated by the act: and this construction is the more relied on, as the remedy by attachment is a summary proceeding, and the law must be strictly followed. This is certainly true: but still it is the law, not the mere letter, that we must follow: we must not so construe it as to sacrifice the clear meaning to the words. The law says, "Whenever any creditor shall suspect his debtor is about removing" &c. he shall have this attachment. It certainly meant to give the remedy to all creditors alike, not to exclude any class, especially the mercantile class, which, from the extent and multiplicity of their dealings, are the very persons standing most in need of this remedy. And yet the construction contended for, would, in most cases, where there was a firm, deprive them of this remedy. We know that such firms consist of several partners, and, most frequently, that these persons reside at different places, sometimes far asunder; one managing the concerns of the trade here, another in New York, in France, in England, or elsewhere. In all such cases, the creditor would be cut off from the attachment given to all; for the different members could not unite in the oath. The object of the law, in requiring the oath of the creditor, was to furnish to the magistrate, such evidence of the facts sworn to, as would justify the issuing the process. Is not this evidence just as strong, when the facts are sworn to by a partner of the creditor firm, as if that same person were the sole creditor? A partner represents the firm: 728 he can bind them *for thousands, or give an acquittance for any debt due to them: he may then be fairly called the creditor, and he swears to the debt, to the removal, or intended removal, of the debtor, and to his ignorance of such intention when the debt was contracted. Thus, I think the words and the reason of the law, are satisfied in this respect.

It was then objected, that the bond was not a good one, because it did not bind the firm. If a partner was the creditor to make the oath, he was equally the creditor to give the bond; and if he gives a bond with good surety to pay all costs and damages, which may accrue from suing the attachment, it is all that a debtor has a right to ask; and such bond has been given here. To require that the bond should bind the whole firm, would (equally with requiring the oath to be made by all) cut off all mercantile houses, whose members are scattered abroad, from this remedy: for we know, that one partner cannot, by deed, bind the firm: and the individual partners could not be collected, to seal and deliver, each for himself. It has been decided too, in the cases cited at the bar, that a partner may in cases like this act for the firm.

These are the principal objections, and all which it is material to notice. The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and that of the county court affirmed.

Bill of Sale—Retention of Possession by Vendor—Effect.—An absolute bill of sale of slaves being executed for valuable consideration, the vendor notwithstanding the deed retains uninterrupted possession, and dies in possession, of the slaves, and the vendee takes possession after his death, and then a creditor of the vendor takes administration of his estate: on a bill in equity by the adm'r of the vendor against the vendee, to subject the slaves to the debt due to the adm'r. HELD, the bill of sale was fraudulent and void as against the adm'r. being also a creditor, of the vendor: and that the rights of vendor's creditors attached on the subject immediately on vendor's death, and therefore before vendee's possession commenced.

Bill of Sale—Retention of Possession by Vendor—Effect Where Possession Changes before Rights of Creditors Attach.—In Sydnor v. And in the same case, TUCKER, P. says: "According to the view I have taken of the case, it is unnecessary to examine the interesting question, which has been so ably argued, as to the effect of the subsequent acquirement of possession by the vendee upon intervening rights of third persons. This question has been touched by one of the judges of this court in Claytor v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 305, and by another in Batton v. Glasscock, 6 Rand. 78, and is mentioned and waived, in the recent case of Shields v. Anderson, 3 Leigh 735, 7."

Equity Practice—Fraud—From What Time Statute of Limitations Runs.—To a bill in equity by a creditor, for relief against a fraudulent conveyance of his debtor, the act of limitations if well pleaded in bar would (it seems) run only from the time when the fraud was discovered.

Slaves—Interest on Hires and Profits—From What Time Allowed.—Interest upon estimated hires and profits of slaves, should be allowed only from the date of the decree, and it is error to allow interest from the date of the report ascertaining the amount of such hires and profits.

Richard Byrd late of York, by bill of sale dated the 22d March 1805, expressed to be in consideration of 377 dollars paid him by Francis Bright, conveyed to Bright two slaves, named Sam and Tom. The fact was, however, that Byrd was indebted to Bright in the sum of 377 dollars, and that the bill of sale, though absolute on its face, was intended and delivered as a security for the debt; and, accordingly, Byrd continued in uninterrupted possession of the slaves. The bill of sale was never recorded.

730 *In September 1805, John W. Waller, the brother of Byrd's wife, paid Bright the debt of 377 dollars due him by Byrd, with interest, and took from Bright an assignment of Byrd's bill of sale; and, afterwards, Waller paid Byrd the difference between the sum he had paid Bright and the full value of the slaves, and thereupon Byrd executed an absolute bill of sale of the slaves to Waller. The avowed object of Waller in thus purchasing these slaves, was, that he might give them to his sister Mrs. Byrd. He suffered them, therefore, to remain in Byrd's possession; and, in fact, the possession never was changed from the time of the bill of sale executed to Bright, but remained constantly in Byrd, until his death in 1807. After his death, and before administration was taken of Byrd's estate, the possession of the slaves was transferred to Waller, whether as his own property, or as the hirer of them from his sister, was, upon the proofs in this cause, somewhat doubtful. Waller held the possession till his own death which happened early in 1814.

Robert Anderson, a creditor of Byrd, took administration of his estate; and, in 1811, he brought an action of detinue against Waller to recover the two slaves, claiming them as part of the estate of his testator; in which action, there was a verdict and judgment for Waller, who afterwards died, with the slaves in his possession.

After Waller's death, Mrs. Byrd brought an action of detinue for the slaves, against Gawin Corbin the administrator of Waller, claiming them as having been given and delivered by Waller to her, and having been hired by her to him during his lifetime; and she recovered a verdict and judgment for them.

In 1818, Anderson exhibited a bill in the superior court of chancery of Williamsburg, against Mrs. Byrd, and Corbin, the

Fraud—At What Time the Statute of Limitations Commences to Run.—In Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Gratt. 760, it is said: "In the cases of fraud the authorities are conflicting, as to whether at law the statute begins to run from the commission of the fraud, or from its discovery. Angell on Lim. § 188 to § 189; Callis v. Waddy, 3 Munf. 511; Rice v. White, 4 Leigh 474; 1 Rob. Prac. (Old Ed.) pp. 82, 87, 110."

administrator of Waller, shewing, that he was a creditor of Byrd, and had therefore taken administration of his estate, the whole of which sufficed to satisfy only a small part of the debt due to him; and 731 alleging, that Byrd's bill *of sale of slaves Sam and Tom to Waller, of September 1805, was covinous in fact, Waller having (as the bill charged) redeemed the slaves from Bright's mortgage, not with money of his own, but with money furnished him by Byrd for the purpose: that, if the transaction was not thus covinous in fact, yet that Byrd's bill of sale to Bright was fraudulent in law and void as against Byrd's creditors, whether considered as a mortgage, or as an absolute sale; if as a mortgage, because it was never recorded; if as an absolute sale, because possession did not accompany and follow the deed, but remained uninterruptedly with the vendor: that Byrd's bill of sale to Waller of September 1805, was also fraudulent in law and void as against Byrd's creditors, because, notwithstanding that deed, Byrd's possession continued without interruption: and that, even supposing Waller had given the slaves to his sister Mr. Byrd (which he denied) she had taken this gift with full notice of every fact which rendered Waller's title to them nugatory as against Byrd's creditors. Therefore, the bill prayed, that the slaves should be held subject to the debt Byrd owed the plaintiff, and that Waller's administrator should render an account of the profits while Waller held them, and Mrs. Byrd an account of the profits since they had been in her possession.

Mrs. Byrd, in her answer, denied all the circumstances of actual fraud imputed by the bill; but she did not deny the fact of her husband having continued in uninterrupted possession of the slaves, until his death, notwithstanding the bills of sale to Bright and to Waller. She said, that Waller had bought the slaves with a view to give them to her, and had suffered them to remain in the possession of her husband, for her use and maintenance; that after Byrd's death, Waller took possession of them, and gave them to her according to his original design, and that she hired them to him; and upon these grounds, she had brought a suit for them against his administrator after his death, and recovered them. And she pleaded the statute of limitations in bar of the claim set up in the bill.

732 *Corbin, administrator of Waller, answered, that he was ignorant as to all the facts alleged in the bill, except that the slaves, Sam and Tom, were in his intestate's possession at his death, and that Mrs. Byrd had since recovered them in an action of detinue. He did not rely on the statute of limitations as a bar to the plaintiff's claim.

The proofs in the cause ascertained, very clearly, that Byrd remained in uninterrupted possession of the slaves till his death in 1807, notwithstanding the two bills of sale to Bright and to Waller, and that Waller took possession of them after Byrd's death; but there was no evidence of any actual covin in the transactions. The other evidence related to the profits of the property.

The court of chancery declared, that both the bills of sale were fraudulent in law and void as against Anderson, a creditor of the vendor Byrd, because he had been permitted to retain uninterrupted possession of the property; that Anderson, as a creditor of Byrd, had a right to impugn these bills of sale for the fraud; and that the statute of limitations was not a bar to the claim asserted in the bill, because the frauds complained of appeared not to have come to the plaintiff's knowledge, till within five years next before his bill was exhibited. And the court ordered accounts to be taken, of the debt due by Byrd to Anderson; of Anderson's administration of Byrd's estate; of the profits of the slaves since they had been in Mrs. Byrd's possession; of the profits while they remained in Waller's possession, and in that of his administrator Corbin; and of Corbin's administration of Waller's estate.

The accounts reported by the commissioner, ascertained, that there was a balance of debt contracted by Byrd in his lifetime to Anderson, of 1542 dollars, with interest from the 18th March 1807—that the profits of the slaves, while they were in Waller's possession amounted 909 dollars—that the profits thereof, while in possession of Corbin administrator of Waller amounted to 299 dollars—and that the profits thereof since they had been in Mrs. Byrd's 733 possession, *amounted to 541 dollars. The account of Anderson's administration of Byrd's estate, shewed that Byrd was insolvent, and the small amount of assets that came to Anderson's hands was applied to the credit of the debt due to Anderson. No account of Corbin's administration of Waller's estate was reported; for,

About the time these accounts were taken, Corbin died; and the suit was revived against Richard Corbin his administrator, and John Shields sheriff of York, to whom administration de bonis non of Waller's estate was committed.

Upon the coming in of the commissioner's report, the court of chancery, with the consent of the plaintiff and the defendant Mrs. Byrd, decreed that she should deliver the slaves, Sam and Tom, to the plaintiff, and should pay him the amount of the profits reported to have accrued while they were in her hands; and that Corbin's administrator should pay the plaintiff, the sum of 299 dollars, the amount of the profits of the slaves Sam and Tom, while he held them as administrator of Waller, with interest from the 18th September 1821, the date of the commissioner's report—to be applied by the plaintiff in due course of administration of Byrd's estate.

There being still a large balance due to the plaintiff, he obtained leave to amend his bill, and make new parties; and, by an amended bill, he shewed, that all Waller's personal estate except certain slaves which had been delivered by his administrators to his distributees, had been exhausted in the payment of specialty debts, which bound his lands in the hands of his heirs; and, therefore, he made Waller's children, who were his heirs and distributees, and Shields, his administrator de bonis non, parties defendants; and prayed that the slaves of Waller's estate, which had been distributed, might be held subject to his claim against Waller, for the profits of the two slaves Sam and Tom, while in his possession; and that the court, if necessary, should marshal the assets of Waller's estate, and substitute and subject Waller's lands, to the extent to which his personal *assets 734 had been applied to the payment of specialty debts, to the satisfaction of this claim of the plaintiff.

The administrator de bonis non, and the heirs and distributees of Waller, having put in their answers, wherein they contested the justice of the former report of the commissioners as to the amount of profits received by Waller; the court of chancery opened that account, and referred it to a commissioner to be stated, as between the present parties to the controversy; and ordered an account to be taken of Corbin's administration of Waller's estate.

The account of Corbin's administration of Waller's estate shewed a very trivial balance in his hands. New evidence was exhibited as to the profits of the two slaves Sam and Tom, while in Waller's possession; and an account thereof, founded on this new evidence, reduced the amounts of profits received by Waller, from 909 dollars, appearing by the former report, to 444 dollars; which sum (though these were estimated profits, not actual hires received) the commissioner charged to Waller's estate, with interest from the 18th September 1821, the date of the first report.

Upon this, the court of chancery decreed, that Shields the administrator de bonis non of Waller should pay the plaintiff the sum of 444 dollars with interest from the 18th September 1821, out of the assets of his intestate, if so much thereof be had, and in default of any assets in his hands, directed that the slaves which had been distributed, and which were in the hands of Waller's distributees, should be sold to pay the debt and interest.

The "defendants" prayed an appeal to this court; the court of chancery allowed the appeal, without requiring any appeal bond, and no appeal bond was given. Anderson also, thinking the estimated amount of profits charged by the last report, and decreed, against Waller's estate, too low, appealed from the decree.

The cause was argued here, by Scott for the parties who were defendants below, and by Stanard for Anderson.

735 *CARR, J. When the amended bill was filed in this case, and Waller's heirs were thereby made parties, in order to charge the lands in their hands, they were not bound by any previous order in the cause, but were at full liberty to contest every thing, which might bear upon Waller's liability for the hire of the slaves in question, and the amount of that liability. They were at liberty, then, to shew, if they could, that the bill of sale of Bright, and the purchase from him by Waller, were fair transactions; for, if fair, Waller was not at all liable for heirs. This liberty, however, has not availed them much; for I agree with the chancellor, that we must take both the bills of sale from Byrd to Waller, and from Byrd to Bright, to have been fraudulent and void as to creditors, though as between the parties and those claiming under them, they were valid; that from Byrd to Bright being taken as a mortgage. I agree too with the chancellor, that the bill of Anderson is not touched by the statute of limitations, both for the reason he assigned, and for the further reason, that the statute was not pleaded on behalf of Waller the purchaser.

In the argument of the case, the counsel discussed this question: A. purchases slaves of B. the possession not accompanying and following the deed; but A. gets possession under his purchase, before the right of a creditor of B. to come upon the slaves, vests; will such purchase and possession make good the title of A. against the creditor? The question is a grave one; but it does not arise in this case.

Upon the question, whether the chancellor estimated the hires correctly? I cannot find in the record sufficient evidence to satisfy me, that the decree is erroneous. The estimates of hires, when taken, as in this case, after the parties to the transaction are dead, and you can make no deductions for physicians' bills, and the various other drawbacks which may have existed, are nine times out of ten, I think, fixed by commissioners too high. We must remember too, that the last account was taken expressly to give the heirs (who were then 736 first sought to be charged) an opportunity *of contesting as well the true amount of the hires, as their liability to them: as to them the question was to be taken up ab integro. It was decided in Mason's devisees v. Peter's adm'r, 1 Munf. 437, that a judgment against executors, is no proof against devisees of land, because there is no privity between them: I presume, there is as little between the executor and the heir. Again, we know that depositions cannot be read against a party who has had no notice of the taking them; and still less against those who, at the time they were taken, were not parties to the suit. Now we see, that all the evidence on which the first report was founded, was taken before the heirs were parties; and this appearing upon the face of the record, need not be presented in the form of an exception to the account. Upon this new evidence, adduced after Waller's hires were made parties, the chancellor was clearly right in his estimate of the hires. But I should not feel authorized to say he was wrong upon the whole evidence.

I do not think we can touch that part of the interlocutory decree, which directs that Mrs. Byrd shall deliver the slaves Sam and Tom to the plaintiff, instead of directing a sale of them; 1. because that was a consent decree; and 2. because it is not before us as to that point, there being no appeal by Mrs. Byrd. Nor does it seem to me, that such sale is necessary, in order to a final decree as to the hires: for the amount of the plaintiff's claim exceeds the sum total of the profits of the slaves and of the value (upon any possible estimate) of the slaves themselves.

The only error I see in the decree, is the allowance of interest on the estimated hires of the slaves from the date of the first report: interest should be allowed only from the time of the decree.

CABELL, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. In whatever light we consider Byrd's bill of sale to Bright, the result, in this case, must be, that the 737 *transaction was void as to bona fide creditors of Byrd. If it was a mortgage, it was void, not only because the taking a bill of sale in form, where the real transaction is a mortgage, tends to deceive and injure others, and is therefore fraudulent and void, (6 Johns. C. R. 432, 2 Johns. C. R. 191,) but also for the conclusive reason, that it was not recorded. If it was really an absolute sale, then possession not having accompanied the deed, it was void for that reason. That Byrd remained during life in the undisturbed and uninterrupted possession of the slaves notwithstanding the alleged successive sales to Bright and to Waller, the evidence very clearly establishes.

But it was said that Waller took the possession before the claim of the creditor intervened, and this will protect him against the application of the doctrine of Edwards v. Harben, 2 T. R. 587. And the cases of Bartlett v. Williams, 1 Pickering, 288, and Robinson &c. v. M'Donnell &c., 2 Barn. & Ald. 134, were cited. Whether the presumption of fraud would have been removed even if possession had been obtained at a period during Byrd's life, subsequent to the sale, but anterior to an execution against him, seems by no means settled with us. The affirmative is very strongly contended by judge Green in Clayton v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 285, 305, and, in the same case, judge Carr waives the expression of any opinion upon the subject. The point cannot be decided here. The possession was not taken till after Byrd's death. Now, although the delivery of possession in his lifetime, before execution, should prevent the application of the rule, the same effect would not necessarily follow here. According to the class of cases of which Temple v. Chamberlayne, 2 Rand. 384, is one, the creditor has no rights until he has issued his execution. To construe, therefore, a delivery of possession subsequent to the sale, as operating to give validity to the transaction,—as amounting even to a new transaction, to the surrender of the former right, and to a resale with immediate delivery, would not interfere with vested 738 rights. But not so here. *According to Blow v. Maynard, 2 Leigh, 29, there was a vested right in the creditor at the death of Byrd, to charge these slaves in equity. This vested right cannot be impaired by any act of the party, who, in the eye of the law, is a fraudulent donee. In the case of Robinson &c. v. M'Donnell &c., Bailey, J., expressly confines his opinion to cases in which there is no intervening right in a third person. See his opinion in Mair v. Glennie, 4 Mau. & Selw. 248. The plaintiff, therefore, as creditor of Byrd, had a right to institute this suit against the holders of the slaves as executors de son tort, and to render them and their profits liable to the discharge of his debt. In doing this, he cannot be turned over by one to another, upon the allegation, that, though one received the profits, he has paid them over to the other. All are equally without right, and it can be no exemption to one who has received my money, to shew, that he paid it over to another, who claimed it, but who had no right to it. Waller's estate was, therefore, liable for the hires received by him.

I incline to think, that the estimate of the hires charged to Waller's estate, which was approved and allowed by the court of chancery, was too low: but as the other judges are of a different opinion, I readily yield my objection to the decree on this score.

There is a formal error also in the decretal order directing the slaves Sam and Tom to be delivered up to the complainant, instead of providing for the sale of them. But for the reasons given by judge Carr, I think the error immaterial as it respects the appellants.

The statute of limitations was relied on in the argument; but it was not pleaded by Shields as a defence for Waller's estate, even if it had not been explicitly answered by the remarks of the chancellor in the first decree. Shields is, in effect, the only party appellant here: though the appeal was allowed to all, yet as no appeal bond was given, or indeed required, it can only be considered as the appeal of that party (namely, Shields, the administrator) of whom an appeal bond could not be required.

739 *It was contended, that Waller should be considered as a creditor for the amount of his advances, and be paid pro rata. I do not think so. Though I am not of opinion, that the transaction was actually covinous, yet the law avoids the sale as fraudulent, and treats the holder as executor de son tort. Now an executor de son tort can never retain. Moreover, the contracts of sale as between Byrd and Bright, or Byrd and Waller, are valid as between them. They are not avoided. Of course Byrd's estate is not debtor for the advances, because those advances were made as the price of property, which Waller has received, and not as a loan, or as money paid for his use. If Byrd's estate could be liable, it would only be because of the loss of those slaves. But they were not lost for any defect of title in him; and, therefore, his estate is not responsible. Whether the estate could be made liable on the ground of money paid for its use, provided there were funds to repay it, it is not necessary to decide. The question here relates only to the application of these funds. And considering it in this light, it is obvious, that if the payment of the debt to Anderson, out of the proceeds of this property, which Waller claims, is to be the ground of reclamation, then just in proportion as Waller becomes debtor of the estate, is the fund reduced out of which he expects payment. The proposition of course is inconsistent and not sustainable.

The decree is however deemed to be erroneous in this, that the chancellor has given interest upon the estimated conjectural hires of the slaves from the date of the first report, instead of hires from the date of the decree. According to the case of Baird v. Bland, 5 Munf. 492, interest is not to be allowed upon conjectural and unliquidated hires; for until they are ascertained, the party is in no default for not paying. Now, this reason applies in full force to the allowance of interest from the date of the report; since until it be confirmed by the decree of the court, the hires are still uncertain, conjectural and unliquidated. This 740 emphatically appears in this case, in which the court has reduced *the estimate to less than one half of that made by the first report. The sum thus ascertained to be due, was, therefore never known until the decree; and yet the chancellor has given back interest for many years on this unknown sum. This cannot be right upon the principles of Baird v. Bland. The decree must be reversed for this error, with costs.

744 *Error to a judgment of the circuit court of Buckingham.

At April term 1827, the grand jury presented Word and several others, "for unlawful gaming at cards at H. Lipscombe's tavern in Maysville in the county of Buckingham within six months [then] last past." The court immediately issued process, returnable instant, summoning the persons presented, "to answer a presentment of the grand jury made against them at that term, for unlawful gaming at cards"—without specifying, as the presentment does, when and where the offence charged was committed. The summons being executed on all the defendants, the presentment was tried as to Word, the plaintiff in error, at the same term it was made. He was an infant; and the court, on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, assigned him a guardian to defend him in the prosecution. The guardian pleaded for him, not guilty. The jury found him guilty; and the court gave judgment for the fine of twenty dollars imposed by the statute against gaming, and the costs of prosecution.

It appeared by a bill of exceptions filed for the defendant, that, at the trial, "after the evidence was gone through, the defendant, by attorney retained by his mother (who was a widow, he himself being an infant), desired to argue the case before the jury: but the court stopped the attorney, and would not allow any argument in favor of the defendant before the jury; because there was but a single witness in the case, whom it was not attempted to impeach, and whose evidence was clear and distinct as to the fact charged, and his testimony could not be varied by argument—if the witness was believed by the jury, the law was clear, and if the jury did not believe the witness, the law was equally clear. And the defendant excepted to the refusal of the court to hear the argument of counsel."

The defendant applied to this court, at June term 1827, for a writ of error to the judgment, which was allowed; and at November term following, no counsel 745 appearing for *the plaintiff in error, the cause was submitted to the court, without argument.

And BOULDIN, J., delivered the opinion of the court, that the judgment should be affirmed.* He said—The only question in the case, is, whether the circuit court erred in refusing to allow the case to be argued? If there be error in that refusal, it is because the party had a right to have a speech made on his behalf, whether there was a point of law, or contested fact, in the case, or not. We deem it quite clear, that in every case reasonably susceptible of argument, the expediency of a discussion ought to be left to the counsel, however hopeless the judge may think the task; but it is equally clear, that the time of the court ought not to be taken up in hearing speeches in cases like the present. It is rare indeed, that such cases occur; but when they do, it is both the right and the duty of the court, in exercising its superintending power over the proceedings in court, to control them, as was done in this case. A great proportion of the business of the circuit courts is done without argument, and is not susceptible of it; and while it is the duty of the judge, to pay due regard to the situation of counsel who are urged by their clients to make fruitless exertions, he would betray his trust, if he carried it to a length that would clog the administration of justice.

But after this opinion was delivered, and the opinion of the court in the case of The Commonwealth v. Garth (next following this) was also announced, it was suggested from the bar, that both cases presented very interesting and important questions, worthy of much graver consideration than (perhaps) the court had bestowed upon them, and that it would be well for the court to suspend its judgment, and take full time to advise on the subject. The court 746 said it would do *so, and immediately ordered both the cases to be continued; and as the plaintiff in error had retained no counsel, it requested the members of the bar, as amici curiæ, to assist the court with their views of the cases.

In consequence of this request, Leigh, as amicus curiæ, laid before the court a written argument of this case, to the following effect.†

This is a summary proceeding under the 21st section of the statute against gaming, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 147, p. 568. And there are two objections to the regularity of the proceedings, not at all affecting the question presented by the bill of exceptions, to which it is proper to call the attention of the court; since if they shall appear to the court, as they strike me, to be material and fatal, the court will be spared the trouble of further inquiry.

1st. The presentment is founded on the 5th section of the statute against gaming, (Ibid. p. 563,) and charges an offence strictly within the prohibition of the statute, specifying the place where, and the time within which, the offence was committed—"unlawful gaming at cards, at H. L.'s tavern, in Maysville, Buckingham:" but the summons issued by the court upon this presentment, calls the accused to appear and answer a presentment of the grand jury of the same term, "for unlawful gaming at cards," generally, without any specification whatever of place or time. Now, the 20th section of the statute, (Ibid. pp. 567, 8,) though it be a very comprehensive statute of jeofails in regard to all prosecutions of the kind, only cures, and was only intended to cure and obviate, all objections to want of precision and certainty, or to any other defect, in the presentment, indictment or information: it does not cure, nor was it designed to cure, any defect or irregularity, any want of certainty or precision, in the process issued upon the presentment. The *21st
747 section (Ibid. p. 568,) directs, that where any presentment authorized by the act, shall be made by a grand jury, the court wherein the same shall be made, shall immediately order the proper process, to bring the offender before it, with all convenient expedition"—and then proceeds to provide a course of proceeding in the last degree summary. The court shall "order the proper process:" is that proper process, which gives the accused no notice of the place where, nor of the time within which, the offence is charged to have been committed, and contains no circumstance of specification whatever? The only purpose of the process is to give the accused notice of the charge; such notice as may be of some use to him; such as may give him an opportunity of defending himself; such as may enable him to make instantaneous preparation for defence. He cannot prepare for defence, he cannot summon witnesses to exculpate him from the charge, unless he be apprised in some sort (I admit no great nicety is required) of the particulars of time and place. I apprehend, that under the presentment in this case, if the prosecutor had not proved the gaming charged, at the place and within the time, specified in the presentment, though the accused had gamed at another place or at a former time, he must have been acquitted. The process issued gave the accused no opportunity to summon witnesses to prove an alibi; no opportunity even of ascertaining in his own mind, whether he was present or absent, at the place and within the time, where and when he was charged with offending against the law. The very summary nature of the proceeding directed by the statute, and the dispensing with regular pleadings, afford, to my mind, the strongest reason for requiring, that the process should indicate to the accused the offence with which he is charged, with reasonable certainty and precision—with all the certainty and precision, at the least, with which the presentment cloaths the charge—in order that he may, on the instant and without the smallest waste of time, prepare for his defence. I humbly submit, 748 that, in the present case, *the process ought to have summoned the accused to answer the presentment made against him by the grand jury, "for unlawful gaming at cards at H. L.'s tavern, in Maysville, Buckingham, within the last six months"—following the presentment in the specification of the offence; and that, in all cases of the kind, the process should, in like manner, be made to conform to and follow the presentment.

†The argument of this case (as well as that of the same counsel in the next following case of The Commonwealth v. Garth) is reported at large (with some trivial alterations) by the particular desire and direction of the court.—Note in Original Edition.

2nd. In this case, the accused being an infant, the court, at the instance of the attorney for the commonwealth, assigned him a guardian to defend him, and that guardian pleaded for him. Now, I know that in all civil suits against an infant, he can only defend by guardian, and that it is a power incident to every court of justice to appoint a guardian ad litem; 2 Wms. Saund. 117, f. note 1; 3 Bac. abr. Infancy and Age. K. p. 617. But as to criminal proceedings of whatever nature, I know of no difference between prosecutions of persons of full age and prosecutions against infants, except those substantial distinctions which turn on the question whether the infant be doli capax, and a distinction in prosecutions against infants for misdemeanours, not admissible in such prosecutions against adults, between misdemeanours of omission and those of commission; 4 Black. Comm. 22; 1 Hawk. P. C. book I, c. 1, § 3; 3 Chitt. Crim. Law, 724. I apprehend, there is no difference in the method of proceeding, in any criminal prosecution whatsoever, against infants and against adults. In cases of felony, the infant as well as the adult, we all know, must appear and plead in person. In cases of misdemeanour, the infant, as well as the adult, has a right to appear and defend by attorney; 1 Chitt. Crim. Law, 411. And an infant, in a criminal prosecution of any kind, may be outlawed for non-appearance. (Id. 348,) which could not be, if the court might appoint him a guardian ad litem. The language in 1 Chitt. Crim. Law, 411, is, "Where infants are prosecuted for misdemeanours, it is the constant practice for them to appear by attorney in the crown office, though in civil cases they must 749 defend by guardian:" the author *cites Tidd, 92, and 2 Ld. Raym. 1284; Regina v. Tanner and others. In that case (a prosecution for a riot) the objection was, that the infant appeared by attorney, whereas it was insisted he ought to have appeared by guardian; and the court overruled the objection, because the practice and course was for infants, in such cases, to appear by attorney. The infant has a right to direct his own defence; he is not bound to entrust it to a guardian who is above his control, instead of an attorney who is subject to his control; he is personally liable to the amercement or other punishment, and is therefore entitled to defend himself in his proper person, or by attorney, selected by his own choice.

There are also some considerations, that belong to this case, as it is presented by the bill of exceptions, and yet do not touch the general question, which (judging from what passed at the former term of this court) I suppose the circuit court intended to decide, and the exception to its opinion was perhaps intended to reserve: that general question will be stated in the sequel: what I mean to shew at present, is, that the general question, as I understood it at the former term, and as this court certainly understood it too, is not presented by the bill of exceptions, or if it may be collected from the record, it is not so presented as to justify, much more to require, a decision of it by this court.

1st. This court can only ascertain the opinion of the circuit court from the record; no information, no explanation, from any other quarter, can be heard or regarded. And upon a critical examination of the bill of exceptions, it will be found, that the circuit court not only refused to allow the counsel of the accused to argue the cause upon the evidence before the jury, but refused to hear any argument of the counsel addressed to the court itself: for, "the defendant excepted to the refusal of the court to hear the argument of counsel"—upon what topic we are not informed. Now, even admitting that the court might with propriety have interdicted all argument

750 upon the evidence before the jury, under an impression, founded upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, that there was no room for fair argument; with what propriety could the judge refuse to hear argument addressed to himself? Argument, either to shew, that his impression of the evidence was erroneous, and that there was room for fair argument before the jury; or that the counsel's desire to argue the case before the jury, was dictated by a sense of duty, and offended against no rule of decorum or principle of justice; or that, by the law, he had the absolute right to argue the case upon the evidence before the jury. If it be said, that these remarks are founded upon a misconception of the bill of exceptions; I shall be ready enough to admit, that they may be inapplicable to the case as it actually occurred in the circuit court; but they are, in truth, founded upon the loose and imperfect state of the case contained in the bill of exceptions; and it is this imperfection only, or I should rather say, uncertainty, which I here design to point out.

2nd. Supposing that there may be a case of a criminal prosecution, in which the evidence adduced shall be all on the side of the prosecution, and the evidence shall be so clear, simple, direct, positive, unimpeachable and incontrovertible, that the court may be justified in preventing the counsel for the accused from arguing the cause upon the evidence before the jury; still, I apprehend, that in order to justify such an interdiction, to justify this court in approving a departure from the usual course of proceedings so rare, and (I may add without offence) so extraordinary, it would not be sufficient for the court to say, in general terms, that the evidence was such, in its opinion, as to leave no room for fair argument before the jury.

The evidence ought to be stated upon the record, so as to enable the appellate court to revise the course of the trial, and to judge of the propriety of denying the accused a hearing by counsel before his country; and the judge ought to take care that it is so stated, since it is his personal conduct which is in question—I say his personal conduct, only because it is 751 impossible *not to perceive, that every case of the kind must be a conflict between the power of the judge and the rights, or claim of right of the counsel and the accused: I must not be understood, in the present instance, to impute any personal blame. If the judge of a circuit court may properly deny to a party accused a hearing upon the evidence before the jury, without setting forth upon the record the circumstances which justify such denial; if his own opinion, that there was no room for fair argument, expressed in general terms, shall suffice, in this appellate tribunal, to sustain a conviction where the accused has been denied a hearing before the jury; then is the judge of the circuit court clothed with power to determine, in the last resort without appeal or supervision, in what cases a party accused is entitled to be heard by counsel in his defence, and in what cases he is not.

3rd. The judge of the circuit court who tried this cause, agreed with me, I presume, in the opinion, that he was bound to state, upon the record, the reasons which induced him to deny to this defendant, a hearing by counsel upon the evidence before the jury; for he certainly intended to assign his reasons. I pray the particular attention of this court to the reasons assigned. The bill of exceptions states, that the court would not allow any argument for the defendant before the jury, "because there was but a single witness in the case—whom it was not attempted to impeach—whose evidence was clear and distinct as to the fact charged—and his testimony could not be varied by argument." There was but a single witness in the case: this was doubtless stated, to evince that there was no contrariety, no complexity, no confusion in the evidence; but when before, was it ever supposed, that the testimony of a single witness is the strongest and most impregnable ground on which a case, civil or criminal, can be rested? It was not attempted to impeach the witness: could there be no argument before the jury against the testimony of the witness, which would 752 not impeach him, that is (as I understand *the phrase) impugn his credit?

May not a witness of undoubted veracity be mistaken? Are not numerous instances remembered, by all counsel and all judges, of the most honest witnesses being clearly proved by counsel to be mistaken, and that from a nice examination of their own testimony? I remember at trial for murder, in which it was a very material question, whether the mortal wound was inflicted with a dirk or with a knife: a witness, who appeared to me to be above all exception, and whose veracity was not questioned, testified, in the most positive manner, that the wound was inflicted with a dirk; he said, he knew the weapon well, and he saw it: yet the counsel for the prisoner did, by force of argument, upon the very testimony of this witness, convince the court and jury, and (I believe) every bystander, and the witness (I know, for he told me so), that the fatal weapon was a knife. The evidence was clear and distinct as to the fact charged: how often has it occurred, within the experience of each and every judge of this court, that the judge has thought the evidence clear and distinct, and yet the jury has found a verdict directly contrary to the opinion of the court upon the evidence—in civil cases, in which the court has granted a new trial, because the verdict was contrary to the evidence—and in criminal cases, where if the verdict be a verdict of acquittal, the court may not grant a new trial, though the verdict be in its opinion most clearly against evidence? The testimony of the witness could not be varied by argument—true, certainly—but the inference deducible from the testimony—the inference which it was the especial province of the jury to draw from the testimony—might have been varied by argument.

Surely, this court cannot give its solemn sanction to any one of these reasons, singly considered. Combine them—take the language in which they are couched, in the most liberal sense—presume ever thing that a court of law may possibly presume, in favor of the judgment. If there was but a single witness in the case and there-

753 fore no complexity *in the evidence, if that witness was a man of indisputable veracity, and if his evidence was clear and distinct to the fact charged; was there nothing which the counsel for the accused could possibly have had to say in his behalf? does this record shew, that there was nothing which he could have said, pertinent to the case, and beneficial to his client? or that what he intended to say was impertinent? The accused was an infant: suppose it was the intention of the counsel to exhibit him in person to the jury, and submit it to them to determine, whether, considering his tender years, he was doli capax: would not that have been proper? We are not informed by this record, what was the topic of argument on which the counsel intended to insist, or whether he indicated or was permitted to indicate it at all. Now, if it were admitted, that the court might, with strict propriety, have discountenanced a particular topic of argument, as not pertinent to the case, it would by no means follow, that the court was right to inhibit all argument, before a single word was uttered, from which a judgment could be formed of its pertinency or its weight.

I have said thus much, for the purpose of shewing grounds, upon which the court may decide this cause, without touching the general question which this court took up at the former term. I own I have been most anxious to find such grounds; and, if that feeling has not misled my judgment, I have found them. I am very solicitous, that this court should avoid the general question. It is, in my humble opinion, right and wise and perfectly judicial, that the court should avoid it, if it be avoidable.

As an amicus curiæ, as a member of the bar, as a citizen, I should be grieved to see a question of so great interest, of so much delicacy, of such real magnitude, decided in so petty a case as this is; a case so trivial, that the plaintiff in error has not thought it worth while to retain counsel to argue it for him in this court.

I shall, however, proceed to argue the general question; which I take to be this—If, in the trial of any cause, all the evidence offered to the jury be upon one 754 side, and that evidence, *in the opinion of the court, be clear, distinct and direct, and the credit of the witnesses be not impugned; has the court a right to deny to the counsel of the party against whom such evidence is adduced, the privilege insisted on by the counsel, of arguing the question of fact in issue, upon the evidence, before the jury?

As I understand the question, it does not concern the rights of counsel in civil cases, or in prosecutions for petty misdemeanours, only: it concerns the rights of counsel and of their clients, in the trial of the higher misdemeanours, such as perjury, conspiracy, assaults with intent to murder, rob or ravish; nay, of indictments of felony, and even of capital cases. And this court, at the former term, (unwarily I have no doubt,) resolved the question in the affirmative, without making, in the opinion then delivered, any clear discrimination. It was this, indeed, that first attracted my attention to the case. I feel well persuaded, that the court, upon graver consideration, will not hesitate, if it adhere to its first resolution at all, to confine it to civil cases and to prosecutions for the lesser misdemeanours.

But the necessity of making this discrimination, does, in effect, according to my plain sense of things, condemn the whole proposition. For, I apprehend, it will be impossible to find any reason of policy, much more any reason of law, why the privilege of the citizen to defend his property, upon the question of fact before the jury, against the claim of his neighbour, or an amercement at the suit of the commonwealth, should be more restricted, (in the regard in which we are now considering it,) than his privilege to defend his liberty or his life in prosecutions for crime. To allow the distinction, will be to reverse the known principle of the common law, which allowed counsel to the parties in a civil action and to those who were accused of misdemeanours, and denied counsel to persons accused of felonies—counsel, I mean, to argue the questions of fact upon the evidence before the jury. Property, if it be not as valuable, is just as sacred a right, as liberty or life. All civilized nations 755 *so regard it; and the bill of rights of Virginia, particularly, ranks in the same class, and secures on the same footing, ‘the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and obtaining happiness and safety.’ Surely, this court will not give its sanction to a distinction between the means of acquiring and possessing, and the means of defending, property: and surely, too, the plus or minus cannot vary the principle.

Let us, however, consider the question upon the hypothesis, that the proposition is to be confined to trials of civil cases and of the lighter misdemeanours.

The power claimed for the court, is, that it may prevent the argument of the question of fact before the jury, when, in the opinion of the judge, the evidence touching the fact, is clear, distinct and conclusive. If the counsel against whose client the evidence is adduced, be of the same opinion, he will not trouble himself, the court, or the jury, with argument: it is only in cases in which the counsel differs in opinion with the court, that this conflict between the powers of the court and the rights or rather the duties of counsel, is likely to arise. We are speaking of a general principle of practice, to be applied to all counsel; and it will never do to attempt a discrimination between counsel who (in the opinion of the judge) are decorous and judicious, and counsel who are opinative, impertinent or weak. Is it not perceived, that the question always must be, whether the evidence be clear, distinct and conclusive? and that, if the judge, having made up his mind upon that point (which it is not his province to decide), may prevent all argument before the jury upon the evidence, he denies the only means of shewing either to them or to himself, that the evidence is not clear, distinct and conclusive? The claim to exercise such an authority, must always proceed upon a petitio principii. I repeat, that juries often differ with the court, and sometimes repeated juries differ with the court, upon questions of fact, depending upon evidence which the court thinks plain and irresistible;
756 and every judge must remember *many instances, in which doubts and difficulties, and insurmountable objections to the sufficiency of evidence, have been developed by the argument of counsel, that did not occur to him at the first impression.

How is it possible for a judge to determine, whether any argument before the jury can be proper and pertinent, or must be idle and useless, without hearing the argument?

It must be admitted, on all hands, that a party to a civil action or to a prosecution for misdemeanour, has a strict right to a trial by a jury of his country, of every question of fact, upon which his rights, liabilities, or his guilt, may depend: neither, I presume, will it be denied, that, generally speaking, he has a right to demand a hearing by counsel before the jury upon the evidence. The true question is, whether this be an absolute right, which he may claim ex debito justitiæ, like his right to common process, or his right to trial by jury? Or, does the exercise of the privilege depend on the mere permission of the court? Or, is the claim of the privilege to be addressed to the sound discretion of the court? If it depend on the mere permission or allowance of the court; then, it ceases to be a right or privilege in any sense; and it may be lawfully withheld, in cases of most complicated, contradictory, and doubtful evidence, as well as in the simplest and plainest. If it be addressed to the sound discretion of the court; then, as in all other cases addressed to the discretion of the court, either party may except for an injudicious exercise of such discretion; and I do not see, why one party may not object to the allowance of an argument before the jury, where he thinks there ought to be none, just as reasonably as the other party may object to the inhibition of argument, where he thinks it ought to be allowed. It must be so, unless the sound discretion in such cases, is a sound discretion sui generis: Exceptions may be taken on either side—the circumstances spread upon the record—appeals or writs of error prosecuted. How is an appellate court to review the judgment of a circuit court upon any such 757 point? The *words of the witness may, indeed, be spread upon the record—but their characters for intelligence and integrity, for retentiveness or fallacy of memory, their temper towards the parties, their manner, and all the circumstances that affect the weight of viva voce testimony, cannot be spread upon the record. Add to this consideration, the known principle of presumption, that the judgment of an inferior court is right unless the contrary appear; and, then, I think, it will be plain enough, that this discretionary power claimed for the court, to interdict argument upon the evidence before the jury, will amount, very nearly, to an absolute arbitrary power, subject to no control, review or correction.

I admit, without hesitation, the general superintending control of a judge presiding at a nisi prius trial; but that authority cannot extend to the denial of any right or privilege given by law, or to the alteration of any settled rule or principle of practice.

As to the convenience of a power in the judge to put a stop to idle and useless argument before the jury; I venture to affirm, that, if the power be conceded to the judges, and be exercised by them in every case in which they shall conscientiously think its exercise proper, more time of the circuit courts will be wasted in altercations between the bench and bar, worse than idle, and more of the time of the appellate courts, in reviewing the exercise of the power, than can possibly be consumed by the utmost prolixity, pertinacity and obstinacy of counsel; and more vexation to the courts, to the bar and to the suitors, will flow from it, than from any principle of practice that the contempt of old and approved usages (ever fruitful of mischief) could devise.

The dignity of a court of justice is part of its authority, which it is bound, by its duty to the public, carefully to preserve. Altercations between the bench and the bar, do indeed tend to degrade the bar, and to expose it to contempt; but they also tend, and that hardly in a less degree, to detract from the dignity of the court. Respect and delicacy towards the bar, will not fail to conciliate and to command

758 *the respect and veneration, which are certainly due from it towards the bench. In the feelings of the counsel, the feelings of their clients, in other words, of all the suitors in the court, will be sure to participate and unite. I implore the court to close the door to all such altercations between judges and counsel. These sentiments are dictated by a yet more anxious concern for the authority and dignity of the judges, than for the rights of counsel.

It is hardly necessary to add, that I am very far from believing, that, in the case now before the court, any actual oppression was intended; and I trust that nothing I have said will have the least colour of disrespect or want of confidence.

The attorney general told the court, that he had thought it his duty to consider, carefully and impartially, the question presented by the bill of exceptions; and he thought it his duty also to say, that he was clearly of the opinion, that the judgment of the circuit court on that point, was erroneous.

The case stood over until the present term, when almost all the judges of the court being present, the court took it up for consideration.

SCOTT, J., delivered the judgment.

The first error complained of, is, that the summons called the accused to answer a presentment of the grand jury "for unlawful gaming at cards," generally, without specification of time or place: and in support of this objection, it was insisted, that the 21st section of the statute against gaming cures defects in presentments, indictments or informations, for the offence, but does not extend to any irregularity or want of precision in the process. The court is of opinion, that there is nothing in this objection. The object of the summons is to give the party notice, that he is prosecuted for an offence of a particular character, and to apprise him of the time when and the place where he must appear and make his defence. The detail of the particular 759 facts charged with the accompanying circumstances of time and place is supplied by the presentment.

The next error alleged is, that, the defendant being an infant, the court, on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, assigned him a guardian to defend him, and that guardian pleaded for him. This objection the court thinks fatal. Criminal proceedings against infants, ought, in all cases, to be conducted in the same manner as against persons of full age. The defendant, in this case, had a right to appear in person, or by attorney of his own selection; and the circuit court erred in assigning him a guardian, and trying his case on a plea put in by the guardian.†

The bill of exceptions presents a question of much interest; and although the case might be disposed of without a decision of it, yet as there is a very full court, it is thought best, by a majority of the judges, now to decide it. The question is, Whether, in a criminal case, on the trial of a question of fact before the jury, where the evidence is all on the side of the commonwealth, and is unimpeached, and the court

*On this point, the court was unanimous: but LOMAX and FRY, J., were not present at the resolution of it.—Note in Original Edition.

†On this point, the court was also unanimous: but W. BROWNE, FRY, and R. B. TAYLOR, J., were not present at the resolution of it.—Note in Original Edition.

is of opinion, that it is clear and distinct, as to the fact charged, and cannot be varied by argument of counsel, it may, in its discretion, prevent the counsel of the accused from arguing the question of fact before the jury?

It is the right of every party accused to be heard by counsel on his whole case. The credibility of the evidence, is not only a material, but the most if not the only material part of every case which depends on a question of fact. Of this credibility the jury alone are the judges; and they may form their opinions, not only on the characters of the witnesses as persons of truth, but on their manner of giving testimony, their relation to the parties, their opportunities of being correctly informed, and on a variety of other circumstances which may be calculated to affect their judgment. Therefore, 760 his whole case, involves directly the right to be heard on the credibility of the evidence against him. The fact that the evidence is direct to the point in issue, and must establish that point or not, according as the evidence is credible or not, even though coupled with the fact that there is no direct evidence to impeach its credit, does not alter the principle, or present a case to which the principle cannot apply. The only question may be, whether the evidence is credible or not; yet that question may be decided, as above stated, from a variety of circumstances attending the case, other than conflicting testimony, which circumstances the jury alone are to weigh. To deny to the party, therefore, the right to be heard in a case of this kind, is, in effect, to deny him all right of defence whatsoever. It is not for the court to say, beforehand, to what point the counsel means to direct his argument. If there be any point involved in the issue before the jury, on which their minds may be enlightened or their consciences satisfied by argument, the accused has an undoubted right to all the advantage that may be derived from that source; and this right would be utterly destroyed, if it were allowed to the court to prohibit argument, merely because, in its opinion, the evidence is so clear that argument cannot vary it. Neither is this the only case in which an argument before the jury might be of importance to the accused, however direct and uncontradicted the evidence against him might be. We deem it unnecessary, however, to enter more at large into an investigation of the subject, since we have no difficulty in deciding, upon the single view of it above presented, that the court had no right to inhibit argument in the case before us. But while we thus decide, we are not to be understood as restricting, in any degree, the power of the court to prevent an abuse of this or any other right, by exercising a proper control over the course of the argument.

The judgment of the circuit court is to be reversed, all proceedings subsequent to the summons set aside, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

*On this point, SUMMERS, J., dissented.—Note in Original Edition.

761 *The Commonwealth v. Garth.

November, 1827.

Criminal Law—Case Adjourned from Circuit to General Court—Consent of Accused.—Under the provision of the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 60, § 14, a circuit court cannot, in any criminal case, adjourn a question of law arising there, to the general court, without the consent of the person accused, and such consent must be stated in the record; otherwise the general court cannot take jurisdiction of the case.

Same—Instruction—Right of Counsel to Argue against before Jury?—Quære.—Whether in a criminal prosecution for misdemeanour, after the court at the trial has, on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, given an instruction to the jury on a point of law involved in the general issue, and the defendant's counsel has filed exceptions to such instruction, he has a right to controvert the opinion of the court, so given and excepted to, in argument before the jury?

Case adjourned from the circuit court of Albemarle.

The case, and the questions adjourned to this court, were stated by the circuit court, in the following words: "Upon a presentment against the defendant Garth, for unlawful gaming at cards, at the house of I. Raphael, by winning more than twenty dollars in twenty-four hours—after instructions had been applied for by the attorney for the commonwealth, in these words, to wit, that if the jury should be of opinion, that the defendant did win more than twenty dollars in twenty-four hours, namely, the sum of thirty dollars in twenty-four hours, within twelve months before the making of the presentment, and at the place therein mentioned, then it was immaterial whether the defendant won the said sum of money of one person or of several persons, and that if the defendant won the money from several, though not more than twenty dollars from any one, the case came within the 6th section of the statute to prevent unlawful gaming, (1 Rev. Code, ch. 147, p. 563,) and after an exception taken thereto by the defendant's counsel, —the defendant's counsel claimed the privilege of arguing before the jury, that the law was different from what it had been declared to be by the circuit court, or the gen-

Criminal Law—Case Adjourned from Circuit to General Court—Consent of Accused.—In Com. v. Young, 9 Leigh 688, it is said: "The court is unanimously of opinion that it has no jurisdiction to decide the questions adjourned to it, because it does not appear by the record that the adjournment was with the consent of the defendant. See Garth's Case, 3 Leigh 761."

Instructions—Right of Counsel to Argue against before the Jury.—In State v. Dickey, 48 W. Va. 325, 37 S. E. Rep. 608, it is said: "I have above asserted that in Virginia there never was law adequate to sustain the proposition of the right of the jury to decide the law. In Com. v. Garth, 3 Leigh 761, it was regarded as an open question, as manifested by the quære in the case. The eminent JUDGE LEE must have regarded it as unsettled, because in Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. 487 (Syl. point 12), he said: 'In a civil suit (whatever may be the law in a criminal case), after the judge has given an instruction, the counsel should not be allowed to discuss the same matter which the court has already decided.' But I have shown above that Virginia courts decided that in criminal cases counsel should not argue contrary to the instructions of the court."

The principal case is also cited in Davenport v. Com., 1 Leigh 506, which case directly answers the quære in the principal case. Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. 482; *DeJarnette v. eral court; and the attorney for the commonwealth insisting, that the defendant's counsel had no right to take that ground in their argument before the 762 jury, in a misdemeanour *case; the court adjourned to the general court, the following questions: 1. Whether counsel could legally argue against the opinion of the court, in a case like the present, or in any misdemeanour case? and 2. Whether the opinion of the court ought to be asked in any case where it may be controverted before a jury?"

At November term 1827, no counsel appearing for the defendant, the case was submitted to the court without argument—

And SUMMERS, J., delivered the opinion of the court. In considering the first question, the court is necessarily led to the consideration of what constitutes the respective provinces of the judge and of the jury. Almost coeval with the institution of juries, we find the rule laid down, that as to questions of fact the jury shall answer, but in matters of law the judge shall decide; and the fitness of this rule has never been questioned; its application alone has occasioned the controversies which have arisen in this country and in England. It is not now the purpose of the court, to settle the many difficult and delicate questions that may arise in giving effect to the proper authority of each forum. The general principles governing this distribution of power, we think, are concisely and accurately stated, in the following terms—that the immediate and direct right of deciding questions of law, is entrusted to the judges; that in a jury, it is only incidental; and that in the exercise of this incidental right, the latter is not only placed under the superintendence of the former, but are in some degree controllable by them. It is sufficient for the present purpose, that we examine this superintending authority of the court with reference to the case under consideration. In the progress of a trial for a misdemeanour, either the defendant or the prosecutor may require the instructions of the court to the jury, on any question of law arising in the cause, whether directly or only collaterally affecting the issue; and,
by particular direction of the statute,

763 the court is required *to sign and seal any bill of exceptions that may be tendered to its opinion, provided the truth of the case be fairly stated. When instructions are given on incidental questions, although the cause may depend intirely on such decisions, as on the admissibility of documentary evidence, or the competency of witnesses to testify, the right of counsel to discuss before the jury the propriety of the admission or exclusion of the evidence, never has been asserted: the pure legal character of such questions leaves no pretext for arguing them before the jury. Can a different rule prevail, or different rights exist, when instructions are given on questions of law directly involved in the issue, and by which the facts proved are to be examined by the jury? We think not. It never could have been in the mind of the law maker, that, after a solemn adjudication of the court, and that made matter of record, the same question should be open for re-examination before an appellate tribunal, and at the same time open for reconsideration by the jury trying the cause. To admit this principle, as contended for by the defendant's counsel in the circuit court, would be fraught with the most serious mischiefs. In securing to every citizen accused, a fair and impartial trial according to the law of the land, an appeal is given him to this court, for a just interpretation of the law by which he is to be tried, and he is entitled to the operative benefit of such interpretation: but this may be lost to him, if equal rights are possessed by the prosecutor and the defendant in this particular, (which seems to us to be the case) and this new principle shall be interpolated in our criminal proceedings. If the superintending authority of the court be admitted, it follows as a necessary consequence that the right now claimed cannot be conceded: they are in conflict with each other: to admit the latter, is to deny the former, as to every beneficial purpose. A superintending authority in the court cannot exist, if its operation is to be referred to the discretion of the jury, and argument may be addressed to them to shew that they ought to disregard it. If counsel have 764 the right of appealing from *the court to the jury, on the interpretation of the law, the right must equally exist of discussing before the jury, the force and authority of acts of assembly whenever any colourable ground may be supposed to exist; and the wisdom and constitutionality of legislative enactments, may thus become the topics of inquiry, whenever a jury is engaged in a criminal trial. That juries may take upon themselves the decision of both the law and the fact, is not questioned. Happily for us, the doctrine of attain is unknown to our code, and our juries are exempt from any restraint on the honest exercise of their judgments. This power, however, extends also to civil causes; and it is unaffected by the prohibition of new trials in criminal cases, after a verdict of acquittal; since this distinction is not referrible to the rights or the powers of juries, but has its foundation in principles intirely unconnected with them. In neither class of cases can the jury receive evidence of facts which it is their peculiar province to decide, without the court first passing upon its competency; and it would seem to follow, a fortiori, that they must be protected from misrepresentations of the law which is to be applied to such facts. We are aware that the principles here stated, and the reasons we have assigned, may be applied to capital cases, as well as prosecutions for misdemeanours: but, in cases affecting life or liberty, we think the practice of the courts, and the considerations on which it is founded, not only warrants the course, now generally pursued, of reserving instructions (except on collateral points) until the arguments to the jury are closed, but enjoins that order in conducting such trials.

This court is of opinion and doth decide, that counsel cannot legally argue against the opinion of the court, in a case like the present, or in any misdemeanour case. And this opinion renders an opinion on the second question unnecessary.*

765 *After this opinion had been announced, the court, in consequence of a suggestion from the bar, suspended its judgment, and ordered the cause to be continued, and at the same time requested the bar to aid the court with its views of the question.

Leigh, as amicus curiæ, submitted the following written argument to the court:

Here is another instance (alluding to the preceding case of Word v. The Commonwealth) of a question of most serious importance raised and referred to this the supreme criminal tribunal in the land, in a case the most trivial imaginable; so trivial, that the party accused has not retained counsel to argue his cause in this forum, and obviously has little or no concern about its result. The proceeding has, to me, rather the air of mooted curious points of law, than of the grave argument and solemn adjudication of causes. It were easy, I should think, for the circuit courts, in all cases like this, to avoid, as according to my notions of propriety they ought carefully to avoid, the course that has been taken in the present case: and (beseeching the pardon for expressing the sentiment, if in the sense of the court it savour of presumption, for, indeed, it is dictated by no such unworthy feeling) I cannot forbear the expression of my earnest wish and hope, that an instance of the like kind may never be repeated. At the same time, in regard to this particular case, I feel personally the strongest assurance, that the adjournment of it is justly attributable to the spirit of indulgence of the judge of the circuit court towards the counsel of the party accused.

Looking only to the record, I am at a loss to understand, upon what ground it was supposed proper, regular or legal, to adjourn this case to this court.

The circuit court law (1 Rev. Code, ch. 69, § 14, pp. 231, 2,) provides, "that the said [circuit] courts, when a question new or difficult arises, may adjourn any matter of law to the general court; or any party thinking himself aggrieved 766 *by the judgment of the said courts, may appeal thereupon as of right, or obtain a writ of error thereto from the court of appeals at the discretion of the court. And the said [circuit] courts, in any criminal case, may, with the consent of the party accused, adjourn a question of law to the general court, which may be there argued and decided, though such accused person be not present." Now, it is quite plain, that the first sentence of this section, authorizing the adjournment to this court of questions new and difficult, at the pleasure of the circuit courts, relates wholly to civil cases; to cases, namely, which if the circuit court decide instead of adjourning, the party thinking himself aggrieved, may appeal from the judgment as of right, or obtain a writ of error thereto from the court of appeals; but, from a judgment in a criminal case, there can be no appeal as of right to any tribunal, nor has the court of appeals any jurisdiction to allow a writ of error. We must look for the authority of a circuit court to adjourn a criminal case to the general court, to the last sentence of the section; and there it is manifest, that the consent of the party accused is necessary to authorize the adjournment. In this case, no such consent is stated in the record. Therefore, this case, here, is coram non iudice.

Again—I really cannot ascertain from the record, whether the questions adjourned in fact arose at the trial or not. The record states, that "after instructions had been applied for by the attorney for the commonwealth," to the purpose set forth, "and an exception taken thereto by the defendant's counsel,—the defendant's counsel claimed the privilege of arguing before the jury, that the law was different from what it had been declared to be by the court, and by the general court." It is not expressly stated, that the court had given the instruction, which the attorney for the commonwealth applied for; nor does it certainly appear, whether the defendant excepted to the instruction given by the court, or to the propriety of giving any instruction at all in that stage of the trial. Unless the 767 instruction was in fact *given, the question could not arise, whether the defendant's counsel had a right to contest the correctness of the instruction before the jury. I should infer, from the expression, "that the defendant's counsel claimed the privilege of contending that the law was different from what it had been declared to be by the court, or by the general court," that the court had given the instruction set forth as having been asked; and my mind certainly inclines to this interpretation of the record: but, on the other hand, from the second question adjourned to this court—"whether the opinion of the court ought to be asked in any case where it may be controverted before a jury"—it might be inferred, that the contest in the circuit court turned on the propriety of giving instructions at that stage of the trial. It does not appear with sufficient certainty, that any of the points adjourned arose at the trial: the maxim is, certa debet esse intentio et narratio, et certum fundamentum, et certa res quæ deducitur in iudicium. Co. Litt. 303, a. But, apart from this view, it is absolutely certain, that, so far as the first of the adjourned questions extends beyond "a case like the present," to "any misdemeanour case," this comprehensive question touching all misdemeanour cases, did not and could not arise in the present case. This will be rendered more manifest in the sequel.

Has it been decided by the general court, that if a person win more than twenty dollars in twenty-four hours, at the same place, it is immaterial whether he win it of one person or of several; that, if he win more than that sum of several, though not more than that sum of any one, he offends against the 6th section of the statute against gaming? If the court has so decided, I humbly submit, that the point deserves re-consideration. That 6th section of the statute (1 Rev. Code, ch. 147, p. 563,) .

*In this opinion, JUDGES JOHNSTON, DANIEL ALLEN, SAUNDERS, DADE, BOULDIN, FIELD and SUMMERS, concurred; JUDGES BROCKENBROUGH and SEMPLE, dissented.—Note in Original Edition.

provides, that "if any person, by playing or betting at any game or wager whatsoever, at any time within the space of twenty-four hours, shall win or lose to another [in the singular] a greater sum or any thing of greater value than 768 twenty dollars, the winner *and loser [in the singular] shall be liable to pay" the penalty therein prescribed. The 3d section of the statute (Id. p. 562,) provides, that "if any person or persons whatsoever [in the plural], at any time hereafter, within the space of twenty-four hours, by playing at any game or games whatsoever, or by betting on the sides or hands of such as do play at any game or games, shall lose to any one or more person or persons [in the plural] so playing or betting, the sum or value of seven dollars or more, in the whole, and shall pay or deliver the same or any part thereof, the person or persons [in the plural] so losing and paying or delivering the same, shall be at liberty, within three months then next following, to sue for and recover the money or goods so lost and paid or delivered, or any part thereof, from the respective winner or winners thereof [in the plural] with costs of suit" &c. The provision quoted from the 3d section, is altogether retributive; that quoted from the 6th, is altogether punitive. It is plain that the 6th section does not design to make all playing and betting criminal; it makes the criminality depend on the extent to which the playing and betting is carried; and the difference of its phraseology from that of the 3d section is too marked to have been accidental. Does it, or may it, vary the extent or excess to which the playing or betting, inhibited by the 6th section, is carried, if the sum of more than twenty dollars be won of several persons, and not of one? Is not the winning of that sum of one, indicative of a greater extent or excess of gaming, than the winning the same sum of several? If so, then the winning it of several, is a lesser degree of gaming, than that which the provision punishes—and that it is so, seems to me quite clear. If, for example, four persons sit down to whist, and cut for partners anew after each rubber; when one of them has lost twenty dollars to one other of them, it is more than probable that he has lost to the two others at least twenty dollars more. Therefore, it seems to me, that the offence which the 6th section of the statute was intended to punish, is 769 that degree of gaming indicated *by the winning of more than twenty dollars of one and the same person. The provision of the 29th section of the statute (Id. p. 570,) that the laws against gaming shall be interpreted as remedial and not as penal statutes, cannot, I apprehend, affect the point. If the statute make gaming criminal, only when carried to a certain degree; if it make the criminality depend upon the degree; to hold that gaming short of that degree is criminal, is to hold that to be criminal, which according to the law is innocent. If gaming to a certain degree only is inhibited by the statute as mischievous, gaming short of that degree, is not within the mischief which the statute intended to prevent.

The court will easily discern my solicitude, that it should avoid the question, which, when this case was under consideration at a former term, it was supposed proper to examine and to resolve; and it will as easily penetrate the motive of that solicitude. But though it is my wish that the court should avoid the decision of that very interesting question upon the present occasion, it is neither my design nor my wish to avoid the discussion of it.

The question I understand to be this—Whether on the trial before a jury of the general issue of guilty or not guilty, upon an indictment, information or presentment for a misdemeanour, the accused has a right to be heard by counsel before the jury, on any and every point of law, as well as of fact, involved in the issue, and, if in the course of the trial the court give an opinion upon a point of law whereof a general verdict will amount to a decision, to contest the correctness of such opinion in argument before the jury?

The general subject to which the question relates, is one that cannot have escaped the attention, or failed to exercise the reflection, of every counsel at all versed in criminal causes. It very early, and has very often engaged mine: and I beg leave to state, succinctly and candidly, the opinion, which I have always entertained on the subject, and which every new examination of it has more and more confirmed—

770 *not because I have the presumption to think my individual opinion of any value or weight, but because I know no better way of stating the propositions I propose to maintain.

I hold, then, that in all criminal cases without exception, by the law of Virginia, the party accused having a right to trial by jury, has also a right to make full defence by counsel before the jury: that the jury has not merely the arbitrary power, but a strict legal right, to hear and to decide every question of law, as well as of fact, involved in the general issue of guilty or not guilty; and whatever question the jury has a right to decide, upon that question the party has a right to be heard by counsel before the jury: that it is also the undoubted right and the duty of the court, whenever in its opinion the occasion requires it, to charge, instruct or advise the jury, upon the law of the case, as applicable to the facts in proof: that the jury owes the highest respect to the opinion or advice of the court touching the law of the case, and ought, in prudence, generally, to follow it as the surest guide; yet they are no-wise bound to give implicit faith to the court; for, if the jury do conscientiously differ from the court as to the law, and the opinion of the court, if followed, would convict, and that of the jury, if persisted in, would acquit, the accused, it is the right and the most solemn duty of the jury to follow its own opinion of the law, and to acquit; but the converse of this last position can never be right. It was part of the design of the institution of jury trial, to shield the accused from the court. And as to the precise question, Whether the accused, or (which is the same thing) his counsel, has a right to contest the opinion of the court on any point of law, given to the jury at the trial; the resolution of this question depends, I think, mainly if not intirely on the course and order of proceeding. If, before the accused has had an opportunity to make full defence by counsel before the jury, the court, of its own accord, or at the instance of the counsel for the prosecution, instruct the jury as 771 to the *law of the case, the court and prosecutor cannot, by thus anticipating the full defence, both as to law and fact, which the accused has the right of making by counsel before the jury, deprive him of the right to make such defence; and in such case, therefore, the counsel of the accused has a right to contest the correctness of the opinion of the court, in argument to the jury. But if, in any stage of the trial, the accused by his counsel pray the opinion of the court on the law, or on any point of law applicable to the case, he cannot afterwards contest the correctness of the opinion before the jury. And if after the counsel for the prosecution and the counsel for the accused have been fully heard before the jury, upon the whole case, the court of its own accord (as it justly may) or at the instance of either party, or of the jury, give its opinion to the jury, upon the questions of law raised and discussed, in the argument; the counsel for the accused, having been already fully heard, has no right to renew the debate, and to contest the correctness of the opinion of the court so given, before the jury.

Let us first consider how stands the legal right of the accused, to make full defence by counsel before the jury, in prosecutions for felony.

The common law denied counsel to the accused upon the general issue, on charges of felony or treason, but in cases of mere misdemeanour or any offence less than felony, always allowed the right of the party indicted to a full defence by counsel. 1 Chitt. crim. law, 409. The statute of 7 Will. 3, c. 3, § 1, enacted, that all persons accused of treason, such as works corruption of blood, should be admitted to make their full defence by counsel. In Virginia, at all times, before as well as since the revolution, all persons indicted of felony, have been allowed the same benefit of a full defence by counsel, as is given by the statute of William III. to persons indicted of treason; and the act of 1786, c. 57, (1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 27, p. 607,) directs, that 772 the court shall allow every person charged with *treason or felony, counsel to assist him at his trial, if he desire it. The amendments to the constitution of the U. States (art. 6,) secures to the accused, in all criminal prosecutions, the right to have the assistance of counsel for their defence.

Now, I pray the court to look at any of the trials for treason in England, since the provision of the statute of William III. that persons accused of treason should be admitted to make their full defence by counsel, in order to see the constant, uniform, practical exposition of this privilege of making full defence by counsel. Take, for instance, the trial of lord George Gordon in 1781, and the trial of Thomas Hardy in 1794—it will be found, that in both those cases, and in all others where any such question of law could arise, the counsel for the crown and the counsel for the accused, discussed the doctrine of constructive treason at large before the jury, and that the court forbore to give its opinion upon the law, until the counsel had been fully heard upon it by the jury; that the counsel for the crown and for the prisoner, and the court itself, addressed all their arguments upon the law to the jury.

In judge Chase's charge to the jury, in the case of Fries (2 vol. Chase's trial, append.) he said—"It is the duty of the court to state to the jury their opinion of the law arising on the facts; but the jury are to decide, in the present and in all criminal cases, both the law and the facts, on their consideration of the whole case." Again, in conclusion—"If upon consideration of the whole matter (law as well as fact) you are not fully satisfied without any doubt, that the prisoner is guilty of the treason charged in the indictment, you will find him not guilty; but if, upon the consideration of the whole matter (law as well as fact) you are convinced that the prisoner is guilty of the treason charged in the indictment, you will find him guilty." The history of this charge in the case of Fries, deserves to be recalled to memory. Nobody now doubts that the charge stated the law of treason with perfect correctness; 773 nobody, I believe, ever *entertained any serious doubt of it. But the judge prepared the charge, before the trial commenced; and made out three copies of it, one of which he handed to the counsel for the U. States, one to the counsel for the prisoner, and the other was intended to be delivered to the jury. It was no otherwise published: it was not read from the bench. The prisoner's counsel, justly offended at this attempt to anticipate the prisoner's right to make full defence by counsel before the jury, withdrew from the cause. The court, on the next day, sensible of its error, made the fullest retraction, and urged them to proceed in the defence, offering to allow them the utmost latitude of argument upon the law, before the jury. The counsel complained, that the court had prejudged the case; in other words, had formed and written its opinion, before they had been heard on the law, before the jury; for they declared, they had no intention to argue the law of the case before the court. And for forming this opinion, and signifying that he had formed it, before the prisoner had had the opportunity of making his full defence, upon the law as well as the facts of the case, before the jury, judge Chase was impeached.

The court will also recollect the numerous cases that have occurred, of trials before each and every judge upon the bench, in cases of felony, in which the prisoner's counsel have entered at large into the whole law of the case, before the jury; and the jury has retired without a word said by the court upon the subject.

I do not see, that more conclusive authority can be desired, to shew the correctness of my general view of the law upon the subject, so far as it relates to the relative powers and duties of the court and of the jury, and the rights of the accused and his counsel, in cases of prosecutions for felony. In the opinion delivered by this court, in the present case, at a former term, the correctness of the proposition I am now maintaining, is in a manner admitted; but the rights of the accused are there placed on wrong ground, and ground too, which strikes me as very precarious and *unsatisfactory. The court 774 said—"We are aware, that the principles here stated, and the reasons we have assigned, may be applied to capital cases, as well as to prosecutions for misdemeanours: but in cases affecting life or liberty, we think the practice of the courts and the considerations on which it is founded, not only warrant the course now generally pursued, of reserving instructions (except on collateral points) until the arguments to the jury are closed, but enjoin that order in conducting such trials." I contend, that the right of the accused in cases of prosecutions for felony, to make full defence by counsel before the jury, upon the law as well as the facts of the case, rests on the firm basis of law; on the same basis, on which rests the right to trial by jury: and I cannot be content, that it should be placed on the ground of mere practice, and a practice too, which stands reprobated by the reasoning of the court in cases of misdemeanour, and this reasoning declared to be equally applicable to both cases. And where, I beg leave most respectfully to ask, has the practice of the courts of justice, alluded to in the opinion, prevailed? Certainly in no court with the proceedings of which I have ever been conversant. The practice has been, that the court abstains from giving any charge to the jury, either before the argument of counsel begins or after it is closed, unless desired to do so.

Is there any difference between the legal powers and rights of juries, and the legal rights of the accused and his counsel, in cases of misdemeanour, and in cases of felony?

I must, in the first place, repeat the passage before cited from 1 Chitt. crim. law, p. 409, that, while the common law denied the benefit of counsel upon the general issue, on indictments for felony, in cases of mere misdemeanours, or any offences less than felony, it does not appear, that the right of the party indicted to a full defence by advocates, has ever been disputed. The distinction contended for, is a reversal of the principle of the common law: and by what statute of Virginia, by what precedents, by what approved and established practice of our courts, can a distinction so anomalous be justified?

775 *In the trial of Calender for a libel, before the circuit court of the U. States for the district of Virginia, in May 1800, Mr. Wirt, of counsel for the accused, contended, that he had a right to argue the constitutionality of the sedition law before the jury. Mr. Nicholas, in his evidence given at the trial of judge Chase, gives this account of what passed on that occasion—"Mr. Wirt then addressed the court. He said he had not considered the case elaborately; that it appeared to him so clearly that the jury had the right contended for, that he did not imagine it required any great research to prove it. He then proceeded to state, that it was certainly the right of the jury, to consider of and determine both law and fact: Mr. Chase here remarked, that Mr. Wirt need not give himself trouble on that point—we all know, said he, that the jury have a right to decide the law. Mr. Wirt then said, he supposed it equally clear, that the constitution is the law: yes, sir, said Mr. Chase, the supreme law. If then, said Mr. Wirt, the jury have a right to decide on the law, and if the constitution is the law, it follows, syllogistically, that they have a right to decide on the constitutionality of the law in question. A non sequitur, said judge Chase. Here Mr. Wirt sat down." Thus, the opinion of judge Chase is clearly expressed, against this distinction which has been asserted between trials for misdemeanours and trials for felonies. And though he would not allow counsel to argue the constitutionality of the sedition law before the jury, he offered to hear any argument addressed to the court, to prove the right of the jury, to consider and try the question of constitutionality. See 1 vol. Chase's trial, p. 188.

In England, there was an anomalous doctrine, touching cases of libel, acknowledged to be applicable to no other cases whatever—that, in a trial for a libel, the sole province of the jury was to find the fact of publication, and the truth of the innuendos; that the jury had no right to inquire into the guilt or innocence of the author's intentions, or into the question whether the paper prosecuted was libellous or 776 not; *that a verdict of guilty, left those points undecided—because these were questions of law, which it belonged to the court to decide upon the record. This doctrine has been clearly traced up to the days of lord chief justice Holt. And yet, long before the declaratory act of 32 Geo. III, c. 60, by which the doctrine was exploded, it was the constant practice of the counsel for the accused in cases of libel, to argue the points, which the courts had uniformly held to be points of law, and as uniformly instructed the juries that they were points they had no right to inquire into; and, moreover, to argue before the jury, that it was their province to decide those very points. I need only to refer to Mr. Erskine's defence of The Dean of St. Asaph. I am quite sure, there is not a single instance of counsel pursuing this course of argument, being interrupted by the court, or of the counsel for the crown attempting to forestal the argument, by praying an instruction from the court.

I confess myself wholly at a loss for any reason for this distinction, which admits the right of the accused to make full defence by counsel before the jury, both as to law and fact, in cases of felony, and denies the same right to a person accused of misdemeanours. There are many misdemeanours which are more heinous crimes, and punished with greater severity, than many felonies. Libel, riot, conspiracy, perjury and subornation of perjury, bribery and corruption, assaults with intent to maim, rob, ravish or murder; all these are only misdemeanours, though they are punishable with fine at the discretion of a jury, and imprisonment at the discretion of the court. The keeping and exhibiting of A. B. C. or E. O. tables, &c. is no more than a misdemeanour; and yet it is, or lately was, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, as well as by fine. The persons employed in carrying the mail, or in the post offices, who shall purloin money from a letter, are, by the laws of the U. States, guilty only of a misdemeanour; yet they are punishable with ten years imprisonment.

777 *A distinction has sometimes been attempted between the power of the jury, and the right of the jury, to decide the law as well as the fact, in criminal cases; a distinction, which my mind has never been capable of comprehending. The question is, whether the jury, as a judicial tribunal, be competent to the decision of the law? If the jury be incompetent to decide the law, it is immaterial whether they decide it right or wrong, according or contrary to the opinion of the court; their fault consists in the usurpation of a power which does not belong to them, and their opinion is a mere nullity. If they be competent to decide the law, the very definition of competency is a rightful legal power of judicature.

If any doubt shall remain on the subject of the right of juries, in all criminal cases, to decide the whole case, law as well as fact, either according or contrary to the opinion of the court, I think that doubt cannot fail to be removed by the argument of Mr. Erskine, on the motion for the new trial, in the case of The Dean of St. Asaph, 21 Howell's St. Tri. 971. That argument turns on the very points we are considering; and it was universally allowed to be conclusive, in regard to all cases but trials for libel, as to which there existed that peculiar doctrine before stated.

If a person accused of misdemeanour have an undoubted right to make full defence by counsel before the jury, and if the jury be undoubtedly competent to decide the law, as well as the fact of the case; I really do not see how the inference can be resisted, that the counsel have a right to discuss before the jury every question of whatever nature, which the jury has a right to decide. And to me it seems, that the principle holds good in all criminal cases—murder and petty larceny—the most aggravated misdemeanour punishable by forfeiture and imprisonment, and the most petty, punishable by pecuniary penalty. The difference in the degree of the punishment cannot change the nature of the trial; nor restrain either the legal power of the jury,

778 or the *right of the accused to make full defence by counsel, as to the whole case, law and fact. It is competent to a jury trying the general issue in a civil case, to find directly against the opinion of the court upon the law of it. At common law the jury might be attainted, for such a false verdict at the suit of the party injured; but no attainder ever lay for the crown against a jury finding a verdict of acquittal in a criminal case—this is acknowledged by Lord Mansfield, 21 How. St. Tri. 985. According to the modern practice, in civil cases, the court corrects the error of the jury, by granting a new trial; but if a jury find a verdict of acquittal in any criminal case, there can be no new trial granted however contrary the verdict may be to the law or to the evidence.

It is an established rule, in all our courts of justice, not to allow counsel to contest the correctness of an opinion of the court upon a point of law, given in the course of the trial of any civil case: and without doubt, the rule is correct. For, the court may grant a new trial, if the obstinacy or opiniativeness of the jury lead them to find against its instruction upon the law; and to allow argument to induce the jury to do a vain thing, were only to countenance the prolongation of controversy, without benefit to either party, and to the injury of both, as it necessarily increases the expense of litigation. The party against whom the judgment of the court is given, in a civil case, may appeal of right to a superiour tribunal, where the judgment will be reviewed; in no criminal case, can the accused, if the judgment of the court which tries his cause, be against him, appeal without assigning error. Besides, the practice has always prevailed in Virginia, and is now firmly established, for the courts, in civil cases, to abstain from giving charges to the jury, summing up the evidence, and explaining the law, after the argument of counsel is closed; and, instead of such charges, which counsel have no where been allowed to controvert before the jury, our courts give instructions, in the progress of the trial, if prayed, on 779 the *points of law as they arise; and such instructions ought no more to be open to contest, than the charges to the jury, for which they have been substituted.

Prolix as this argument may seem, I have excluded from it, for the sake of brevity, many topics which I thought pertinent and just.

The attorney general also gave the court his opinion on the case, and the reasons of it: he held, that the first question adjourned ought to be decided in the negative.

The case having stood over till the present term, BROCKENBROUGH, J., now delivered the unanimous resolution of the court, That this court had no jurisdiction to decide the questions adjourned to it. He said—This is a criminal prosecution against the defendant for unlawful gaming. The circuit court had adjourned to this court certain questions of law that arose there; but it does not appear by the record, that the adjournment was with the consent of the defendant. The statute provides, that "the circuit courts, in any criminal case, may, with the consent of the person accused, adjourn a question of law to the general court." Without such consent the case could not properly be adjourned, and this court has no jurisdiction of it. We have always decided, that such consent must appear by the record, and cannot be presumed. The case is to be remanded to the circuit court &c.

780 Osiander v. The Commonwealth.*

July, 1881.

[28 Am. Dec. 603.]

Criminal Law — Jurors — Opinion Formed — Competency.—A person called as a juror in a criminal case, and examined as to his indifference on his voire dire, declared, he had heard reports concerning the case in the country, and a state of the circumstances from one of the witnesses, and had formed a hypothetical opinion, but he believed it would not influence his mind as a juror: he believed the account he had heard of the case at the time he heard it, (and he did not now express any doubt of its truth): if the evidence at the trial should correspond with the account he had heard, his former opinion would remain, but if it should be different, he felt satisfied he should be able to decide the cause, without being influenced by what he had before heard, and without prejudice: and it did not appear, that the witness had ever before expressed the opinion he had so formed.—Held, such preconceived hypothetical opinion did not constitute good cause of challenge to the juror.

Same—Same—What Preconceived Opinion Is Good Cause for Challenge.—To constitute good cause of challenge to a juror, on the ground of preconceived opinion of the case formed by him, it must appear, that such preconceived opinion was a decided one. Same—Same—Opinion Formed—Necessity of Expressing—Quere.—If a person call as a juror has formed a decided opinion of the case out of doors, it is necessary that he should have also expressed such opinion, to constitute it good cause of challenge to him as a juror?

Osiander was indicted for grand larceny in the circuit court of Campbell, tried and convicted, and sentenced to two years imprisonment in the penitentiary. In impanelling the jury, one Love was called as a juror, and, at the prisoner's instance, was examined on oath, "whether he had formed and expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner in relation to the charge alleged in the indictment?" On which examination, Love said, "he had heard the reports of the country, and thought he had heard one of the witnesses state the circumstances, and he had formed a hypothetical opinion on what he had heard, but believed it would not influence his mind as a trier of the cause: if the evidence should correspond with the representations he had heard, his former opinion would remain; but if the proof should be different, he felt satisfied he should be able to decide the case without any influence from what he had before heard on the subject." In answer to an interrogatory of the prisoner's counsel, he further said,

781 "that 'he had no doubt of the truth of the reports at the time of hearing the same (and he expressed no doubt on this examination), and that if the same facts should be satisfactorily proved on the trial, he would come to the same conclusion; but that, if the proof should change or alter the case from the reports he had heard of it, he felt satisfied—he had no doubt—that he would be able to decide the case according to the evidence, without being in any degree influenced by the reports he had heard, or the impression which they had made on his mind.'" Whereupon the prisoner challenged the juror for cause: namely, "on the ground that he had formed an opinion, as disclosed upon his examination:" but the court being of opinion that there was no legal objection to the juror, overruled the challenge; to which opinion the prisoner filed a bill of exceptions. And now he presented a petition to this court, complaining that the circuit court erred in overruling the prisoner's challenge to Love, for cause, and praying a writ of error to the judgment.

C. R. Baldwin, for the petitioner. An opinion is hypothetical, when it depends on the question either of the truth, or of the legal effect of the evidence: the mind is undecided as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, so long as it doubts whether the facts are true as represented, or if true, whether they constitute or prove the crime alleged. In this case, no doubt, in either respect, existed in the mind of the juror Love. He said, he had no doubt of the truth of the facts, as he had heard them: and he could have had no doubt as to the legal effect of them; for he said, that if the same facts should be proved at the trial, he would come to the same conclusion; his former opinion would remain. How, then, was Love's opinion hypothetical? His opinion was, in effect, a substantial, decided one, though called hypothetical; and an opinion, too, not lightly and hastily taken up, or founded on mere rumour, but deliberately formed upon a statement of the facts by one of the witnesses in the cause, strengthened and confirmed by the reports of the country.

782 *In Sprouse's case, 2 Virg. Ca.

375, the court, speaking of an opinion that would be good cause of principal challenge, said, it was an opinion formed on reflection. In that case, the juror Wiant had formed a pretty substantial opinion, upon relations of the evidence which he believed to be true: so had the juror Love, in the present case. There, Wiant had not heard the evidence, or conversed with any of the witnesses, and his opinion was founded only on rumours in the country: but here, Love had heard a state of the facts from one of the witnesses, and his opinion was founded on that statement and upon the reports of the country. Wiant thought that as a juror he could do the prisoner justice, and declared he felt no prejudice, and was open to conviction. Love felt satisfied, that if the proof should alter the case from the reports of it which he had heard—that is, only in that case—he would be able to decide the cause according to the evidence, uninfluenced by the reports he had heard or the impression they had made on his mind; a tacit admission, that, without a change in the evidence of the facts, the opinion he had formed would remain unaltered, and was not to be removed by any argument of the prisoner's counsel, or by any information from the court as to the law applicable to the case.

In Pollard's case, 5 Rand. 659, the juror Parker had heard the testimony of one of the witnesses, and had formed an opinion at the time he heard it, but he declared, in very strong terms, that at the time of the trial, he had no prejudice against the prisoner or his cause: it did not appear that he had, then, any existing opinion: his first impression, hastily formed, without deliberation or reflection, had probably been abandoned. In the present case, the opinion Love had formed, was in its real character a decided one, existing at the time of the trial.

In Brown's case, 2 Leigh, 769, the objection to the juror was held insufficient, because it did not appear that he had formed and expressed a decided opinion. It is true, in this case, that the epithet decided 783 is not prefixed to the word *opinion; the juror, Love, said he had formed a hypothetical opinion. But judging from the explanation he gave, he probably did not understand the import of the phrase he used; for that shews, plainly enough, that his opinion was absolute, fixed and decided. In his actual state of mind, the juror had no doubt; but if the evidence should alter the state of the case from that on which he had formed his opinion, he thought he would be able to decide the case, uninfluenced by the reports he had heard, or the impressions they had made on his mind. Perhaps he might; but was he, therefore, an indifferent juror?

The evidence might present the case in a different aspect, and yet leave a striking resemblance: could the court or the juror be sure, that his first impressions would change with the varying hues and colours given to the case by the evidence at the trial? On the contrary, would he not be apt to view every circumstance as corroborative of his preconceived opinion? and if the prominent features of the case as proved, were found like those of the case as reported, might he not, very probably, disregard minor, yet material, points of difference? In cases depending on circumstantial evidence, differences in the testimony, apparently slight, may destroy the connexion of the circumstances; and to break a single link, is to destroy the whole chain. The evidence may leave very strong doubts of a prisoner's guilt, on the mind of a juror, wholly unprejudiced, while a juror prepossessed with information out of doors, and with an opinion formed upon it, will hardly be able to separate the proof in court from the information he has received out of court, or his present from his former impressions. Therefore, however confident the juror, in this case, may have been of his own capacity to give the prisoner a fair trial, it seems to me, that the law should distrust him.

It may be said, that the opinion which Love had formed, had not been previously expressed. It does not appear that it was. But it is not the mere giving expression to an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of a person accused, without 784 *any regard to the character of the opinion expressed, that can disqualify the person expressing it from being a juror in the case. Terrell in Sprouse's case, Parker in Pollard's, and the juror in Brown's, had each expressed the opinion he had formed. Doubtless, a man may be somewhat more committed after he has publicly expressed an opinion, than when it is known only to himself: still the court will look at something more than the expression: it will look into the opinion itself, and see whether it was hasty, and really hypothetical, and founded on vague rumours, or deliberately and decisively formed upon a probable state of the facts. I can find no case, in which it has been adjudged that the opinion must have been expressed. In England, the triers are sworn well and truly to try whether the jurymen stands indifferent between the parties to the issue; and the trial proceeds by witnesses. They may examine the jurymen challenged, on his voire dire, as to the leaning of his affections; but he cannot be interrogated, whether he has previously declared his opinion that the prisoner is guilty: such a declaration would be considered as tending to his own disgrace. 1 Chitt. crim. law, 550. But it may be proved by witnesses. The appeal to the conscience of the juror, is to enable the triers to judge of his indifference; and if he has never expressed his opinions, there can be no other way of ascertaining whether he is indifferent or not. The question always is, simply, whether the juror stands indifferent? If his opinion has been formed on a state of facts which he fully believed to be true, and continues to believe, can he be held to be an indifferent juror, merely because he has never before expressed the opinion. He may be a just man; he may have no malice against the accused; he may feel compassion for him; but if he fully believes him guilty, he is prejudiced against his cause; and his mind, thus prepossessed, will naturally struggle against the conviction of the prisoner's innocence, which, otherwise, the testimony might be well calculated to produce.

785 *SCOTT, J. The cases heretofore decided by this court, have settled, that one who has formed and expressed a decided opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, is not a competent juror; and that it is not material, whether that opinion be founded on the evidence of witnesses whose testimony he may have heard, upon another trial, or conversations with witnesses, or common report; it is enough, that the opinion is a decided one, and has been expressed. The expression of an opinion goes far to shew that it is a decided one. It is, in general, not so readily abandoned as one which never has been avowed. No case, however, has gone the length of deciding, that an opinion, however deliberately it may have been formed, and however decided its character, is not a disqualification, unless it has been expressed. Nor does the court think it necessary to give any opinion on that question on the present occasion; being unanimously of opinion, that the impressions of the juror, in this case, were not of that deliberate and decided character which is necessary to disqualify a juror. He stated, that his opinion was hypothetical, and although he did not doubt the truth of what he had heard, yet, if the evidence turned out otherwise, he had no doubt but that he would be able to decide according to the evidence, without being in any degree influenced by the impressions made on his mind by what he had heard. An opinion, which is declared by the party entertaining it, to be hypothetical, one which will not in any degree influence his decision, cannot be a decided one; it cannot have been formed on deliberation.

Writ of error denied.

786 *Vass v. The Commonwealth.

July, 1881.

[24 Am. Dec. 695.]

Evidence—Dying Declarations—When Admissible*—Case at Bar.—A person, having received a mortal wound, and being unable, in consequence of the wound, for the greater part of the interval that elapsed before his death, to speak at all, and when able to speak, only able to utter a short word or two, yet retaining his perfect senses and understanding, and being under apprehension of his approaching death,—is asked, Did P. V. strike you first? to which he answered, yes, sir: Did P. V. stab you? to which he also answered, yes, sir: Do you think you are going to die? to which he again answered, yes, sir: and is asked a fourth question, which he is unable to answer, but it does not appear what this fourth question was, or whether it had any relation to the subject, or at what interval after the three first it was put to the dying man—Held, these are such death-bed declarations, being distinct and complete in themselves, as were competent evidence on the trial of P. V. on an indictment for the homicide.

Same—Same—Incomplete—Admissibility.—But, if it had appeared, that the declarations were designed by the dying man, to be connected with and qualified by other statements, and with them to form an entire complete narrative, and before the proposed disclosure was fully made, it had been interrupted, and the narrative left unfinished: such partial declarations would not have been competent evidence.

Same—Same—In Answer to Leading Questions—Effect.—The objection, that the questions to which the answers of the dying man were given, were leading questions, is not properly applicable in such a case.

Philip Vass was indicted for the murder of Henry Polly in the circuit court of Halifax, tried, convicted of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to ten years imprisonment in the penitentiary.

It appeared at the trial, that the deceased was the prisoner's overseer, and was first seen, after he received the wound of which he died (a stab with a knife), in the prisoner's house. No competent witness was present when the mortal wound was inflicted; and, from that time till his death, he was, for much the greater part of the time, unable, in consequence of the wound, to speak at all, and when he was able to speak, he could only utter a short word or two at a time. He received the wound Thursday night, and he lived till the Sunday following:

Dying Declarations—Grounds for Admissibility.—The rule of law on the subject of the admissibility of dying declarations is now well settled, that to render such declarations admissible in evidence, they must be shown to have been made when the declarant was under a sense of impending death, and without any expectation or hope of recovery. Whether so made or not, is a preliminary question to be determined by the court on all the evidence of the case. Bull v. Com., 14 Gratt. 620, citing Vass v. Com., 3 Leigh 786; Hill v. Com., 2 Gratt. 694. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Swisher v. Com., 26 Gratt. 974, and note. See also, foot-note to Bull v. Com., 14 Gratt. 620.

Same—Incomplete Statement.—In Jackson v. Com., 19 Gratt. 698, the principal case is cited to the point that where the declarations were designed to be connected with and qualified by other statements and with them to form a complete narrative, but before the proposed disclosure was fully made was interrupted and the narrative left unfinished, such partial declarations are not admissible evidence. See monographic note on "Dying Declarations" appended to Jackson v. Com., 19 Gratt. 696; monographic note on "Evidence" appended to Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. 276.

many witnesses saw him in the interval, and were present when the questions hereafter mentioned were put to him; and they testified, that he was 787 *in his right mind at the time. And then Henry Edmunds was introduced as a witness for the commonwealth, who stated, "that on the Saturday before the death of the deceased, the witness visited him, and put the following questions to him—1. Did Philip Vass [the prisoner] strike you first? to which the deceased answered, Yes, sir—2. Did Philip Vass stab you? to which the deceased also answered, Yes, sir—3. Do you think you are going to die? to which the deceased again answered, Yes, sir—And the witness put a fourth question, but the deceased was unable to answer it." The prisoner's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury to disregard so much of Edmunds's testimony, as detailed the above questions and answers. The court being of opinion, that the deceased was conscious of his approaching death at the time the questions were put and the answers given, and that he was in his senses and understood the questions, refused to give the instruction,—but told the jury, that they ought to disregard the testimony altogether, unless they should believe from the evidence in the case, that the deceased understood the questions, and answered them with perfect understanding of them; that, even if they should so believe, they ought, in weighing the testimony, to take into consideration the manner in which the questions were put and the answers obtained, and also the probability that the questions and answers did not give a full account of the facts in the case; and that the evidence resulting from the questions and answers, was not absolutely inconsistent with a favorable case for the prisoner. To this opinion of the court the prisoner's counsel filed a bill of exceptions. And now the prisoner presented a petition to this court, praying a writ of error to the judgment.

Leigh, for the petitioner. The questions put by Edmunds to the deceased, were leading questions, and for that cause, if for no other, the evidence of the questions and of the answers to them ought to have 788 been excluded or declared incompetent. That leading questions ought not to be asked on the examination of a witness in chief, is agreed on all hands: such questions, namely, according to Phillip's definition, "as instruct a witness how to answer on material points," as distinguished from matters merely introductory—or, as better defined by Starkie, "questions which suggest to a witness the answer he is to make." Phil. L. Ev. 221, 2; 1 Stark. L. Ev.+ part II, p. 124, note (u). In the note, Starkie says—"It is not a very easy thing to lay down any precise general rule as to leading questions: on the one hand, it is clear that the mind of the witness must be brought into contact with the subject of inquiry; and on the other, that he ought not to be prompted to give a particular answer, or to be asked any question to which the answer yes or no would be conclusive." Certainly, then, the questions put by Edmunds to the dying man, were leading questions: and if Edmunds's questions suggested his answers, the information thus obtained, was derived from the questions rather than from the answers, and was attributable to Edmunds, not to the dying man. And though there had been no prosecution as yet commenced against the prisoner, and though Edmunds had no personal interest in the case, and probably was not actuated by any improper feeling, yet he put himself in the place, and was performing the part, of a prosecutor, so far as to collect evidence of the prisoner's guilt, to be used in the prosecution for the offence which he anticipated as certain. Besides, if the manner in which the information was drawn from the dying man, was irregular and illegal, it cannot be material by whom the impropriety was committed: the effect is the same—to make the suggestions of the person asking the questions, instead of the dying man's own declaration of the facts, the evidence of the prisoner's guilt. If this objection be a valid one—if the evidence was inadmissible, because it consisted wholly of answers to leading questions which the law will not tolerate—then the only course which could have been 789 taken, was *that which was taken by the prisoner's counsel, to move the court to instruct the jury to disregard the testimony; for the evidence came out for the first time at the trial, and contained in itself the foundation of the objection to its competency; and there was neither any opportunity to have prevented the leading questions from being put and answered, nor any way in which the testimony of them could have been anticipated and suppressed. Buster's ex'ors v. Wallace, 4 Hen. & Munf. 88, 9; Jones v. Lucas, 1 Rand. 268.

It may be said in answer to this objection to the competency of the evidence, that the situation of the dying man, in consequence of the wound under which he was languishing, was such as to render it impossible to get any information from him but by propounding leading questions to him: and the court may, perhaps, regard that circumstance as enough to refute any objection to the competency of the evidence, founded on the impropriety of that method of interrogation. But if that consideration be of force to obviate this objection, viewed alone and by itself as a substantive objection to the competency of the evidence, yet the fact that the information could only be obtained from the dying man, by leading questions which the law would generally condemn as improper, will still be very material to be considered in its bearing on the more general and interesting question, which the case presents—Whether the death-bed declarations proved by Edmunds, were such death-bed declarations as ought to be admitted in evidence?

It is true, in general, that declarations of a person who has received a mortal wound, made under apprehension of death, are admissible in a criminal prosecution for the homicide; but the declarations that are so admissible, must be declarations of a person in such a situation, mental and physical, as to be able to give a full and complete account of the transaction, and not only to tell a part of the truth, but the whole truth.

Whether death-bed declarations are competent evidence or no, depends on the circumstances under which they are 790 *made, and is always a question for the court; per lord Ellenborough, 1 Stark. ca. 521; 2 Com. Law Rep. 495, S. C.; 1 Phil. L. Ev. 15; John's case, 1 East P. C. 357; Welborne's case, Id. 359. In the case at bar, the court first decided, upon the circumstances, that the evidence was competent, and then referred it to the jury to weigh the same circumstances, and decide for themselves.

The admission of declarations made under apprehension of death, is an exception to two canons of the law of evidence; namely, that which rejects all evidence not given under the sanction of a judicial oath, and that which excludes all evidence, where the party against whom it is offered, has had no opportunity to cross-examine the witness. And "the principle of the exception to the general rule, is founded partly on the awful situation of the dying person, which is considered as powerful over his conscience as the obligation of an oath, and partly on a supposed absence of interest on the verge of the next world, which dispenses with the necessity of cross-examination." 1 Phil. L. Ev. 215; 1 Stark. L. Ev. Part I., pp. 94, 101; Id. Part IV., p. 458. The law regards the apprehension of approaching death as equivalent to the judicial oath, which is an oath to tell the truth and the whole truth, and equally cogent as the most rigid cross-examination to draw from the dying man, a full, fair, impartial relation of facts: therefore, the law dispenses with the oath, and overlooks the want of opportunity for cross-examination. The reason on which this exception is founded, obviously, has no application to a case, in which the dying man was absolutely incapable of relating the circumstances. How can his awful situation be deemed equivalent to the obligation of the judicial oath to tell the truth and the whole truth, when he was unable to tell the whole truth? How can it be held *an equivalent to an opportunity for cross-examination to elicit a fair, full, impartial relation of all the circumstances, when he was in such a situation, that no cross-examination could have been of any avail? Shall the judicial oath be dispensed with,

791 *and the want of an opportunity for cross-examination disregarded, in a case in which the dying man, so far from being able to fulfil the obligation of the oath, and to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, impartially, fully and circumstantially, was unable, if never so much inclined, to tell even a part of the truth, without the aid of leading questions, which, to say the least, supplied the most important parts of his declaration? If the dying man had been in a state of mental inability to give a full relation of the facts, it cannot be denied, that such mental defect would have been a conclusive reason for excluding the evidence of his declarations, though declarations uttered even in the ravings of delirium may perchance be true: and I can see no good reason why a physical inability to give a full account of the transaction, should not have the same effect as mental incapacity would have to exclude a partial account, that may or may not be a just representation of the truth of the case. For, if a state of mental incapacity may render him insensible of the approach of death, the apprehension of which is the equivalent for the sanction of a judicial oath, the physical incapacity renders his sense of approaching death utterly unavailing to induce a full and impartial disclosure of facts. It will be found, that in all the cases in which dying declarations have been admitted in evidence, the dying man that made them, was, at the time, both mentally and physically capable of telling the whole story, in his own words, without being prompted by leading questions, much more having the story told for him in questions. See the cases collected 1 East's P. C. 353-360. In Reason & Tranter's case, 1 Stra. 499, the dying man was capable of giving a full relation of all circumstances, and of undergoing a cross-examination; and in fact, there was a cross-examination in that case, and the evidence thereby elicited acquitted the prisoners of murder.

Attorney general, contra. The objections that have been made, affect the credit, not the competency, of the evidence; 792 *and as to the credit that should be given to it, the court gave the jury a caution sufficiently favorable to the prisoner.

The objection to leading questions lies properly where the questions are propounded by a party to the controversy or his attorney, who has an interest to discolour the evidence: Edmunds was not a party; and he had no personal interest, no motive, to draw from the dying man any thing but the truth; the law will not regard his proceedings with any jealousy. Leading questions are "such as instruct the witness how to answer"—or "which suggest to the witness the answer he is to make;" that is, questions that indicate to the witness the answer which is desired by the person who puts them. Now, the questions put by Edmunds did not indicate that he desired, or expected, an affirmative or negative answer: they only indicated that he wished to know the truth whatever that was. Therefore, they were not leading questions. The passage quoted from the note in 1 Stark. L. Ev., Part II., p. 124, note (u), is not sustained by any authority; and the proposition, in the broad terms there stated, is unfounded in principle or reason. But, if these were leading questions, they were put in that form of necessity: the dying man's situation was such, that information would no otherwise be obtained from him. Objections to leading questions are founded on the default of the party who propounds them; and are allowed, because, in general, the evidence may still be obtained by propounding the inquiry in proper form; but if such an objection be allowed in the present case, the defect of evidence is irremediable. The evidence must be admitted ex necessitate.

The declarations of the dying man were, in themselves, so far as they went, full and distinct: it does not appear, that he had any thing more to communicate on the subject; it is not stated, that the fourth question put to him by Edmunds, which he was unable to answer, had any relation to it. The declarations prove, that the mortal blow was inflicted by the prisoner: that alone is proof of 793 his guilt: if *there were any circumstances to extenuate the crime, or to excuse or to justify the act, the burden of proving them lay on him. If the evidence is to be suppressed, because every incident that occurred at the time, was not inquired into and minutely detailed, or because the dying man was incapable, in consequence of the mortal wound, of giving such details: so broad an objection would go the length of suppressing death-bed declarations in almost every case, since in order to make them evidence at all, the declarant must be in extremis. It was not the fault of the commonwealth, that the details were not required: it was not the fault of the commonwealth, or of Edmunds, or of the dying man, that he was incapable of giving them, if they had been required: that was the fault of the prisoner; the effect of the injury which his hand had inflicted. And to allow him to object to the evidence on that ground, would be to violate the principle that no one shall be allowed to take advantage from his own wrong.

LOMAX, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The question of the competency of testimony may depend upon facts extraneous and collateral to the testimony; or the matter and manner of the testimony may be such as to render it inadmissible. To make dying declarations receivable as evidence in any case, it has been laid down, that it must appear that the deceased was conscious of his being in a dying state, at the time he made them. This inquiry into the consciousness of the deceased, is collateral to the evidence of the dying declarations themselves, and the judgment to be pronounced upon it, depends upon proofs which may be wholly distinct from and unconnected with the declarations. So, all testimony presupposes the sanity of the witness who deposes, and whenever the question of sanity is raised, for the purpose of excluding the evidence which is offered, it must depend upon collateral proofs. These questions as to the competency or admissibility of testimony, at whatever stage of the trial they may be 794 raised, (though regularly they *ought to precede the introduction of the testimony objected to) are referred to the decision of the judge. "As it is the province of the jury to consider what degree of credit ought to be given to evidence, so it is for the court alone to determine, whether a witness is competent, or the evidence admissible. Whether there is any evidence is a question for the judge; whether it is sufficient is for the jury. And whatever antecedent facts are necessary to be ascertained, for the purpose of deciding the question of competency, as for example, whether a child understands the nature of an oath, or whether the confession of a prisoner was voluntary, or whether declarations, offered in evidence as dying declarations, were made under the immediate apprehension of death; these, and other facts of the same kind, are to be determined by the court, and not by the jury." 1 Phil. L. Ev. 13, (edi. 1816); Clayton v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 399; Chaney v. Saunders, 3 Munf. 51. This preliminary adjudication of the court upon the question as to the admissibility of the testimony, in case the evidence be allowed, has decided nothing in regard to its credibility. That peculiar province still remains for the jury. It is every day's practice to admit evidence as competent, which the jury have no hesitation in disbelieving. The court may decide, upon examination of proofs, that a witness is not incompetent for want of reason or understanding: the jury may, notwithstanding, determine within their province, what is the weight of his testimony, and may graduate the credit they will repose in it, from the point of total disbelief to that of the most implicit confidence. If in the judgment pronounced by the court, upon the question of competency, any error be committed, a bill of exceptions, embodying all the facts and circumstances upon which that judgment was given, is the proper mode of presenting the error to an appellate jurisdiction, for review and reversal. If no exception be taken, or if it do not appear what evidence was given to the judge, upon this collateral inquiry in regard to the competency of the evidence, all must be presumed to have been legal and right. If the jury, in finding a verdict against the prisoner, have committed a mistake, and given undue credit to the testimony, the proper corrective is an application for a new trial, to the court which tried the cause; and if there be any mode of bringing to the consideration of the appellate court, the error of the court below in overruling the application, it would be by a bill of exceptions, stating all the proofs which are offered to the jury. The bill of exceptions must, in either case, adapt itself to the nature of the error complained of, and show precisely wherein it was committed. It is upon the former ground alone that this case is brought before us.

If, therefore, in the case now under consideration, the error complained of was, that the judge had admitted testimony of dying declarations which was incompetent, cause the deceased, when he made them, to be not under the apprehension of impending death, and was not of mental capacity to testify, we must refer to the record to ascertain, whether the matters therein stated show, that the judge must have erred in admitting this evidence; and, in considering this question, we must view it exclusively as a question of mere competency, wholly distinct and apart from any consideration of the weight it might have been entitled to with the jury. The evidence could not be the less competent, though the court might think the jury would have done so in wholly disregarding it.

In this bill of exceptions, it is expressly stated, that the judge was of opinion, that the deceased was conscious of his approaching death, at the time the questions were put to him, and his answers thereto were given; also that he was in his right mind and understood the questions. The evidence, to sustain this opinion in regard to the mental capacity of the deceased, was, (as stated in the bill of exceptions) that many witnesses, who saw the deceased in the interval between the time he received the wound and his death, and at the time the questions were put to him, gave evidence, that he was in his right mind. In regard to the consciousness of the deceased of his impending death, the direct testimony in the record, bearing upon this point, is the affirmative answer of the deceased to the question which was asked him, "Do you think you are going to die?" But the consciousness of approaching death may be collected as well from the circumstances of the case (as from the nature of the wound and the state of the body) as from expressions used by the deceased. Woodcock's case, 2 Leach C. C. 563; Dingler's case, Id. 638; John's case, 1 East's P. C. 357. This court, therefore, has clearly no warrant for pronouncing, that the opinion of the judge, as to the sanity of the deceased, and his consciousness of approaching death, was erroneous, unless it can be contended, that the facts stated in the record, furnish such conclusive proof that the deceased was unsound in his mind, and unconscious of imminent death, that it could not be disproved by other evidence however direct and cogent. What are the facts as stated in the record upon this subject?

It appeared, that the deceased received a stab with a knife on Thursday night; that from the time he received the wound until his death, which was sometime in the day of Sunday following, for much the greater part of the time (in consequence of the wound) he was unable to speak at all, and when he was able to speak, he could only utter a short word or two at a time; that the only answers he made to the inquiries that were propounded to him, were the words "yes sir," responding to three of the questions; and when a fourth question was put, he was unable to answer it. Whatever inferences the jury would have been warranted in drawing from such circumstances, to throw discredit upon the evidence arising from these answers thus given, this court cannot pronounce, that the condition of the deceased, as exhibited upon these proofs, could not possibly have been consistent with proof of a competent sanity of mind, and of a consciousness of approaching death.

In deciding then, whether, under the circumstances in the bill of exceptions stated, the evidence of the death-bed declarations, therein stated, was incompetent evidence and ought not to have been allowed, it must be borne in mind, that in this record, the deceased is adjudged to have been a man sound in his mind, and conscious of standing on the brink of eternity; and that if this adjudication was erroneous, the bill of exceptions has been so framed as not to bring it into question; and that therefore it is now irreversible.

It was argued by the petitioner's counsel, that though it is true, in general, that the dying declarations of a person who has received a mortal wound, made under apprehensions of death, are admissible in criminal prosecutions for the homicide; yet, that the dying declarations, which are so admissible, must be dying declarations of a person in a situation to give a full and complete account of the facts of the transaction,—not only to tell a part of the truth, but the whole truth. The court can not sustain this principle, in the latitude with which it is applied. If facts be stated, which are obviously designed by the party who states them, to be connected with other facts which he is about to disclose, and to be qualified by them, so that the narrative should form one intire account, that may or may not be a just representation of the truth of the case. For, if a state of mental incapacity may render him insensible of the approach of death, the apprehension of which is the equivalent for the sanction of a judicial oath, the physical incapacity renders his sense of approaching death utterly unavailing to induce a full and impartial disclosure of facts. It will be found, that in all the cases in which dying declarations have been admitted in evidence, the dying man that made them, was, at the time, both mentally and physically capable of telling the whole story, in his own words, without being prompted by leading questions, much more having the story told for him in questions. See the cases collected 1 East's P. C. 353-360. In Reason & Tranter's case, 1 Stra. 499, the dying man was capable of giving a full relation of all circumstances, and of undergoing a cross-examination; and in fact, there was a cross-examination in that case, and the evidence thereby elicited acquitted the prisoners of murder.

Attorney general, contra. The objections that have been made, affect the credit, not the competency, of the evidence; 792 *and as to the credit that should be given to it, the court gave the jury a caution sufficiently favorable to the prisoner.

The objection to leading questions lies properly where the questions are propounded by a party to the controversy or his attorney, who has an interest to discolour the evidence: Edmunds was not a party; and he had no personal interest, no motive, to draw from the dying man any thing but the truth; the law will not regard his proceedings with any jealousy. Leading questions are "such as instruct the witness how to answer"—or "which suggest to the witness the answer he is to make;" that is, questions that indicate to the witness the answer which is desired by the person who puts them. Now, the questions put by Edmunds did not indicate that he desired, or expected, an affirmative or negative answer: they only indicated that he wished to know the truth whatever that was. Therefore, they were not leading questions. The passage quoted from the note in 1 Stark. L. Ev., Part II., p. 124, note (u), is not sustained by any authority; and the proposition, in the broad terms there stated, is unfounded in principle or reason. But, if these were leading questions, they were put in that form of necessity: the dying man's situation was such, that information would no otherwise be obtained from him. Objections to leading questions are founded on the default of the party who propounds them; and are allowed, because, in general, the evidence may still be obtained by propounding the inquiry in proper form; but if such an objection be allowed in the present case, the defect of evidence is irremediable. and complete history of the whole transaction; and before the purposed disclosure is made, it be interrupted, and the narrative remains unfinished; such partial declaration would not be admissible in evidence. The declaration which was offered in evidence in Finn's case, 5 Rand. 701, may be referred to in illustration of this point. But, if the declaration state facts distinctly, and, as far as the declaration goes, it does not necessarily appear, that the facts thus stated were designed to be connected with some other facts, which may be supposed to form a part of the full and complete account of the transaction, it would be going too far to reject altogether the matter thus disclosed, upon any presumption of law, that the narrator was precluded by his situation (he being sound in his mind) from giving a full and complete account of the transaction, or upon any presumption of fact that the court could form, "that what was disclosed was only a part of the truth, and not the whole truth of the case. It cannot be contended, that the evidence would be rendered incompetent from the circumstance that the deceased was not in a situation to know all the facts. It does not appear in the record, what was the question last propounded to the deceased, nor is there any evidence whatever, of the cause which rendered him unable to answer it. If his situation was such as to disable him, from any other cause, independent of the state of his reason, from giving a full and complete account of the transaction, and from telling the whole truth, not merely a part of the truth, that was a matter for the decision of the jury, and not of the court. Even if it were true, that a supervening disability had abridged the narrative, which, possibly, under other circumstances, might have been given by the deceased, still the question, whether the matter disclosed amounted to a full and complete account, was a question properly left to that tribunal, in which the law vests the power of deciding upon the credit of witnesses, and which alone can determine, from the circumstances of the case, whether a witness has told the whole truth, as well as a part of the truth, and nothing but the truth. If the court can exercise the power of deciding from the face of the testimony, that a witness of sufficient mental capacity, was not a competent witness, because he was unable or refused to answer some particular inquiry; and if the court has the power, moreover, of pronouncing, that the disclosures which he has made, must necessarily have fallen short of a full and complete account of the transaction, or of such an account of it as is worthy to be listened to and weighed by the jury; it would seem to lead to dangerous inroads upon the province of juries. The presumption, that the deceased was not in a situation to give a full and complete account, is derived from Edmunds's evidence, that he had put a fourth question to the deceased, but he was unable to answer it. The reasonableness and the strength of this presumption depend much upon circumstances.

799 There is nothing in the *evidence, to shew that the question, last propounded to the deceased, had any relation to the homicide, and that the matter inquired about formed a part of a full and complete account of the transaction; much less, that the information sought must necessarily have been that which a person, in a situation to give such an account, could not but have been able to tell. Before we can be warranted in drawing the important inference, attempted from Edmunds's testimony, it would be material to know not only the pertinency of the question to the matter in hand, but also the interval which elapsed between the answer to the third question, and the putting the fourth. If the force of that testimony was susceptible of explanation, and might be varied by other proofs, then, even if this were a question of competency to be decided by the judge, this court can not, as this record is framed, undertake to pronounce, that such explanations and proofs were not submitted to the judge, as the foundation of his decision.

It was, moreover, objected in the argument, that the information obtained from the deceased, was but the answers "Yes, sir," to questions, which were leading questions. It is laid down in the books, that leading questions, that is, such as instruct a witness how to answer on material points, are not allowed on the examination in chief: for to direct witnesses in their evidence, would only serve to strengthen that bias, which they are generally so much disposed to feel, in favor of the party that calls them. 1 Stark. L. Ev. 123. Still, it will be found, the rule is not of universal application; for there are cases withdrawn from its influence, where it is allowed by the courts to be necessary to lead the mind of the witness to the subject of inquiry. It has been said, that it is difficult to lay down any precise rules as to leading questions, and how far it may be necessary to particularize, in framing the questions, must depend on the circumstances of each particular case; 1 Stark. L. Ev. 123, note (u). Wherever this rule is treated of, cases are presupposed, where there is 800 a subject of litigation depending,—*where the witness, to whom answers are suggested in the forms of the questions, has been summoned by one of the parties to that litigation; and where the witness is in a situation which exposes him to a suspicion of bias in favor of the party who calls him. But is there to be found in the law, any principle which would warrant the extension of the rule to a case like the present, and would require that the examination of a dying man as to the cause of his death, should conform to a technical strictness? Here was no matter of litigation, civil or criminal, depending: no prosecution so far as appears, had been instituted, or was known to the dying man; no conceivable connexion between him, who was putting the questions to him, and any interest likely to be subserved by the answers which were sought for; and no bias to be suspected in the mind of the deceased in favor of any interest on this side of the grave.

The answers to these questions would have been more satisfactory, had they responded more fully the circumstances of the homicide. But this court cannot pronounce that they are inadmissible, because they are mere monosyllables—"Yes, sir." The law has no where defined what shall amount to dying declarations, or the form in which they shall be uttered. It might be unsafe that it should do so. Whether the declarations are such as entitle them to be regarded as dying declarations to be offered in evidence, must depend upon the temper of the deceased when he made them, and upon the circumstances under which they were made. So far as the effect of such declarations is to be weighed by the jury, the court, upon this record, has no power to interfere. The jury were cautioned by the judge at the trial, that they ought to disregard the testimony altogether, unless they should believe from the evidence in the case, that the deceased understood the questions put to him, and answered them understandingly: and even if they should so believe, they ought, in weighing the testimony, to take into consideration the manner in which the questions were put and the answers obtained, and also the 801 probability that the questions and answers do not give a full account of the facts of the case. If the answers of the deceased formed, in the consideration of the jury, an essential part of the proofs in the case, then the verdict they have found, after this solemn caution, has pronounced that the deceased did understand the questions, and answered them understandingly, and that the testimony, notwithstanding the circumstances which seemed to impair its credit, was entitled to their belief. There may have been other evidence, satisfactory as to those circumstances, before the jury; and for aught that appears in the bill of exceptions, the court also, in deciding upon the question of competency, may have been influenced by proofs omitted to be embodied in the case. The objections which have been taken to the form of the questions, and the manner in which they were answered, as well as other objections in behalf of the prisoner, derive their force, for the most part, from a suspicion, unsubdued by the decision of the court (irreversible as has been shewn) that the deceased laboured under a want of mental capacity to testify. If we regard him as a man beyond question of sound reason, and his responses as flowing from a rational and deliberate mind, it seems difficult to distinguish the evidence now under consideration, from that of other dying declarations.

Upon the whole, a large majority of the court is for refusing the writ of error. This court might have given a very different judgment, had the record been so framed as to bring the errors complained of fully before them. Any mistakes which have been committed by the jury, are not within our cognizance; and if any errors were committed by the judge upon the matters submitted to him, the bill of exceptions has not been so framed as to bring those matters within our consideration.

*Justice of Peace—Acceptance of Office of Deputy Sheriff—Effect.—The principal case is cited in footpatible with the office of justice of the peace, though by the statute law of Virginia the office of high sheriff is not so; and the acceptance of the office of deputy sheriff vacates the office of justice.

Case adjourned from the circuit court of Washington.

The circuit court, at the instance of the attorney for the commonwealth, made a rule on Charles Tate, to shew cause why an information, in the nature of a quo warranto, should not be filed against him, for acting as a justice of the peace for the county of Washington, after having acted as deputy sheriff of the same since his qualifications as a justice. Upon the return of the rule, the following state of facts was agreed—That Tate qualified as a justice of the peace of Washington, on the 20th July 1802, and acted in that capacity. That on the 15th March 1803, he qualified as deputy sheriff of the county, and acted as such for one year, and then resumed his seat on the bench; and continued to act, alternately, in the one or the other character, at various times, until the 24th March 1821; at which time he was admitted and qualified as deputy sheriff under John Houston sheriff of the county, and acted as such till the 18th March 1823; and since that date till this rule was made upon him, he had acted as a justice of the peace under his commission and qualification of 1802. That under his last appointment of deputy sheriff, he continued to act for the two years, without qualifying anew, or giving a new bond to his principal, at the commencement of the second year of the shrievalty; he having farmed the office from Houston, and given him bond and security, in the first instance, for the whole time of Houston's continuance in office; neither was Houston himself commissioned, nor did he qualify, as sheriff for the second year, but only gave bond for the collection of taxes for the second year, under his first commission. And upon this state of facts, the 803 circuit court adjourned *to this court, the following questions: 1. Whether Tate's acting as deputy sheriff the second year of Houston's shrievalty, was such an acceptance of the office of deputy sheriff, as vacated his office of justice of the peace, so that he could not act in the latter office without a new commission? (which question depended on the construction and effect of the statute of 1821-2, ch. 26, § 2, Sess. Acts, p. 27, concerning the disqualifications of justices of the peace). 2. Whether, independently of that statute, Tate was disqualified from acting in the office of a justice of the peace after having repeatedly accepted the appointment of deputy sheriff of the county? Attorney general for the commonwealth.

Leigh for the defendant.

PARKER, J. As to the first question, taking it to refer to the operation of the statute of 1821-2, ch. 26, § 2,—a large majority of the judges are of opinion, upon the facts agreed, that the defendant's acting the second year as deputy sheriff, under a contract made the first year with the high sheriff for his whole term, was not such an acceptance of office, after the passing of that statute, as, under it, vacated his office of justice of the peace. He continued in office after the date of the statute, but it was under the old contract; and the court thinks that there should have been some distinct act of acceptance, by taking a new oath, giving a new bond, making a new contract, or otherwise, in order to bring him within the terms of that law. The court, therefore, answers the first question in the negative.

Upon the second question, there has been a great difference of opinion among the judges, both at the last and present term; the court, then, being equally divided, and there being now a division in the court, ten judges to eight.

Every one agrees, that, at common law, the two offices are totally incompatible, and that the acceptance of the one

804 *vacates the other. The case of Amory v. The justices of Gloucester, in this court, decides this principle in the case of a deputy clerk, by the unanimous opinion of the judges; and that of a deputy sheriff, who is recognized by the law as a public officer, and who is directly responsible to the county court, for the due discharge of many of his duties, is still stronger. The point of difference does not lie here, but arises out of other considerations. It is said, that the office of high sheriff is, by the express provision of the statute concerning sheriffs, to be filled from the county court bench; that it could never have been the intention of the legislature, to make the acceptance of that office, vacate the other office, which constituted the very qualification of the one accepted; that such a construction would sweep away the whole bench of justices, and render what was intended as a reward for services, a disqualification for the office in which those services were rendered; that the statute alluded to, has always been construed to exempt the office of high sheriff from the operation of the common law principle; and assuming such construction to be the right one, there is no reason why the subordinate office of the same kind should not follow the nature of the principal: that, in point of fact, such has been the understanding and settled usage of the country, and it is now too late to disturb it, since the common error may, in this as in other cases, make the law. But a majority of the court is of opinion, that the office of deputy sheriff stands, under our law, upon a different footing from that of high sheriff, and that none of the reasons which are urged in favour of the latter, apply to the former office.—That the statute alluded to, embraces the case of the high sheriff alone; and if, as they agree, it must be so construed as to allow him to resume his office of justice of the peace, it is a personal privilege which ought not to be extended.—That the law casts the office of high sheriff upon a justice of the peace, but it is silent as to the deputy, and the high sheriff may select his deputy from any class of society; and if the latter voluntarily

805 accepts and *exercises an office clearly incompatible with the one he holds, there is no good reason for exempting him from the operation of a sound and acknowledged principle, which would go far to weaken and destroy the principle itself.—That, as to usage, it ought to have no weight unless it has been general, uncontroverted and uniform.—That there is no evidence of any usage in this case, of which the court can judicially take notice; and so far as our information extends, there has been no uniform or unquestioned usage on the subject; on the contrary, it is believed (as the statute of 1821-2, ch. 26, declares) that “different practices in relation thereto, have prevailed in different parts of the commonwealth”—That that statute is merely, as appears upon its face, “a declaration of the law” in this case.—And that, as the common law is clear, indisputable, and founded upon wise principles of policy, and no act of the legislature, or uniform, recognized and acknowledged usage controlling it, is established, the second question propounded by the circuit court of Washington, ought to be answered in the affirmative.

In this opinion, nine of the other judges concurred.

SCOTT, J. The nearly equal division of the court upon one of the questions involved in this case, if it does not require, justifies me, in stating the grounds on which I dissent from the opinion of the majority.

The question is, whether prior to and independently of the statute of 1821-2, ch. 26, the acceptance and exercise of the office of deputy sheriff by a justice of the peace, ipso facto, vacated the latter office. According to the well settled principles of the common law, two offices the duties of which are incompatible, cannot be held by the same person at the same time; and the acceptance of one by a person holding the other vacates that other. It requires no argument to prove, that the duties of a justice of the peace, who is one of the judges of the county court, and 806 those of *sheriff of the same court, are incompatible, and consequently, by the rules of the common law, the acceptance of the office of sheriff, whether principal or deputy, by a justice of the peace, would vacate the office of justice of the peace.

“Until 1665, sheriffs were elected. An act was then passed, directing that the justices of the peace of each county (then called commissioners) should nominate three or more, out of which the governor and council should commission one as sheriff. In 1660, it was enacted, that the office should be conferred on the commissioners in succession; and so it remained until 1705, when it was enacted, that no person but a justice of the peace should be appointed sheriff”—per Green, J., in Salleng v. M’Kinney, 1 Leigh, 58. No material change has been made up to the present time. The act of 1705 does not declare, that the office of sheriff shall be conferred on the justices in succession; but such has been the practice under it. These statutes then, declare, that the possession of the office of justice of the peace, is a necessary qualification for the office of sheriff. It would be a strange state of things, to require the possession of one office as a necessary qualification for another, and by conferring that other to deprive the party of that which qualified him to receive it; to declare that the justices of the peace form a class so meritorious as to be exclusively entitled to the office of sheriff, and yet that the individual who receives this reward of merit, shall instantly lose his caste; that the law, which, in a manner, casts upon him the office of sheriff because he is a justice, should take from him the office of justice because he is a sheriff. This would be to confer upon the two offices, by the same provision, the opposite qualities of attraction and repulsion. Again : by the requisition of the former law, and the practice under the statute of 1705, this office of sheriff is given to the justices in rotation. To give to it the disqualifying effect it had at common law, would make it the instrument of sweeping, one by one, every justice from the bench.

807 *This never could have been the intention of the legislature. It seems clear, then, that the principle of the common law, so far at least as the office of high sheriff is concerned, is repealed by these statutes. It is conceded, however, that none of the reasons which have brought us to this conclusion, apply to the case of a deputy sheriff. His office is not bestowed upon him because he is a justice : it is not given as a reward for former services : the office is in no sense cast upon him by the law. If then we were to construe these statutes, without reference to the usage of the country, we should probably have not much difficulty in deciding, that they do not extend to the case of a deputy sheriff. It may, however, be fairly insisted, that, as the legislature clearly meant to declare that the offices of the justices of the peace and sheriff are not incompatible, so far at least as the high sheriff is concerned ; as this intent is not declared by express words, but deduced by construction ; as there is nothing peculiar to the office of deputy sheriff, to induce a discrimination ; and as there is nothing in the statute from which an intent to make such a discrimination can be inferred ; therefore, no such discrimination exists, and the office of deputy sheriff stands on the same footing, in this respect, as that of high sheriff. This construction is sanctioned, so far as my observation and information extend, by the practice of the whole state, as far back, for aught that appears to the contrary, as the enactment of the statute conferring the office of sheriff on the justices of the peace.

It is said, however, that the preamble of the act of 1821-2, ch. 26, declares that the practice has been different in different parts of the state. The recital in that preamble does not necessarily embrace the case of deputy sheriff. If it did, it would certainly be a high authority. But I think, that it may be safely affirmed, that the practice, if not universal, has been very general.

It is said too, that this usage is not evidenced by any judicial decisions. If this kind of evidence is necessary, it must have a beginning, and why should we not

808 be the first *to furnish it ? It cannot, I think, be doubted that the court may take notice of a fact of general notoriety. That a particular construction has been placed on a statute, and long acquiesced in, is always considered a strong reason why a court should so construe it ; and if no evils will be produced by adhering to that construction, and evils will arise by departing from it, we have a stronger motive for adhering to it. No possible mischief can be perceived, as likely to arise from adhering to the construction, which has hitherto been placed on these statutes. The only material effect of a change will be, to remove some old and worthy members of the county court bench, to the end that their younger brethren may obtain the office of sheriff a little sooner than in the ordinary course of things it would come to their turn. The party who is the object of the proceedings in this case, doubtless accepted the office of deputy sheriff, under the impression that he would not thereby divest himself of the office of justice of the peace. Under this impression, he returned to the bench, and has continued to perform the duties of a justice. To say to him now, that he is an usurper of the latter office, would be, at the least, harsh language. To deprive him of the office of high sheriff in his turn, the only reward for his services as justice, and confer it on a younger justice, would, I think, be unjust. A practice so general and long settled, known to and acquiesced in by every department of the government, has the force of law. I should hesitate before I gave to usage, the effect of repealing a statute, though I should not be without authority even for that. See the cases cited by Green, J. 1 Leigh, 60. The usage in question, is opposed to nothing but a principle of the common law, which itself has no other sanction.

It is said that the statute of 1821-2, ch. 26, declares the law to have been otherwise. Whatever efficacy the omnipotence of the british parliament may give to a declaratory statute, neither the old nor the new constitution authorizes that kind of legislation in Virginia. It belongs to the 809 *legislature to say what the law shall be ; to the courts to say, what the law is.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the incompatibility which existed at common law, between the offices of justices of the peace and sheriff, was removed by our statutes above alluded to, and that those statutes embrace both the deputy and the high sheriff.

Seven of the judges concurred in the opinion of SCOTT, J.

The Commonwealth v. Maclin.

July, 1831.

Criminal Law—Killing Dogs.—*The statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 1, does not authorize a criminal prosecution for killing dogs belonging to another.

Case adjourned from the circuit court of Greenville.

An information was filed against Maclin in the circuit court, for knowingly, wilfully, and without lawful authority, killing and destroying two dogs belonging to one Turner, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.† The defend-

Criminal Law—Killing Dogs.—For the proposition that, the killing a dog of another is not an indictable offence, the principal case is cited and followed in Davis v. Com., 17 Gratt. 620. 621. 622. 623. 624. 625. See monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments" appended to Boyle v. Com., 14 Gratt. 674.

†The statute on which the prosecution was founded (1822-3, ch. 34, § 1, Sess. Acts, p. 38,) is in the following words: "Any person who shall knowingly and wilfully, without lawful authority, cut down any tree growing on the land of another, or destroy or injure any such tree, or any building, fence, or other imant demurred generally. And the circuit court adjourned to this court, the following question: What judgment ought the court to render on the demurrer put in to the information?

810 *LEIGH, J. This is a prosecution under the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, and to sustain the prosecution, it must be held, that by the words "property real and personal" in the statute, the legislature intended to embrace dogs. Some of the judges are of opinion, that the act does not authorize a prosecution for the destruction of any kind of living domestic animals, and that by the words "property real and personal," the legislature intended property of the same kind as that before enumerated; for that it cannot be supposed, that the legislature intended to embrace our valuable domestic animals, by the general word "property," when in the preceding part of the act, it had specially named property of much less value. But, without expressing any opinion as to the correctness of this construction of the act, a majority of the court is of opinion, that a criminal prosecution cannot be sustained for the destruction of dogs. By the common law, the property in dogs and other inferior animals, is not such as that a larceny can be committed by stealing them, though the possessor has a base property in them, and may maintain a civil action for injuries done to them. And, in a penal act, like the one now under consideration, the word "property" standing alone ought to be considered to mean full and complete property, such as by the common law may be protected by a public prosecution for the larceny thereof. Therefore, the court is of opinion, that it ought to be certified to the circuit court, that the demurrer ought to be sustained, and judgment rendered for the defendant.

JUDGES SMITH, UPSHUR, SUMMERS, W. BROWNE, FIELD, LOMAX, and SCOTT, dissented.

811 *Rixey and Others v. The Justices of Fauquier.

July, 1831.

Negroes Committed by Court—Liability of County for Maintenance.—The expense of keeping and maintaining negroes committed by order of a county court to the custody of the sheriff, cannot in any case be a lawful charge upon the county.

Case adjourned from the circuit court of Fauquier.

The county court of Fauquier, at June term 1820, proceeded to make up, in its minutes, an account of expenses incurred by the court and properly chargeable to the county and remaining unpaid, and to levy the amount due on the tytheables of the county; and among others, it admitted and made the following charges against the county, viz. "To E. D. late sheriff of Fauquier, per account, 240 dollars—To E. D. late sheriff, per account, 597 dollars—To W. S. late sheriff, per account, 77 dollars." The accounts of the sheriffs referred to in the charges, shewed that these allowances were made to them, respectively, for keeping certain negroes the property of one Nelson, for a considerable length of time, under orders of the county court.

Rixey and twenty three others, freeholders of the county, presented their petition to the circuit court, at July term 1829, complaining that the charges above mentioned were made by the sheriffs, for keeping certain negroes, who were suing in forma pauperis to recover their freedom, and that this constituted no legal charge upon the county, and praying, therefore, that the order of the county court laying the county levy should be superseded and reversed.*

812 *Writs of supersedeas and certiorari were accordingly awarded, and various proceedings had in the case, until December term 1830, when the circuit court adjourned to this court, many questions of law, for novelty and difficulty, the last of which was, What judgment ought to be given in the case?

PARKER, J., delivered the resolution of the court. The court, without deciding whether it would reverse an order laying a county levy, which did not shew on the face of it, for what the respective sums were charged, so as to make it appear, that the expenses incurred had been incurred under

*See the statute concerning tytheables and the mode of laying and collecting the county levy, 3 Rev. Code, ch. 191, § 6, 9.

The 6th section provides, that "the Justices of the several counties within this commonwealth, shall and they are hereby authorized and empowered, at their courts respectively to be held in the month of May or June, annually, or as soon after as may be if no court shall be held in either of those months, to proceed to make up, in their minutes, an account of all expenses incurred by the said court, under authority of any law chargeable on the county, and remaining unpaid, stating therein the sums due, for what, and to whom due, and all credits owing to the said county. When the balance due from the county is thus ascertained, by deducting the sums due to the county from those owing by the county, the said Justices shall proceed to levy and assess on the tytheable persons in their respective counties, the amount of that balance, in equal proportions. The sums due to the county, and the sum to be assessed on the tytheables, shall then be appropriated by the court, so as to shew the right of each county creditor and the amount of his demand."

The 9th section provides, that "if any county court shall lay any levy otherwise than is allowed by law, it shall be lawful for the judge of the superior court of law within whose jurisdiction such county may be, at any time within forty days after such levy shall have been laid, either in term time or in vacation, upon the petition of twenty four freeholders subject to such levy, to award a supersedeas to the order of the court whereby such levy was laid, if upon an inspection of the copy of such order, it shall appear that the levy has been laid contrary to law; and, at the same time, it shall be lawful to award a certiorari, to cause the record to be certified into the superior court of law having jurisdiction over such county: When such record shall be so certified, the superior court shall proceed, without delay, to reverse or affirm the order laying the said levy, as to them shall seem right."—Note in Original Edition.

the authority of some law, and were properly chargeable to the county,—is of opinion, that the sheriffs' accounts referred to in the account stated in the minutes of the county court, are to be considered as part of the order, and do shew for what the sums allowed to the two sheriffs respectively, were due. They were due for keeping certain negroes, the property of an individual, committed to the custody of the sheriff by order of the county court. Now, if (as is alleged in the petition of the twenty-four freeholders) these negroes were suing in forma pauperis for *their freedom, the person who claimed property in them, refusing to give bond and security for their forthcoming to answer the judgment of the court, as required by law, must bear the expense of keeping them. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 124, § 4, p. 481; Sarah v. Henry, 2 Hen. & Munf. 19. But, if that fact is not to be assumed, still the levy cannot be supported; since we cannot conceive a case in which the county can be made liable for the keeping of slaves, or persons claimed as slaves, committed to the custody of the sheriff. The only cases of such commitments that occur to us, are, when they are committed for criminal offences, or as runaways, or under execution for debt, or by their owners in certain cases, or when they are in the predicament above mentioned of paupers suing for freedom. In neither of these cases are the tytheables of the county liable for their support, and we believe that no case can be stated, in which they are so liable. Therefore, the levy of the 22d of June 1829, was laid otherwise than is allowed by law; and this court, without answering or deciding the other questions adjourned, directs that it be certified to the circuit court of Fauquier, that the order of the county court laying the levy should be reversed.

July, 1831.

Certiorari—When Lies.—The county and corporation courts being courts of record, the writ of certiorari does not lie to a judgment of a corporation court affirming a judgment of a single magistrate, though his is not a court of record, for a fine imposed by a penal law, or in a civil case: if there be error in the judgment of such court affirming the judgment of a single magistrate for a fine, the writ of error lies.

Case adjourned from the circuit court of Henrico.

Upon the information and complaint of Moses Lipscomb, that Matilda Tankersley had harboured and employed his 814 *slave, knowing her to be a runaway, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, the mayor of Richmond issued a warrant against Tankersley requiring her to appear before him or some other magistrate of the city, and shew cause, if any she could, why she should not be fined, and otherwise proceeded against, according to the statute.†

Certiorari—When Lies.—The Virginia reports show no case of a judgment of the county or circuit reviewed by writ of certiorari. This mode has been attempted in some such cases, but it has been disapproved. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 254, citing Hay v. Pistor, 2 Leigh 707; Tankersley v. Lipscomb, 3 Leigh 813. See monographic note on "Appeal and Error" appended to Hill v. Salem, etc., Turnpike Co., 1 Rob. 283.

†The statute of 1823-4, ch. 85, § 1, Supplement to

And upon the return of the warrant, and a hearing of the parties, he rendered judgment against the defendant, for a fine of ten dollars, one half to Lipscomb the informer, and the other half to the commonwealth for the literary fund. The defendant appealed to the hustings court of Richmond, under the provision in the county court law, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 71, § 23. The mayor certified the proceedings and judgment to the court; and the court affirmed the judgment, with costs against the defendant and her surety in the appeal bond; Id. § 25.

The defendant then presented a petition to the circuit court of Henrico, alleging error in the proceedings; whereupon the circuit court awarded a certiorari to bring before it the proceedings and judgment of the mayor as well as those of the hustings court; and upon this process, the record of the proceedings and judgment of the hustings court, which contained those of the mayor, were certified to the circuit court.

And then the defendant by petition prayed the circuit court to award a writ of error to the judgment of the hustings court; assigning for error, 1. That the warrant was prosecuted for Lipscomb alone, instead of being a qui tam proceeding, for the commonwealth as well as himself; 2. that such warrant did not lie for owner of a runaway slave, he having an action for damages; 3. that it was no where stated in the proceedings, that the defendant was an inhabitant of the city of Richmond, and so it did not appear 815 *that the mayor or the hustings court had jurisdiction of the case; and 4. that the hustings court gave judgment for costs, which in such case could not be adjudged. Whereupon, the circuit court, with consent of the parties, adjourned the case to this court, as one of novelty and difficulty, upon the following points:

1. The judgment in this case being for a fine for the breach of a penal law, will the writ of certiorari lie in such a case, if there be error in the judgment? 2. Ought the circuit court to award a writ of error to the judgment of the hustings court? 3. What judgment ought the circuit court to render in the case?

PER CURIAM—This court is of opinion, and doth decide; 1. That as the judgment which was rendered by the mayor of Richmond was appealed from by Tankersley under the 23rd section of the county court law, and the mayor's judgment was affirmed by the hustings court against the said appellant and her surety under the 25th section of that statute, the case was taken out of the jurisdiction of the mayor; and that the court of hustings being a court of record, a certiorari does not lie to a judgment rendered in that court, and that this is true when the prosecution is for the breach of a penal law, as well as in a merely civil case.

2. That there is no error in the judgment of the hustings court; and therefore no writ of error should be awarded in this case.

3. That the circuit court ought to dismiss the certiorari as having been improvidently

Rev. Code, ch. 170, p. 236, imposing a fine of not less than ten nor more than twenty dollars for the offence. Of course, the prosecution is within the jurisdiction of a single magistrate.—Note in Original Edition.

awarded, refuse to award, the writ of error, and give judgment against the appellant Tankersley, for the costs of the appellee Lipscomb, in the circuit court.

Wills—Foreign Probate—Validity.*—A copy of a will proved in Louisiana according to the laws of that state, and offered for probate here, is not authenticated according to the act of congress of May 28, 1790, but is authenticated according to the rules of the common law: Held, the copy is duly authenticated, within the meaning of the statute of wills, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 16.

Seals—Foreign Court or State—Proof.—The seal of a court of a foreign country must be proved; the seal of a foreign state or nation proves itself.

Wills—Foreign Probate—Authenticated Copy—Validity.—When an authenticated copy of a will proved in another or foreign state, is offered for probate here, if the probat shew that the will has been so proved there, as that if proved in like manner here, it could only be admitted to probat here, as a will of personalty, it shall be so admitted; but if the proof in the foreign court of probat be such as if taken here would suffice to establish it as a will of lands, it shall be admitted to probat here also, as a will of lands.

A copy of the last will and testament of Richard Povall deceased, and of the proceedings had for the proof thereof in the court of probat for the parish of Ascension in the state of Louisiana, was offered by Francis Povall, for probat in this court. The process verbal contained the will, the depositions of two witnesses proving that it was written wholly in the hand writing of the testator himself, and the sentence of the court thereupon in the following words—"The said will being found clothed with all the requisites of the law, and the formalities for the probat of the same having been all duly complied with; it is, therefore, adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the said will be executed, recorded and deposited, according to law." The copy was certified to be a true copy from the original process verbal of the proof of the will, by Edward Duffet, the judge of the court of probat, under his hand and the seal of the court; and the governor of Louisiana certified under the seal of the state, that Mr. Duffet was the judge of the court of probat, and that full faith and credit were due to his signature as such.

And the questions were, 1. Whether this copy, not being authenticated according to the provisions of the act of congress of May 26, 1790, 2 Bior. p. 102, was yet duly authenticated *so as to be admitted to probat here? And 2. Whether the will could be admitted to probat here, upon the proofs contained in the process verbal of the court of probat of Louisiana, under the provisions of the statute of wills?†

BROCKENBROUGH, J. The first question is, whether this is an authenticated copy? It is not authenticated according to the provisions of the act of congress. But, though that act precribes a convenient method for the authentication of copies of wills proved in other states, and offered for probat here, and this court has, in various instances, adjudged that copies of wills authenticated according thereto shall be admitted to record; yet the court is unanimously of opinion, that the act of congress does not furnish the exclusive rule in such cases, and that a copy of a will authenticated according to the rules of the common law should be held duly authenticated. In the present case, the copy of the will has the seal of the judge of probat; and the governor of the state, under the seal of the state, has certified that he was the judge, and that full faith and credit is due to his signature as such. The seal of the court of a foreign country requires proof; but the seal of the sovereign power of a nation proves itself, and gives authenticity to instruments certified under it. Therefore, this instrument is duly authenticated.

The next and most important question is, whether, under the statute of wills, an authenticated copy of a will, proved

818 *according to the laws of one of the United States, or of a foreign country, must, when produced and offered here for probat, still be proved by witnesses, in open court, or under a commission emanating from our court of probat, under the provision of the statute, that "the proof to be made by the witness shall be conformed to the nature of the case." If this were a new question, doubts might be entertained concerning the proper construction of the statute; and a difference of opinion has frequently manifested itself, and now exists in this court, on the subject. But that law, as it is now written, has existed for nearly forty-two years; and it is believed, there is not a single instance in which the testimony of witnesses in this court, or obtained by virtue of a dedimus potestatem issuing hence, has been required, to admit any will to probat. In one instance, after admitting the will to probat as a will of personal estate, the court did issue a commission to take the depositions of the subscribing witnesses; but the commission has never been executed, and the will (Bacon's will) has not been admitted as a will of real estate. It is, however, understood to be the settled construction of the statute, that when the authenticated copy is produced, if it shews that the will has been so proved in a foreign court, as that if proved in like manner by witnesses here, it could only be admitted as a will of personalty, it shall be so admitted here; but, if the evidence taken in the foreign court, be such that, if taken in this court, it would be sufficient to establish it as a will of lands, it shall be admitted to probat here also as a will of lands. It is not necessary to decide, whether, a certificate given by a foreign court (without spreading the evidence itself on the record) which shews that such was the evimanner as to the said court shall seem necessary, and the proof to be made by the witnesses shall be conformed to the nature of the case. But such will shall be liable to be contested and controverted. In the same manner as the original might have been."

—Note in Original Edition.

dence there, will be sufficient or not, for the admission of the will to probat here, as a will of lands. In this case, there is no doubt. This was an olograph will, proved as such by two witnesses in the court of probat of Louisiana, and their evidence is set forth. Such evidence given here to prove an original will, would be amply sufficient 819 to admit the will to probat, *generally: and while all of us are of opinion that this will should be admitted to probat as a will of personalty, a large majority are of opinion that it should be admitted to probat as a will of real estate also.

JUDGES UPSHUR, LOMAX, R. B. TAYLOR, and DUNCAN dissented from so much of the opinion as declared the will properly proved as a will of lands, and therefore from the sentence admitting it to probat and record generally: these judges held, that it ought to be admitted to probat and record, as a will of personal estate only.

Code, ch. 104, § 1. Todd, however, only asked that it should be admitted to probat and record here, as a will of personal estate.

BROCKENBROUGH, J. The copy is duly authenticated. The certificate of the probat in Kentucky, states that it was proved by the oaths of three subscribing witnesses: it does not shew, that it was an olograph will, or that the attesting witnesses subscribed their names in the testator's presence. But it is not asked, that the will shall be admitted to probat and record here, as a will of real estate, but only as a will of personal estate. We, therefore, waive the inquiry, whether the law of Kentucky is the same with our's on this subject, and whether, if so and the will was admitted to probat there as a will of real estate, it would or would not be sufficient for us to admit the authenticated copy to probat here as a will of real estate.

Sentence—That the copy be admitted to probat and record as a will of personal estate.

The Commonwealth v. Beeson.

July, 1832.

Roads—Established along River Bank—Right of Public to Take Additional Land without Condemnation Where Road is Washed Away.—If a public road be opened and established along the bank of a river, on land of an individual proprietor regularly condemned for the purpose, according to the statute, and the land on which the road was so opened and established, be washed away, in whole or in part, by high waters, the public has no right to take so much other adjoining land of the proprietor as may suffice for the highway, without a new view and condemnation thereof, and compensation for the same, according to the statute.

Same—Same—Same—Liability of Owner for Nuisance in Use of Land before Condemnation.—And if, in such case, the public be entitled to additional land for the road, the proprietor cannot be guilty of any nuisance in the use of the land for his own purposes, until the road shall have been actually laid out and opened by the public through the instrumentality of its agents.

Case adjourned from the circuit superiour court of Wood.

At April term 1832, the grand jury found an indictment against Agness Beeson for a nuisance. The indictment charged that the defendant, being the owner of certain lands in the county of Wood, contiguous to a public road there, on the 25th March 1832, and thenceforth till the 1st April following, permitted a fence of rails made across the road to remain and be continued, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth.

The attorney for the commonwealth and the defendant agreed the following case: That for thirty years past, there had been a road and public highway leading from Parkersburg, along the bank of the Ohio river, to Marietta, being the same road described in the indictment: that the defendant

822 *was the owner of a small farm bounding on the river for some forty or fifty rods; and the road passed along the bank of the river, through the defendant's land, and was bounded on the one side by the river, and on the other by the defendant's fence: and that during a recent great and extraordinary fresh in the river, the ground on which the road ran, for its intire extent through the defendant's land, was washed away, nearly to the defendant's fence, whereby the road was rendered wholly impassable, unless the defendant's fence should be removed. And if upon this state of facts, the defendant was bound to set in her fence, and give more ground for the road, without a new view and condemnation of the same, in the manner of condemning lands for public highways, then judgment should be entered for the commonwealth for an amercement of one dollar; but if the defendant was not bound so to set in her fence until the land should be regularly viewed and condemned for public use, then judgment should be entered for the defendant.

The circuit superior court, with the consent of the defendant, adjourned to this court all questions of law arising on the case agreed, as novel and difficult.

Attorney general for the commonwealth.

Leigh for the defendant.

THOMPSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The record does not inform us how the highway mentioned in the indictment was established, whether on a writ of ad quod damnum in pursuance of the statute concerning roads and landings (2 Rev. Code, ch. 236, § 1, 2, p. 233,) or by express grant of or contract with the proprietor of the land, or by presumption of such grant or contract arising from the public use of the way for a great length of time: the indictment (as it well might) describes it, in general terms, as a public highway, without shewing how it became such. The case agreed, never-

823 theless, should have disclosed *how the public derived its right of way. Owing to this omission, the court, not exactly foreseeing how far its decision might depend on or be varied by the state of that fact or the omission to state it, would have remanded the cause, in order that the defect might be supplied, but for the suggestion of the counsel, that a speedy decision of the principal question intended to be adjourned, was interesting and important to a whole community, as it would be decisive of a numerous class of similar cases, arisen and likely to arise, and prevent and end much litigation; which suggestion was coupled with the concession both of the defendant's counsel and attorney general, that the court should consider the case, as if the record stated the road to have been established, (as most probably it was) in pursuance of the statute, upon the execution and return of a writ of ad quod damnum.

The charge in the indictment is, for permitting or continuing a nuisance in an existing public highway; existing actually and in fact, and not merely by implication of law, if such a thing could be, where no road had ever been laid out or opened. The case agreed states, that the highway described in the indictment, was washed away by a recent fresh in the Ohio, and did not exist at the date of the commission of the alleged nuisance; that the fence now complained of as an obstruction to the road and a nuisance, was legally and rightfully erected on the defendant's private property; that it now stands where it was so erected, forming no obstruction to the road mentioned in the indictment (for that is gone) nor to any public highway now actually existing or in use, or that ever existed or was used. but that it covers ground over which the public have a right to open a public highway, in lieu of the one destroyed by the floods, though as yet the public have taken no steps to open a road upon the land where the fence stands. To say nothing, at present, of the variance between the case charged and the case agreed, and supposing that the indictment had been so framed as to fit the case agreed; 824 conceding too, for the *sake of argument, that, in such a case as the present, the public have a right to take adjacent land without compensation, to the extent of the loss sustained by the flood, for the purpose of a public highway; still the question remains, whether an individual in the defendant's situation, is bound to remove a fence lawfully erected, and on failure to do so, is indictable as for a nuisance to a public highway? or, in such a case, would it be the duty of the public, by its agent the surveyor of the old highway, to remove fences, lay out and open the new road, and until the road were thus laid out and opened by him, could a nuisance be committed upon it? We are of opinion, that it was not the duty of the defendant to move in her fence, even though the right of the commonwealth be conceded, but on the contrary, it would be incumbent on the public to locate its right of way upon the particular land claimed for the highway. This it could and should do by the agency of the surveyor, by some such act as laying out and opening the road, removing fences &c., and until this were done, no nuisance could be said to be erected or continued upon this imaginary highway. But suppose this were otherwise, and that a nuisance could be committed on a road never in fact opened, and alleged to exist only in legal contemplation of law, yet we are of opinion, that the variance between the case charged and the case agreed, would be fatal to this prosecution: for the nuisance is charged to have been permitted or continued in the road as existing and established, whereas it appears by the case agreed, to have been continued on land never before used or condemned for a road, where none was ever laid out or opened, where in fact none ever actually existed, and where, if there be a right of way at all, it exists only in contemplation of law, the road designated in the indictment, having been actually swept away. The decision of both or either of these points, in favor of the defendant, would suffice to dispose of this particular case. But they are, confessedly, the minor and technical points in the cause, and do not touch the important question intended to be adjourned.

825 *That question is, Whether, in the case of a public highway regularly established according to the statute, along the bank of a water course, if the ground on which the road runs be destroyed by abrasion, overflow, or permanent change of the bed of the stream, the commonwealth is entitled, at its pleasure, to substitute a sufficient quantity of the adjacent land for the highway, in lieu of that destroyed, without view, condemnation and compensation, in the manner prescribed by the statute? It is contended, that she is: that she acquires by the judgment of the county court affirming the inquisition, and giving leave to lay out and open the road, a right of way, which, when it is bounded by a water course, varies and fluctuates with the fluctuations of the bed or banks of the stream; that the seisin and freehold is not divested by the judgment of the county court, but remains with the original proprietor or his successors in interest; that upon an abandonment of the way by the public, it reverts to the proprietor of the land; that as, on the one hand, he continues riparian owner, entitled to the benefit of any acquisition of soil by alluvial accretion, or otherwise, and in addition to this benefit, has once received actual compensation, and is reverser of the land occupied by the public when the public easement ceases; so, on the other hand, he should bear the risk of loss incident to land thus situated. There is certainly, some plausibility in this argument; but we think when followed to its consequences, it will be found so utterly at war with the letter and spirit of our law, and indeed the general principles of justice, as to justify us in pronouncing the argument wholly untenable however specious. It will not be denied, that, in this commonwealth, private property can only be taken for public purposes, and then only upon making a just compensation to the party deprived. This is a sound principle of our fundamental law; and our road laws, in accordance with it, has certainly prescribed the mode in which the public right shall be exercised, as well as furnished the most guarded means by which this just compensation is to be ascertained

826 *and paid. A jury of freeholders is to view the identical land on which it is proposed to conduct the highway; to identify the land with reasonable certainty in its inquisition; and to assess the value of the very land thus viewed and identified, as well as the value of the additional fencing made necessary by the road. The jury is not called upon, nor is it at liberty, to value a general right of way, confined to no fixed and determinate part of the land, which may shift with the whim or caprice of the public, or with circumstances arising out of casualty or accident: if it were, it would be difficult, if not impossible, so to assess the value and damages as to constitute an equal and just measure of compensation; for it would depend upon contingent and subsequent events, whether its assessment would be too high or too low: if the road should be suffered to remain on sterile land, the estimate might be too high; if shifted from barren to fertile land, it might be too low. This same statute which has conferred the right upon the public (and imposed the conditions upon which the right may be exercised) to take private property for public uses in any case, has imposed this limit upon the right,—that in no case, without the consent of the owner, shall the mansion house, curtilage &c. be invaded for public purposes, whether with or without compensation.

Let us now illustrate, by a few supposable and by no means extreme cases, the consequences to which the argument for the affirmative of this question inevitably leads. A strip of sterile land bounded by a water course, is condemned by the public for a highway, and the value is assessed and paid; it is afterwards (as in this case) carried away by a flood: the commonwealth has the right to make reprisal of land of double, treble or quadruple value, without making any additional compensation. Suppose that by the operation of the flood, or other natural causes, the road is not only swept away, but the bank has receded so as to bring the stream to the threshold of the mansion house or mill, or other valuable erection, or to the very verge of the 827 *curtilage: it would necessarily result from sustaining the right claimed for the commonwealth, that the mansion house, mill or curtilage, might be entered by the commonwealth, in virtue of this shifting right of way, notwithstanding the limitation of the right imposed upon the public in original applications to establish roads. They could not only be entered and prostrated by the public, but would become indictable nuisances, according to one of the hypotheses of law involved in this prosecution. Suppose again, that all the lands of the proprietor who received compensation upon the writ of ad quod damnum, be washed away, or so irreparably injured as to make a road upon them utterly impracticable: would not the doctrine contended for necessarily conduct us to this consequence, that the commonwealth would have a right to enter upon the land of an adjacent owner who had never received any compensation, and appropriate a sufficient quantity for the highway, without view, condemnation or compensation? If such be the legitimate consequences flowing from the positions assumed on the affirmative side of this question, (and they appear to the court inevitably and necessarily to follow) the positions themselves must be condemned and repudiated as untenable and unsound. They must be discarded, because when compared with our statute, they are found to conflict with the plain and obvious interpretation of its provisions, with its letter and its spirit. That statute does not authorize the public against the consent of the owner, by the exercise of the sovereign power, to acquire a general right of way over his land: it must condemn a particular part of his land to be ascertained and identified. Upon what principle then, should we be justified in holding, that the land condemned shall remain at the risk of the original proprietor, rather than at the risk of the public, and that if destroyed by the flood, the commonwealth may indemnify herself by taking the adjacent land.

We consider the question, upon our statute, a clear one against the right claimed 828 for the public: nor apart from the *statute, do we believe any authority in point can be adduced, either from the common or the civil law, to sustain the pretensions of the commonwealth: if any such exist, the court has not been referred to it. It is true that it is laid down by english commentators, and by the civilians, and ruled by the english judges in Taylor v. Whitehead, Doug. 744, as well as in cases before and subsequent, that if the usual tracks of a public way be rendered impassable, it is for the general good that the people should be allowed to pass over the adjacent land, and that such passage would not constitute a trespass: in this principle Blackstone says, the civil and the common law agree. The english authorities mentioned, expressly negative such a right in the case of private way. These authorities are not understood by this court as touching such a case as the present. They are understood to affirm the right of the public to a temporary way of necessity, in case of a reparable injury, until the highway can be repaired, and nothing more; by no means to transfer and permanently fix the right of way in a new location in case of total and irreparable destruction of the ancient way. The mode at present existing of acquiring land for public purposes in England, is precisely or very nearly the same as that prescribed by our statute—by writ of ad quod damnum. We are not apprised of any civilized code that would sanction such a claim on the part of the public, except that of Pennsylvania, where it would be reasonable and proper (subject to the limitation, that the curtilage shall not be invaded, in consequence of the shifting of the highway) because the public makes no compensation for the land condemned for the purpose of highways, the proprietor there having taken the land charged with the general public servitude of highways, expressly reserved by law in the earliest periods of the commonwealth, and being compensated in advance for the reservation. That state, in every grant, throws in, without compensation or price, six acres in the hundred, for which she reserves to herself the right of making as many roads through every man's land as the public interest requires, without compensation. Here, no such reservation is found in the grant or the law; no such compensation is made; and no man's freehold shall be taken but upon payment of a fair, a just, a full compensation.

Therefore, the court is of opinion and doth decide—1. That the defendant is not bound to set in her fence and give more land, without a new view and condemnation of the same, in the manner of condemning lands for public highways. 2. That, even if the public were entitled to the land without compensation, the defendant could not be guilty of a nuisance until the road had been actually laid out and opened by the public, through the instrumentality of its agents. 3. That the offence charged, and the facts appearing by the case agreed (if the court had not decided that they constituted no offence), are too variant, to warrant a judgment of conviction.

DUNCAN, J., concurred in the two last resolutions; but he declined the expression of any opinion on the first point.

NOTES.

(a) In the years marked (a), the executor being in advance, is not only allowed interest, but that interest is aggregated with the principal; for when he is in advance to the estate, he is to be treated as a common creditor.

(b) In the years marked (b), a balance being due to the estate, the interest on that balance for the year is calculated, but kept in a separate column; and all the disbursements are exclusively applied to sink the principal.

(c) In the year marked (c), the disbursements exceeding the receipts of the current year, together interest on that balance is aggregated with the principal, in order to set off against the disbursements; and that aggregate being still insufficient to meet the disbursements, the interest of former years is brought into the aggregate, and set against the disbursements. A balance then appears due the estate of $800; but this being all interest, is, in the account of the succeeding year, carried back again into the interest column on the credit side of the account.

(d) In the year marked (d), the disbursements discharge the whole of the principal and interest in arrears, and give a balance due to the executor in

ABSENT DEBTORS.

1. In a bill in chancery, against a debtor as an absent debtor or defendant, and other defendants resident, holding lands by voluntary or fraudulent conveyances from the debtor, to have a decree against the debtor for the debt, and against the home defendants to subject the lands to the debt; the bill, in order to give the court jurisdiction, under the statute concerning attachments and suits against absent defendants, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, must distinctly aver the non-residence of the debtor; and, if the home defendants in their answers say that the debtor is a resident, though they do not plead that matter in abatement to the jurisdiction, the plaintiff, to sustain the jurisdiction, must prove the fact of the debtor's residence abroad; and if his non-residence be not distinctly averred in the bill, or, if so denied by the home defendants, be not proved, the court has no jurisdiction, and a decree for the plaintiff will be reversed on that ground.

Kelso v. Blackburn,

2. In the case of a foreign attachment in chancery, to attach a debt alleged to be due from a home defendant to the absent defendant, to satisfy a debt due from the absentee to the plaintiff, the garnishee may set up any equitable defence which shews that in equity he owes no debt to the absent defendant.

3. Upon a foreign attachment in chancery, to subject lands of the absent debtor, to a debt claimed by the attaching creditor, payable in instalments, some of which have, and others have not, fallen due, at the time of the decree: Held, the court ought not to direct the sale of the subject, to satisfy more than the instalments already due; but should order a sale to satisfy what is due, and hold the creditor's attachment a lien on the subject, for the instalments afterwards to fall due.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

1. In cases before courts of law.

1. The county and corporation courts being courts of record, the writ of certiorari does not lie to a judgment of a corporation court affirming a judgment of a single magistrate, although his is not a court of record, for a fine imposed by a penal law, or in a civil case.

Tankersley v. Lipscomb,

836 *2. One supersedeas to five judgments, though between the same parties, and upon claims of the like nature, and though the question be the same in all the cases, is irregular, and ought to be quashed as improvidently allowed.

Ayres v. Lewellin,

3. A. recovers five judgments for debt against L. in the county court; at the instance of L., the circuit court awards one supersedeas to the five judgments, and reverses them by a single judgment; to this judgment the court of appeals, at the instance of A. awards a supersedeas, reverses the judgment of the circuit court, and orders the supersedeas awarded by the circuit court to be quashed as improvidently allowed: Held, A. is entitled to his costs in the circuit court as well as in the court of appeals, but not to damages.

Ibid., 609

4. Judgment for H. against J. in the circuit court, from which J. appeals to court of appeals; circuit court requires an appeal bond, and J. gives one, which though defective is accepted by circuit court, and the appeal brought up; pending the appeal J. dies and the appeal is revived by his administrator; after lapse of five years from date of judgment, which is the limitation to a writ of error or supersedeas, appellee objects that the appeal bond is defective and naught, and moves that the appeal shall be dismissed unless the appellant's administrator shall give a good bond: Motion overruled.

Jackson's adm'r v. Henderson &c., 196

5. In a controversy concerning the probat of a will of real as well as personal estate, in a circuit court, the evidence of the witnesses as noted by the judge, is, by consent, spread on the record; the evidence thus stated is wholly silent as to the execution of the will by the testator, and attestation by the witnesses; but it is clearly to be collected from the record, that the only point in controversy was, whether the testator was of sound mind, and that the due execution of it, supposing him sane, was not disputed; the circuit court, being satisfied that the testator was of sound mind, and, therefore, admitting the will to probat, the court of appeals, concurring in the opinion of the circuit court as to the sanity of the testator, affirmed the sentence — Dissentiente TUCKER, P. who thought that the cause ought to be remanded to the circuit court for a new hearing, on which the evidence of due execution, now wanting, might be supplied.

Duff v. Duff's ex'rs,

II. In suits in equity.

6. On a bill by vendee against vendor for specific execution, if no objection to the vendor's title be made in the court of chancery, in any form, he cannot be heard to make such objection in the court of appeals.

Brockenbrough &c. v. Blythe's ex'rs and others,

619

7. Upon a bill and supplemental bill against two executors, there is a decree against one of them, on one of the grounds of complaint in the original bill, and the original bill as to all things else dismissed, and the supplemental bill reversed for future consideration; the executor against whom the decree is, appeals; the plaintiff does not appeal from the residue of the decree dismissing the other executor from the court as to the matters in the original bill; the court of appeals, finding errors in the decree, injurious to the appellee, both as to the executor who appealed, and as to the executor as to whom the original bill was dismissed, and that the transactions of the two executors are indissolubly blended with each other, will correct the errors as to both executors, especially as the decree is interlocutory.

ASSENT TO LEGACY.

ASSIGNMENT.

I. Construction of instrument.

1. T. C. by his will dated 17th of May, gives one third of his whole estate to his wife for life, remainder to his two children T. and E. and the other two thirds to T. and E. presently; then, by deed dated 26th May, he assigns "all debts now due to him" to a trustee for his son T. Held, this deed assigns all debts due and payable to the donor at the date of the deed, but not such debts as though contracted had not become payable at the date of the deed.

Collins's adm'r &c. v. Janey &c., 389
And, it seems, T. may elect to claim, either under the will, or under the deed; he cannot claim the subject given by the deed, and then claim his moiety of two thirds of the estate as legatee or devisee under the will. Ibid., 389

2. A deed of trust and assignment of effects, made by a debtor to trustees, for the benefit of his creditors, in 1809, conveys and assigns to the trustees, all the debtor's estate real and personal in 887 Virginia *or elsewhere, upon trust, that the trustees shall collect all the debts due or to become due to the grantor, on account of transactions prior to the deed, and shall sell the real and personal estate, and institute suits at law or in equity for the recovery of the debts due the grantor to be applied to the purposes of the trust: the board of commissioners sitting under the treaty between the U. States and Spain of February 1819, award a sum of money to the administrator of the grantor, for and on account of claims on the spanish government for spoillations before the date of the deed of trust: HELD, this money passed by the deed to the trustees for the purposes of the trust.

Maitland &c. v. Newton, adm'r &c., 714

II. Rights and liabilities of assignee.

3. Though the assignee of a bond takes it subject to any equity of the obligor, that attached to it in the hands of the obligee, he does not take it subject to any equity of a third person, not party to the bond, of which he has no notice: Therefore, where H. sold land to M. and took no security for the purchase money; and M. then sold the same land to F. took his bonds for the purchase money, and assigned those bonds for valuable consideration, the assignees having no notice of H.'s claim to a lien on the land for the purchase money due him by M.—though H. might have been entitled to payment of the purchase money due him from M. out of the purchase money due from F. to M. If F.'s bonds for the same had remained in M.'s hands, yet H. cannot assert any such equity as against the bona fide assignees of the bonds.

ATTACHMENT.

I. Against absconding debtors.

1. One member of a mercantile house to which a debt has been contracted but has not yet fallen due, is competent to make complaint on oath and to sue out an attachment against the debtor, under the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, § 14.

Kyle & Co. v. Connelly, 719

2. Though the statute requires that such complaint shall be made on oath as the foundation of the process, it does not require that the fact of the complaint having been verified by oath shall be certified by the justices, and made part of the record: if, on the trial, objection be made that the attachment was issued without complaint verified by oath, the fact that the oath was administered may be proved; if no objection be then made on that ground, it is too late to take such objection in an appellate court. Ibid., 719

3. As one member of a mercantile house to which a debt has been contracted is competent to sue out an attachment for the house against the debtor, so that member is the proper person to execute the attachment bond required by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, § 7. And the bond of the partner suing out the attachment, with surety, conditioned that that partner shall pay all costs, in case the house shall be cast in the suit, and all damages that shall be adjudged against him for suing out the attachment is a good bond. Ibid., 719

4. How judgment shall be rendered for the plaintiffs upon an attachment for a debt contracted but not due, when the attachment has been laid on goods of the debtor, and on moneys due him in the hands of garnishees, where the value of the effects attached is uncertain, and may exceed the plaintiffs' claim. BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. Upon a motion to set aside a verdict, and for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence, the motion is overruled, but the circuit court refuses to certify the facts proved by the evidence, and only certifies the evidence, and that nothing appeared to impeach the credit of any part of it: bill of exceptions states the evidence at large, which is, in some respects, variant and conflicting: HELD, this bill of exceptions is not well taken, and the appellate court cannot review the judgment of the circuit court overruling the 888 motion for a new trial.

CHARITIES.

1. Testator directs his executors to lay by $2000, to be distributed among needy, poor and respectable widows; and, in case the Roman catholic chapel shall be continued at time of his death, to pay $1000 towards its support; and, if the Roman catholic congregation shall come to a determination to build a chapel at Richmond, to pay $3000 towards its accomplishment; and he devises a lot in Richmond, to four trustees in fee, upon trust to permit all and every person belonging to the Roman catholic church as members thereof, or professing that religion, and residing in Richmond at the time of his death, to build a church on the lot, for the use of themselves and of all others of that religion who may hereafter reside in Richmond: Upon information filed by the attorney general, in chancery, to enforce the charitable bequests and devise: HELD, that the bequests and devise are uncertain as to the beneficiaries, and therefore void.

Gallego's ex'rs v. The attorney general, 450

2. The english statute of charitable uses (43 Eliz.) having been repealed in Virginia, the courts of chancery have no jurisdiction to decree charities, where the objects are indefinite and uncertain. Ibid., 450

CLERICAL ERRORS.

Upon an appeal from a judgment of a circuit court, the court of appeals cannot inspect the minutes of the proceedings taken by the clerk, for the purpose of correcting a mistake in the entry of the judgment on the order book; alter, in the case of a judgment of a county court.

Christian &c. v. Miller, 78

CLERK.

The official bond of a clerk of a county or circuit court, with condition for the faithful execution of the office, required by the statutes of 1792, ch. 66, § 13, and ch. 70, § 3, was not intended to secure the collection of taxes on law process &c. though it has been made the duty of the clerk ex officio to collect and account for such taxes, nor are the clerk and his sureties liable upon this bond, for his failure to collect, account for and pay such taxes into the treasury: the bond required by those statutes, extends only to those duties of the office that are properly clerical.

CONTRACT.

I. Where void for fraud.

1. A person reduced to a state of mental imbecility by habitual intoxication, makes a voluntary and irrevocable deed of gift of his whole estate, to a cousin german, to the disherison of his half sisters, reserving the use to the donor for life, without any reasonable motive assigned for such an act: HELD, fraud and imposition may be inferred from the circumstances, and from the very nature of the contract; and this deed of gift is fraudulent and void.

Samuel v. Marshall & wife & others, 567

2. In such cases, drunkenness, if produced by the donee, or if so extreme that the party did not know what he was about, is a material circumstance in deciding on the validity of the contract; and imbecility of mind, however produced, combined with other ingredients, and particularly with the absence of consideration, has always an important influence on the question of the validity of contracts. Ibid., 567

3. If a written agreement not under seal, be altered by the party claiming under it in a material part: HELD, he can never recover upon the agreement so altered, nor can he avall himself of the contract in its original and true form: there is no distinction between deeds and other written instruments in this respect.

Newell v. Mayberry, 250

II. When it may be rescinded for mistake.

4. Where, in an agreement, a mutual mistake is made, by both parties, in a matter which is the cause and subject of the contract, that is, in the substance of the thing contracted for, no fraud being imputable to either party; such mistake is good ground in equity for rescinding the agreement, even after it has been fully executed by conveyances by both parties.

Glassell v. Thomas, 113

5. And where an agreement is rescinded, it must be entirely rescinded. Ibid., 113

III. Where one party being in default, the other disaffirms.

6. Where one purchases goods deliverable at a future day, and presently binds himself by deed to pay the purchase money, or pays it in cash; the purchaser, in case the goods be not delivered, cannot disaffirm the contract, and claim the stipulated price paid, or contracted to be paid, but can only recover damages against the vendor for breach of his contract.

Christian & wife & another v. Miller, 78

IV. Construction of contract.

7. Covenants with B. and J. that he will pay them $300. to wit, to each of them one moiety thereof, and also the sum of $400. upon a certain condition: HELD, this is a covenant to B. and J. severally, to pay each a moiety of each sum: so that J. being dead, B. cannot maintain an action to recover the whole.

Cartthrae v. Brown, 98

8. Agreement between M. and N. that if N. can get possession of a runaway slave belonging to M. before a certain day, N. shall have the slave at a stipulated price, and that the agreement shall continue in force only till that day: N. gets possession of the slave, after the appointed day, and continues to hold him: HELD, M. may maintain an action for the slave, but not for the stipulated price.

Newell v. Mayberry, 250

9. A. and B. holding the legal title of an undivided moiety of land, by purchase and conveyance from C. the title of the other moiety being in D. an infant, and C. having covenanted to sell them the infant's moiety also, and A. and B. having under C.'s conveyance and covenant, taken possession of the whole and made improvements; they sell and convey the moiety they had purchased of C. to E. for $12,750; and they covenant with E. to use their best endeavours to get in the legal title of the infant's moiety, and if procured, to sell and convey that also to E. for $6750; but if the legal title of the infant's moiety cannot be got in within a year, then E. shall be at liberty, in their name or his own, to institute any legal proceedings against their vendor C. for his E.'s own benefit and advantage; and if they shall not be able to get in the legal title of the infant's moiety, then E. shall pay them the first mentioned sum of $12,750 only—A. and B. use their best endeavours to get in the legal title of the infant's moiety within the year, by procuring the infant's friends to make application to the legislature, upon a full state of the facts, to authorize her guardian to sell and convey it, in which they fail: HELD, that after the expiration of the year, the contract of A. and B. with E. with respect to the sale of the infant's moiety, was at an end; and though E. had a right to prefer a bill against C. and the infant D. for specific execution, in the name of A. and B. yet he was to prosecute that suit for his own benefit and at his own risque, and as between him and A. and B. was bound to bear the burden of paying the purchase money with interest, to the infant D. upon her conveyance of her moiety, after her full age, in conformity with C.'s contract.

DAMAGES.

1. Upon a bill in chancery by vendee against vendor of land, after the contract fully executed by conveyance of the land and securities given for the purchase money, alleges fraud practised by vendor's agents on the vendee, in the original agreement, and praying that the contract may be rescinded for the fraud, and general relief: the court having held that plaintiff, under the circumstances of the case, was not entitled to a rescission of the contract, held further, that he was not entitled to ask, that the damages he had sustained by reason of the alleged fraud, should be ascertained by the court of chancery, and decreed to him in abatement from the purchase money.

Robertson v. Hogsheads, 667

2. A bill, in any form, claiming damages for breach of contract, cannot be entertained in equity; neither can unliquidated damages be set off in equity. Ibid., 667

DECLARATION.

1. A declaration in assumpsit on a bill of exchange, by holder against endorser, alleges that "when the bill became due and payable according to the tenour and effect thereof, to wit: on the 27th December 1816, at the bank of Marietta in Ohio" (where it was payable) it was presented for payment and dishonoured; the 27th December was not the third but the fourth day after the time appointed for the payment of the bill: HELD, that, as it was averred that the bill was presented when it became due and payable according to its tenour and effect, and the date of the presentment was stated under a scilicet, the date so stated was not material, and the plaintiff might have proved presentment on the third day of grace.

Jackson's adm'x v. Henderson &c., 197

2. It seems, that when a bill is made payable at a place or bank, at which there is a special established usage, that bills there payable shall be presented on the fourth and not on the third day of grace, such special usage must be alleged in the declaration upon such bill, otherwise proof of presentation on the fourth day of grace is not admissible. Ibid., 197

3. In assumpsit on a bill of exchange, drawn in Virginia, payable at the bank of Marietta, Ohio: the declaration counting on the general law merchant, and the general issue being joined: HELD, that as the general law merchant requires presentation on the third day of grace, proof of presentation on the fourth day of grace does not support the issue on the plaintiff's part. Ibid., 197

DEMURRER.

1. On general demurrer to a declaration, the court looks always to the substantial meaning of its allegations, to ascertain whether it states good cause of action.

Mowry v. Miller., 561

2. Upon an appeal from a judgment in covenant, the covenant not being set out in the pleadings upon oyer, and the question being whether the declaration shewed good cause of action; the court can only look at the covenant as pleaded in the declaration; and though the instrument be set out in a bill of exceptions taken at the trial, the court can pay no regard to it, in deciding on the sufficiency of the declaration.

Carthrae v. Brown., 96

DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

1. It is the settled practice in Virginia, on demurrer to evidence, that the demurrant shall set out the whole evidence, and that the court may compel the other party to join in the demurrer, without requiring the demurrant to make a formal admission on the record, of all the inferences of fact which the court may thing fairly deducible from the evidence demurred to.

Hansbrough's ex'ors v. Thom., 147

2. By demurring to evidence, the demurrant waives all evidence on his own part that conflicts with that of the other party, admits the credit of the evidence demurred to, admits all inferences of fact that may be fairly deduced from the evidence, but only such facts as are fairly deducible, and refers it to the court to deduce the fair inferences from the evidence. Ibid., 147

3. The English practice, and that which prevails in Virginia, in respect to demurrers to evidence, compared. Ibid., 147

4. In detinue for slaves, the question being whether a contract between plaintiff and defendant's testator, was a gift or a sale of the slaves by the latter to the former, the defendant demurs to the plaintiff's evidence: Held, the evidence states facts, from which it may fairly be inferred, that the contract was a sale, though there was no express proof of any valuable consideration paid or stipulated, and that therefore it was a sale. Ibid., 147

2. Testator expresses his will and desire, that his slave J. Gilbert should be free, but finding it would be difficult for it to be so, and for him to remain in Virginia, he directs his executors to lay off three acres of land for him, and to let him settle on it and have the use of it during his life and good behaviour, and that he wished Gilbert to enjoy the benefit of his own labour, but to be always under control and direction of his executors; and Gilbert is carefully excepted out of every disposition of testator's slave property in the will: Held, this slave is not hereby emancipated.

ESCHEAT.

1. Land is purchased by or for an alien, and paid for by him or with money furnished by him, but the conveyance is taken to a citizen, upon express trust that he shall hold for the benefit of the alien and his heirs: Held, this trust estate of the alien can only be so acquired by him for the commonwealth, and a court of equity will compel the trustee to execute the trust for her benefit.

Hubbard v. Goodwin; and Kennedy &c. v., 492

2. The court of equity, in such case, follows the law in relation to escheats of legal estates purchased by aliens; and as the law does not, in cases of escheat, give the commonwealth the profits received by the alien or any other person before office found, so neither will equity, in the case of the trust estate, give the commonwealth the profits thereof accrued before decree. Ibid., 492

3. Quære, whether in the case of a purchase of land by a citizen, and the payment of the purchase money by, or with the money of, an alien, a resulting trust may be implied in equity for the alien, and such implied trust executed for the commonwealth? and, per TUCKER, P., equity will not, in such case, imply a trust for the alien, in order to forfeit it to the commonwealth. Ibid., 492

II. Declarations of a dying man.

2. A person, having received a mortal wound, and being unable, in consequence of the wound, for the greater part of the interval that elapsed before his death, to speak at all, and when able to speak, only able to utter a short word or two, yet retaining his perfect senses and understanding, and being under apprehension of his approaching death,—is asked, Did P. V. strike you first? to which he answered, Yes, sir: Did P. V. stab you? to which he also answered, Yes, sir: Do you think you are going to die? to which he again answered, Yes, sir: and is asked a fourth question, which he is unable to answer, but it does not appear what this fourth question was, or whether it had any relation to the subject, or at what interval after the three first it was put to the dying man: Held, these are such death-bed declarations, being distinct and complete in themselves, as were competent evidence on the trial of P. V. on an indictment for the homicide.

Vass v. The Commonwealth., 786

3. But, if it had appeared, that the declarations were designed by the dying man, to be connected with and qualified by other statements, and with them to form an entire complete narrative, and before the purposed disclosure was fully made, it had been interrupted, and the narrative left unfinished; such partial declarations would not have been competent evidence. Ibid., 786

4. The objection, that the questions to which the answers of the dying man were given, were leading questions, is not properly applicable in such a case. Ibid., 786

III. Competency of witness.

5. The obligee and assignor of a bond is not a competent witness for the obligor, *in any controversy between the obligor and assignee, to prove that the contract was founded in a usurious transaction between the assignee and obligor. Gilliam v. Clay & others, 590

Jackson v. Ligon, 161

3. Testator, being about to leave the country, makes his will, and devises that in case of his death, or if he should not be heard of for ten years, his land should be sold for the best price that could be got, as was directed by letter of attorney to J. H. of same date with the will, and proceeds divided among his four sisters: Held, the administrator with the will annexed has power to sell the land, under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 52.

IV. Mode of stating account of executor or administrator.

6. Though there may be circumstances, which ought to exempt an executor from being charged with interest on balances in his hands, yet, in general, an executor is chargeable with interest on such balances; and where, in an ex parte settlement by commissioners, of an executor's accounts, the commissioners improperly omit to state an interest account, and charge the executor with interest, that is cause for surcharging and falsifying the account.

Burwell's ex'rs v. Anderson, adm'r &c., 348

7. The rule of Granberry v. Granberry, 1 Wash. 249, as to mode of stating and charging interest in executor's accounts, examined, explained and settled. Ibid., 348

8. Testator devises, that his lands shall be sold, and the proceeds invested in bank stock, or in such other property as his executors shall think most advantageous to his children; the executors sell the land, but do not invest the proceeds in bank stock, and afterwards account for the proceeds in money: Held, they ought to be charged with interest on the balances in their hands annually, and their disbursements for the maintenance of the children, and on all other accounts, ought to be defrayed out of the interest accruing on the balances.

Garrett, ex'r of Allen v. Carr & wife & another, 407

V. Right to surcharge and falsify account.

9. Executor's accounts are audited before commissioners of the county court, the legatees being present at such settlement thereof; these accounts are returned to the court, approved and recorded: Held, the presence of the legatees at the settlement, is no objection to a bill in chancery to surcharge and falsify the accounts so settled.

Ibid., 407

10. Upon a bill to surcharge and falsify an executor's account, though plaintiff is held to specification of items of surcharge and falsification, yet it is always competent to him to shew, that the account is erroneous upon its face, and (without controverting the items themselves) to shew that they have been so arranged as to produce results injurious to him. Ibid., 407

11. Within what time account may be surcharged.

VI. Remedy on bond of executor or administrator.

12. M. H. administrator of R. H. recovers a judgment against E. B. administratrix of R. B. for debt due plaintiff's intestate, and sues out a fi. fa. thereon, which is returned nulla bona; then, M. H. the plaintiff dies; and administration de bonis non of R. H.'s estate is granted to A.: Held, the action of debt on the administration bond of E. B. against her and her sureties, lies at the relation of A. the administrator de bonis non of R. H. and not at the relation of the representative of M. H. the first administrator of R. H. upon the construction of the statute of 1813-14, ch. 13, § 2. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 63.

Allen & others v. Cunningham & others, 395

13. And the administrator de bonis non need not, in order to entitle himself to put the administration bond in suit, bring sci. fa. or action of debt on the judgment recovered by the first adm'r.

Ibid., 395

14. The fi. fa. sued out by M. H. the first administrator, was sued out and returned before the statute of 1813-14 was passed; yet Held, the statute applies and gives the action in such case, being retrospective as to the issuing and return of the execution, as well as the recovery of judgment. Ibid., 395

15. A fi. fa. on judgment against an administrator is returned "no unadministered or unincumbered effects found" &c. Held, this is a return of nulla bona, to entitle the plaintiff to an action on the administrator's bond. Ibid., 395

16. An action cannot be maintained on an executor's bond at the relation of an assignee of a legatee who has obtained a decree for a legacy; such action can only be maintained at the relation of the person who has the legal right to the debt.

Burnett & others v. Harwell & others, 89

17. In such an action, the declaration must aver that assets sufficient to pay the debt came to the executor's hands, or the amount of assets that came to his hands, and the devastavit thereof; and if the declaration contain no such averment, it is bad on general demurrer: per TUCKER, Ibid., 89

FORTHCOMING BOND.

1. Robertson, executor of Cole, recovers judgment against Claiborne, and sues out execution thereon; before the execution is delivered to the sheriff, Robertson dies; the execution being then delivered to the sheriff, he levies it on property of defendant, and takes a forthcoming bond payable to Robertson, executor of Cole: Held, the execution was properly levied, though Robertson was dead before it was delivered, and the forthcoming bond was rightly taken to Robertson as executor, and was good.

Turnbull, ex'r &c. v. Claibornes, 392

2. A motion for award of execution on the forthcoming bond was made by Turnbull, executor of Robertson, who was executor of Cole: Held, the forthcoming bond belonged to Cole's estate, and Turnbull was entitled to the motion, and to award of execution on the bond, as the representative of Cole, not as the representative of Robertson.

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

1. The administrator with the will annexed is guardian of testator's four sisters: he sells the land under power given by testator's will; and takes bonds for the proceeds, payable to himself as guardian: HELD, he is chargeable in his character of guardian, and his sureties for the guardianship responsible.

Broadbuss and others v. Rosson and wife and others, 12

2. The purchaser of the land executes bonds for the purchase money in such proportions as the guardian requires, with a view to enable him to transfer bonds to others, for his own purposes; the guardian assigns one bond to T. and another to N.

(who are both apprised of the right in which he held them, and that he is in failing circumstances) partly for his own individual debts and for cash advanced him: the guardian dies insolvent: HELD, the sureties of the guardian are primarily responsible to the wards, for so much of these bonds as the guardian misapplied to his own use: the assignees are bound to reimburse the sureties, the debt and costs recovered of them by the wards: each assignee is severally liable for what he received: if assignees prove unable to pay, the purchaser is bound to reimburse the sureties; and if sureties fail, the wards may have recourse against the assignees first, and then the purchaser, they being apprised of, and aiding in the guardian's breach of his trust. Ibid., 13

3. Though a guardian has no right to expend the principal of his ward's estate, yet if he take up goods for his ward, the merchant who furnishes them, is not bound to see that the profits of ward's estate are sufficient to pay for them, and that the principal is not applied to pay for them. Ibid., 12

Code, ch. 90, § 17; ch. 104, § 29.

H. but if her daughter, when of age or married, shall choose, she may take the land in fee, on paying half the value thereof to the grand daughter, according to valuation to be made by two of the executors on oath: F. A. the daughter, marries while yet an infant; at the instance of her husband, two of the executors value the land: the husband pays half the value to the grand daughter, takes the land, and sells it as his own: the daughter never exercises, or attempts to exercise, the right of election given her by the will, and dies leaving her husband her surviving, and issue: HELD, the character of money was impressed upon the subject by the will, and the husband was entitled to it, as personality of his wife jure mariti.

Pratt v. Tallafiero, 419

II. Effect of marriage articles.

2. By marriage articles, it is agreed, that, during the coverture, husband and wife shall enjoy their respective estates jointly, but that their estates shall be kept separate and distinct from each other, and that the property then belonging to each, shall remain under the control of each, and that the husband shall claim no part of the wife's estate, and the wife no part of the husband's estate by virtue of the marriage; but no trustee is appointed to hold the wife's estate for her separate use: during the coverture, a sum of money belonging to the wife before the marriage, came to the husband's hands; he laid it out in chattels, which he declared were his wife's property: the husband dies: HELD, the legal estate in the chattels so purchased, vested in the husband, and at his death devolved to his executors, so that they may maintain detinue for them against the widow.

INJUNCTION.

1. A. recovers a judgment against B. and C. who had prosecuted the suit to judgment as A.'s agent, sues out a f. fa. upon it, and endorses on the execution, that it is partly for C.'s own benefit; before this execution is delivered to the sheriff, B. the debtor makes satisfaction to A. of the full amount of the debt, and A. gives him a receipt in full and discharge: HELD, though B. the debtor might have made a motion to quash the execution, and thus had remedy at law, yet a court of equity has jurisdiction to give him relief by way of injunction to inhibit further proceedings on the execution. Crawford v. Thurmond and others, 85

2. The rector of the protestant episcopal church of the parish of H. insisting that the glebe land of that parish was a private donation to the church made before the revolution, and so reserved to the church within the exception of the statute of 1802 for the resumption of glebe lands, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 32, b. and therefore claiming the legal estate of this glebe land, files a bill in chancery, praying an injunction to inhibit the overseers of the poor of the county from selling the same under the general provisions of the statute: HELD, the court of chancery has no jurisdiction of such a case. *Overseers of Poor v. JURORS.

1. A person called as a juror in a criminal case, and examined as to his indifference on his voir dire, declared, he had heard reports concerning the case in the country, and a state of the circumstances from one of the witnesses, and had formed a hypothetical opinion, but he believed it would not influence his mind as a juror: he believed the account he had heard of the case at the time he heard it, (and he did not now express any doubt of its truth); if the evidence at the trial should correspond with the account he had heard, his former opinion would remain, but if it should be different, he felt satisfied he should be able to decide the cause without being influenced by what he had before heard, and without prejudice; and it did not appear, that the witness had ever before expressed the opinion he had so formed: HELD, such preconceived hypothetical opinion did not constitute good cause of challenge to the juror.

Oslander v. The Commonwealth, 780

2. To constitute good cause of challenge to a juror, on the ground of preconceived opinion of the case formed by him, it must appear, that such preconceived opinion was a decided one. Ibid., 780

3. Quere, if a person called as a juror has formed a decided opinion of the case out of doors, is it necessary that he should have also expressed such opinion, to constitute it good cause of challenge to him as a juror? Ibid., 780

LAPSE OF TIME.

1. An executor qualifies in hustings court of W. in 1791; he settles his account of hustings court, ex parte, in 1810, the distributee of a deceased legatee, whose legacy has never been paid, living in the town of W. at the time of settling the account; the distributee of the legatee dies in 1818; then the executor dies; no one takes administration of the legatee's estate till 1822; then, the executor of her distributee takes the administration; and then, the administrator of the legatee, and executor of her distributee, files a bill against the executors of the executor, to surcharge and falsify his account, settled in 1810: HELD, the lapse of time is no objection to such a bill.

Burwell's ex'rs v. Anderson, adm'r &c., 848

LEGACY.

Testator, having by his will, bequeathed legacies to amount of $60,000, directs the whole residue of his estate, real and personal, shall be sold by his executors, and out of the proceeds of such residue, he bequeaths 26 pecuniary legacies to 26 legatees, amounting to $114,000; and he charges on the 840 same funds, such other legacies as he shall bequeath by any codicil; and gives the residue of the fund to residuary legatees; then by codicils, he bequeaths other pecuniary legacies to amount of $47,550; as to one of the legatees mentioned in the will, he directs the legacy "to be paid as soon as possible, knowing the legatee is in need," and as to another, that it be paid "if possible as soon as it may be convenient for the legatee to receive it;" by one codicil he "leaves it to the judgment of his executors to begin paying the legacies to those legatees they may think most in need;" and by another codicil, "he desires his executors to use their best judgment in making sales of his real estate (on which the legacies are charged) without hurrying the states, which might cause sacrifices, and be to the detriment of his residuary legatees, he thinking the time unfavorable;" owing to depreciation of the property, the fund proves inadequate to pay the amount of the legacies charged thereon, without any fault of the executors; the executors, before any deficiency of the fund was apprehended, paid some of the legatees, whom they thought most in need, the whole amount of their legacies: Held, 1. The legacies bequeathed by the codicils stand on the same foot with those bequeathed by the will;

2. All the legacies shall abate in proportion;

3. The unpaid legatees have a right to look to the executors for their rateable proportions of the fund, and are not bound to have recourse to the legatees who have been fully paid, to compel them to refund the excess by them received above their just proportions; nor

4. The executors being quite solvent, have the unpaid legatees any right to call on the other legatees to refund.

Gallego's ex'rs v. Lambert & wife & others, 451
5. Quære, whether the executors have a right to require the legatees whose legacies they have fully paid, to refund? It seems they have; per TUCKER, P. Ibid., 451

6. Testator bequeaths a slave to an infant son, and then that his wife shall hold the slave bequeathed to his son till he shall attain to full age; the executor delivers the slave to the wife, and never resumes possession: Held, this is an assent of the executor to the legacy to the son, and that, whether the will be understood to give a present estate in the slave to the son, with a direction that the wife shall hold it for him, or an estate to the wife during the minority of the son, with remainder to the son.

LIEN.

I. By judgment or decree.

1. A judgment is recovered against a principal and his sureties: the judgment creditor sues out no elegit, or other execution, within the year; the sureties discharge the judgment: Held, the sureties have a right to be subrogated, in equity, to the benefit of the lien of the creditor's judgment upon the lands of the principal, in preference to a foreign attachment sued out by another creditor of the principal, after the judgment.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Testator bequeaths a slave to an infant son, and then that his wife shall hold the slave bequeathed to his son till he shall attain to full age; the executor delivers the slave to the wife, and never resumes possession: Held, the act of limitations never could begin to run against the claim and title of the son to the slave and her increase till he attained to full age.

LOST DEED.

1. Where a plaintiff resorts to a court of equity for relief, on the ground that a deed on which his claim depends has been lost or destroyed, the claim being such, that if he had the deed he would have complete remedy by action upon it at law; the bill must distinctly aver the loss or destruction of the deed, and it must be shewn that it could not be found upon due search; otherwise the court of equity has no jurisdiction of the case.

Tallaferro v. Foote, 58

2. And such a bill must be accompanied with an affidavit of the loss or destruction of the deed; the want of such affidavit is good cause of demurrer.

Ibid., 58

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

1. Action on the case, for defendant having advised and procured a third person to institute a malicious prosecution against plaintiff for felony: Held, the action lies against defendant for advising and procuring such prosecution.

Mowry v. Miller, 561

2. In every such action, the declaration must allege that the prosecution was without probable cause; but that allegation relates to the state of the fact, that the prosecution was without probable cause, not to the state of the defendant's knowledge that there was no probable cause. Ibid., 561

MANDAMUS.

The statute of 1825-6, ch. 15, was intended to prevent unreasonable and causeless delays in suits in chancery; and, with that view, the 14th section authorizes the court of appeals to award a mandamus to the courts of chancery, to compel them to hear causes at the first term at which they are prepared for hearing, when no special cause appears for the refusal of the court to hear them; but the statute does not authorize a mandamus to compel a hearing of a cause, which the court of chancery, in its discretion for reasons satisfactory to it, thinks proper to continue.

MILLS.

W. being the owner of an island situate in the falls of the Appomattox, a navigable river, applies to the county court for leave to erect a mill on his island, and to condemn an acre of land on the main, belonging to T. for an abutment for his mill dam; the acre of land is condemned, and leave is given to W. to build his mill on his island; W. abuts his dam against the condemned acre, but does not build his mill on his island, but builds it on the mainland belonging to T. below the condemned acre, on a canal conducted from a point above the dam, through T.'s land; and he cuts his canal through, and builds his mill on, T.'s land, with T.'s consent: Held, this mill is not established according to law, so as to entitle W. and those claiming the mill rights under him, and T.'s land under him, to take the water from the river to work the mill, as against the public right of navigation, and a company incorporated by law to improve the navigation.

II. Where three mortgages, the first of whole tract, second of part and third of whole.

2. S. mortgages a parcel of 360 acres of land to B. to secure a debt due to him; then S. mortgages all of the same land, except 75 acres, to H. to secure debt due to him, these 75 acres being excepted and reserved out of this second mortgage, because the mortgagor was then in treaty with a third person for the sale thereof to him, which treaty was afterwards broken off; and then S. mortgages the whole parcel of 360 acres to C. to secure a debt due to him: Held, 1. that H. the second mortgagee, has a right, as against Sisson the mortgagor, B. the first mortgagee, and C. the third mortgagee, to insist that the debt due to B. shall be satisfied out of the parcel of 75 acres reserved out of the second mortgage to H. so as to leave that part of the subject mortgaged to H. untouched and applicable to the satisfaction of the debt due him; and 2. that C. the third mortgagee, has no right to call on H. the second mortgagee, to contribute, pro rata, to the satisfaction of the debt due to B. the first mortgagee.

Conrad v. Harrison & others, 582

3. The proposition, that where "a judgment is recovered against a debtor, and then the debtor alienes his lands to divers alienees by divers conveyances, all the debtor's lands, in the hands of his several alienees, are alike liable to the judgment creditor, and the lands in the hands of the several alienees must contribute pro rata to satisfy the judgment," stated by the court in Beverley v. Brooke, 3 Leigh, 426, doubted, but held not applicable to the preceding case. Ibid., 582

III. Where two mortgages, the first when grantor had but an equitable estate, and second after he acquired legal title.

4. H. having only an equitable estate in land, conveys the land by deed of bargain and sale, without any warranty, to M. and F. in trust to secure a debt to B. and this deed of trust is duly recorded; afterwards, H. acquires the legal title; and then he sells the land to D. and conveys it to him with warranty: Held, 1. That as the deed of trust executed by H. to M. and F. to secure the debt to B. was executed when H. had not the legal estate, and as that deed contained no clause of warranty, the legal estate subsequently acquired by H. did not enure to the trustees M. and F. to secure the debt to B. so that B. had only a lien on the equitable estate; and 2. That the recording of the deed mortgaging H.'s equitable estate to secure the debt to B. was not constructive notice of that deed to D. the subsequent purchaser from H. For 3. The statute requiring deeds to be recorded, makes them void as to subsequent purchasers without notice, if not recorded, but gives them no additional validity if recorded.

Doswell v. Buchanan's ex'rs, 365

IV. How sale of mortgaged subject is to be effected.

5. Though if a mortgage be made to secure a debt, and power be thereby given to the mortgagee to sell the subject to pay the debt, the mortgagee cannot execute the power, the character of creditor and trustee, in such case, being incompatible; yet, if the mortgagee in fact execute the power fairly, and make sale of the subject for cash, and if the mortgagor be apprised of the sale and present at it, and make no objection to the mortgagee's proceedings, but on the contrary acquiesce in them, he shall be regarded as waiving his objection to the defect of the mortgagee's power to sell, so far as the purchaser is concerned, and shall not be allowed in equity to redeem, as against the purchaser. Taylor's adm'r's and devisees v. Chowning, 654

NEW TRIAL.

1. Upon a motion to set aside a verdict, and for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence, the motion is overruled, but the circuit court refuses to certify the facts proved by the evidence, and only certifies the evidence, and that nothing appeared to impeach the credit of any part of it; bill of exceptions states the evidence at large, which is, in some respects, variant and conflicting: Held, this bill of exceptions is not well taken, and the appellate court cannot review the judgment of the circuit court overruling the motion for a new trial.

PARTNERSHIP.

1. Though a bond or covenant executed by one partner of a mercantile house, in the name of the firm, for a debt of the partnership, is not binding on his co-partner who did not seal the instrument, yet the debt being originally a debt of the concern, both partners are liable for it to the creditor.

Sale v. Dishman's ex'rs, 548

2. And though the surviving partner of a mercantile house is alone liable at law to the creditors of the house, yet if the surviving partner prove insolvent, the estate of the deceased partner is liable, in equity, for the debts of the partnership.

Ibid., 548

3. Quære, what degree or kind of laches of the creditor, or dealing between him and the surviving partner, in respect of the debt claimed of the partnership, will suffice to exonerate the estate of the deceased partner from the debt? Ibid., 548

4. It seems, mere delay of the creditor to assert and prosecute his demand against the surviving partner, will not suffice to exonerate the estate of the deceased partner. And there is no analogy between the duty of a creditor in such case to assert and prosecute his claim against the surviving partner, and the due diligence which the assignee of a bond is bound to exert against the obligor, in order to entitle him to recourse against the assignor.

PRACTICE IN ACTIONS AT LAW.

I. As to putting cause on court docket.

1. Capias ad respondendum, in debt on bond, returnable to August rules, being returned executed, and defendant not appearing, clerk enters the common order; at September rules defendant appears, and puts in special bail, but does not plead; plaintiff insists that clerk shall enter a confirmation of the common order, so as to put the case on the office judgment list of the next term, which

868 clerk refuses to do; at next term *court orders case to be put on office judgment list, and then defendant puts in a plea to the action; and, at the ensuing term, there is a trial, verdict and judgment for plaintiff:

Quære, whether regular to order the case to be put on office judgment list? But Held, if not regular, defendant's pleading to the action was a waiver of objection to the regularity of the order. Powell v. Watson, 4

II. As to reading depositions.

2. Plaintiff having taken the deposition of an aged and infirm witness, to be read de bene esse, fails to take out a subpoena and have it served on the witness to attend at the trial; yet Held, that upon satisfactory proof of the witness's inability to attend the trial by reason of ill health, the deposition shall be read—Dissentiente BROOKE, J.

Lynch v. Thomas, 682

3. Quære, whether upon the question of the witness's inability to attend in such case, hearsay evidence as to the state of his health may properly be heard by the court? Ibid., 682

PRACTICE IN SUITS IN EQUITY.

I. Parties and process.

1. The distributees of a deceased person may maintain a bill in equity, to impeach and set aside a deed of gift of personal estate made by the decedent in his lifetime, as fraudulent; and the court may, at their suit, declare the deed fraudulent, and annul it; but the subject itself can only be decreed to the personal representative of the decedent, or to the distributees in a case in which the personal representative is a party.

Samuel v. Marshall and wife and others, 567

II. When defence must be made.

2. On a bill by vendee against vendor for specific execution, if no objection to the vendor's title be made in the court of chancery, in any form, he cannot be heard to make such objection in the court of appeals.

4. If the evidence on a question of fact in a suit in chancery, though various and conflicting, be such as ought to satisfy the chancellor's conscience as to the truth of the case, he need not direct an issue to try the fact.

Samuel v. Marshall and wife and others, 567

V. Decrees between co-defendants.

5. It seems, there cannot properly be a decree between co-defendants in equity, in any case, in which the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree against both or either; and it would be inconvenient to extend that practice further.

In the case of a summary motion by surety against principal, to recover money paid by the surety, under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 116, if the defendant appear, and judgment be rendered on a hearing of the parties, the notice of the motion is not a part of the record, unless it be made so by a bill of exceptions to the opinion of the court.

ROADS.

I. Petition for road.

1. Though authority is given to the county courts to open only such new roads as may be wanting for a public right of way to some one or more of the places mentioned by the statute 2 Rev. Code, ch. 236, § 1, yet the purpose for which the road is wanting, need not be stated in the petition of the applicant, if it appear in any other part of the record, or be proved to the court; and if this was a defect in the petition, the party opposed to the application having appeared, and prayed an ad quod damnum, waived the objection.

Carpenter and others v. Sims, 675

II. Award of writ of ad quod damnum; and inquisition thereupon.

2. The party opposed to opening a new road appears and prays an ad quod damnum, which the court awards, and appoints a day for holding the inquest; the defendant shall be presumed to be present in court at the time the writ is awarded and the day of inquest appointed; so that the sheriff need not give him notice of the day of holding the inquest. Ibid., 675

III. Order allowing road.

3. The authority of the county courts to allow gates to be erected on a public road, to save fencing to the owners of lands through which the road passes, applies to cases of roads already established: the courts have no authority to order gates to be erected on a road ordered to be opened, to save the county the expense of making compensation to the owners for the additional fencing which such new road will render necessary. Ibid., 675

IV. Legal consequences of establishing road.

4. If a public road be opened and established along the bank of a river, on land of an individual proprietor, regularly condemned for the purpose, according to the statute, and the land on which the road was so opened, and established, be washed away, in whole or in part, by high waters, the public has no right to take so much other adjoining land of the proprietor as may suffice for the highway, without a new view and condemnation thereof, and compensation for the same, according to the statute.

Commonwealth v. Beeson. 821

5. And if, in such case, the public be entitled to additional land for the road, the proprietor cannot be guilty of any nuisance in the use of the land for his own purposes, until the road shall have been actually laid out and opened by the public through the instrumentality of its agents. Ibid., 821

SET-OFF.

1. W. G. having contracted a debt to a bank, by note payable sixty days after date, discounted by the bank for his accommodation, dies before the note comes to maturity, having on deposit in the bank, at the time of his death, a sum of money exceeding the amount of the note: HELD, that in case W. G.'s estate prove insolvent, the bank has a right in equity to retain the amount of his note out of the money it held for him on deposit, whether there be debts of W. G. of superiour dignity to the debt he owed the bank, or not; equity, in such case, regarding the bank as debtor to W. G. only for the excess of his money on deposit above the contents of his note—Dubitante BROOKS, J. if it appeared that the decedent's estate owed debts of superiour dignity.

Ford's adm'r v. Thornton. 696
2. A. and B. execute a joint bond to C. part of the consideration of which is the price of a parcel of corn sold by C. to A. deliverable at a day subsequent to the date of the bond: the corn is not delivered according to contract: in debt on the bond by C. against A. and B. the defendants cannot set off the value or price of the corn.

Christian and wife and another v. Miller. 78
3. A bill, in any form, claiming damages for breach of contract, cannot be entertained in equity: neither can unliquidated damages be set-off in equity.

Robertson v. Hogsheds. 667

SPECIFIC EXECUTION.

I. Where husband contracts for sale of wife's land.

1. A husband contracts to sell his wife's land: upon a bill in chancery, by the husband and wife against the purchaser, to compel specific execution of the agreement, it seems, specific execution shall not be decreed, because specific execution could not be decreed at the suit of the purchaser, upon a bill against the husband and wife, to compel her to convey her land, and so the remedies are not mutual. At any rate, upon such a bill for specific execution of such a contract, preferred by husband and wife against the purchaser, a decree for specific execution against the purchaser, before the wife shall have executed a deed conveying the land, though the decree be suspended till she shall execute such a deed, is erroneous.

Watts and others v. Kinney and wife. 372

II. Where title is defective only as to part of land sold.

2. Upon bill for specific execution of agreement for sale and purchase of a tract of 686 acres of land for cultivation, vendor's title to 209 acres of tract is defective: this is separated from the residue by a public road, and all the improvements are on the residue, in which vendor has a perfect title: HELD, vendee shall not be compelled to take the residue.

Jackson v. Ligon. 161

III. Where defect in title was known to vendee.

3. If, in an agreement for sale and purchase of land, vendee is apprised that vendor's title is defective, and agreement stipulates that vendor shall convey to vendee a good and lawful right by a given day: at appointed day, vendor insists that his title is perfect, though in truth it is defective: upon which vendee, having received possession under the contract, abandons the possession, and refuses to proceed with the purchase: upon a bill for specific execution, by vendor against vendee, HELD, vendee's previous knowledge of defects in the title is no reason for compelling him to take such title as vendor can convey, that being defective. Ibid., 161

IV. Where either party fails to perform contract within appointed time.

4. In the case of an executory agreement, though the time appointed for performance may not be made (originally, by the terms of contract) of the essence thereof, yet it may be made material by the conduct of parties or circumstances afterwards; and, if so made material, the party in default is not entitled to demand specific execution against the other. Ibid., 161

856 *V. When contract will be rescinded for mistake.

5. See Contract No. 4. 5. and

Glassell v. Thomas. 113

VI. Practice in suit for specific execution.

6. Bill in county court, by vendor against vendee, for specific execution of agreement for sale and purchase of land: vendor insisting he has a good title to convey, and vendee that title is defective, and both parties, by the pleadings referring the question (which is a question of law on the construction of a will) to the court; and the cause is brought to hearing by consent, neither party asking a reference of title to a commissioner: HELD, in such case, the court ought not to refer the title to a commissioner, nor, if title be defective, to give vendor time to perfect it, but should proceed to decide the question.

Jackson v. Ligon. 161

7. County court, in such case, though the title is, in truth, defective, without reference of the title, decrees specific execution: vendee appeals to superiour court of chancery: HELD, the chancellor ought to review the decree of the county court, upon the actual state of case at time of the decree there; and as the decree was erroneous in compelling vendee to take defective title, to reverse it, and dismiss vendor's bill: and he ought not to open the proceedings, refer the title, give the vendor time to perfect it, and in case he succeed in doing so, decree specific execution. Ibid., 161

8. On a bill by vendee against vendor for specific execution, if no objection to the vendor's title be made in the court of chancery, in any form, he cannot be heard to make such objection in the court of appeals.

TOBACCO INSPECTION.

Though a tobacco warehouse established by law shall not yield a sufficient amount of duties to pay the inspectors' salaries and rents to the proprietor, for three years in succession, yet such warehouse is not thereby ipso facto discontinued, under the third section of the statute, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 220, and if inspectors continue to be duly appointed, and so the inspection be in fact kept up, and such warehouse be burnt, the commonwealth is liable to make good the loss to the owners of tobacco there inspected and deposited within the year preceding the loss, under the 67th section of the statute.

TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES.

2. See Mortgages and Trusts.

USURY.

1. Question, whether, under the circumstances of the transaction, a sale of bank stock upon a credit, at par, the cash value of the stock at the time of sale being twenty per cent. below par, was a bona fide sale, or an usurious loan under cover of a pretended sale.

Selby v. Morgan. 577
2. S. being under an urgent necessity to raise a sum of money, requests M. to assist his agent in negotiating a loan thereof at bank; M. lends his assistance, but the bank refuses to lend the money; then M. proposes to S. to sell him bank stock at par upon a credit, the stock being then twenty per cent. below par in the market; and M. enters into a negotiation with the bank to borrow the money S. wanted, for S. upon a pledge of the stock; the bank offers to lend the money upon a pledge of the stock and S.'s note indorsed by M. and M. having thus settled the terms of the loan with the bank, sells his stock to S. at par on a credit, and immediately, the bank lends S. a sum equal to 4-fths of the par value of the stock, on a pledge of the stock, on a pledge of the stock and on S.'s note indorsed by M. HELD, this is a fair sale of bank stock by M. to S. and not a device to cover an usurious loan of money. Ibid., 577

VARIANCE.

I. Between writ and declaration.

1. In cases of judgments by default, the writ is part of the record; and writ being in assumpsit and declaration in covenant, the variance is fatal. Wainwright and others v. Harper. 270

II. Between declaration and evidence.

2. Declaration in assumpsit on a written agreement takes no notice of a note subjoined to the agreement, limiting its continuance to a day certain; the agreement offered in evidence on the general issue, has such note subjoined thereto: HELD, this is a fatal variance between the agreement laid in the declaration and the agreement offered in evidence; and the agreement is not admissible evidence, unless it appear that the note was subjoined without the plaintiff's knowledge or consent, and so was no part of the agreement. Newell v. Mayberry. 250

3. In an action on the case for advising and procuring a malicious prosecution, it is not material for the plaintiff to prove the exact day of his acquittal as laid in the declaration, so that it appears to be before the action brought; and, therefore, a variance in that respect, between the day laid, and the day stated in the record produced to prove the acquittal, is not material; the day not being laid in the declaration, as part of the description of such record of acquittal, and being laid under a scilicet. Mowry v. Miller. 561

4. See Declaration No. 1, 2, 3, and Jackson's adm'x v. Henderson &c., 197

VENDOR AND VENDEE.

I. Construction of contract.

1. See Contract No. 9, and Brockenbrough and Taylor v. Blythe's ex'rs and others. 619

II. Lien of vendor for purchase money.

2. Where H. sold land to M. and took no security for the purchase money; and M. then sold the same land to F. took his bonds for the purchase money, and assigned those bonds for valuable consideration, the assignees having no notice of H.'s claim to a lien on the land for the purchase money due him by M.—though H. might have been entitled to payment of the purchase money due him from M. out of the purchase money due from F. to M. if F.'s bonds for the same had remained in M.'s hands, yet H. cannot assert any such equity as against the bona fide assignees of the bonds. Moore and another v. Holcombe and others. 507

III. Liability of vendee for interest.

3. A vendee of land let into possession, and the purchase money remaining unpaid, shall pay interest thereon, though the vendor be in default, unless he has not only kept the purchase money idle, but given the vendor notice that he has so kept it. Brockenbrough and Taylor v. Blythe's ex'rs and others. 619

IV. Other matters arising out of sale.

4. See Specific Execution.

WILLS.

I. Probate of written will.

1. Testator's will is written for him by R. P. who testifies, that he also signed testator's name thereto, in the presence and at the request of the testator, and then subscribed his own name as a witness in the testator's presence; and another witness, B. H. testifies, that some years afterwards, the witness being at testator's house; it was suggested to testator that that was a favourable time to have that will witnessed; testator assented; the paper in question was produced; witness took it near to testator and enquired whether he acknowledged it; testator said he did; upon which, this witness subscribed as a witness in testator's presence: HELD, the acknowledgment of the paper by testator to the second witness, was a recognition of the signature thereto as his own, and evidence from which a court of probat may well infer, that the testator's signature to the will was written by his authority; and so here are two witnesses to the execution of the will as required by the statute: dissentiente BROOKS, J.

Dudleys v. Dudleys. 436

2. The authority of Burwell v. Corbin. 1 Rand. 181, doubted. Ibid., 436

3. The will of a blind man shall be admitted to probat and record, as a will of real as well as personal estate, if attested at his request in the same room with him; though it be not proved that the will was read to him in the presence of the attesting witnesses, or that it was ever read to him, provided it appears satisfactorily to the court, that he was acquainted with its contents, and intended to make the testamentary dispositions therein contained. Boyd and another v. Cook, ex'r of Vass. 82

4. A blind testator orders a will made by him to be destroyed, and believes it is destroyed accordingly, but it is not destroyed, and no act towards destruction done: this is not a revocation by destruction or cancellation, within the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 3. At least, a court of probat cannot consider this as amounting to a revocation. Ibid., 82

II. Probate of nuncupative will.

5. It is essential to the validity of a nuncupative will, that it should appear that the deceased, at the time he spoke the alleged testamentary words, had a present intention to make his will, and spoke the words with such intention, and should distinctly indicate that intention, by calling upon persons present to take notice or bear testimony that such is his will, or by saying or doing something tantamount in substance, indicating plainly that the words spoken were designed to be testamentary. Winn v. Bob and others. 140

6. Quære, whether slaves claiming to be emancipated by will, can properly be allowed to prosecute, in forma pauperis, a suit to have the will proved and recorded in a court of probat, under the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 124, § 4, 5? Ibid., 140

III. Probate of authenticated copy of will.

7. A copy of a will proved in Louisiana, according to the laws of that state, and offered for probat here, is not authenticated according to the act of congress of May 26, 1790, but is authenticated according to the rules of the common law: HELD, the copy is duly authenticated, within the meaning of the statute of wills, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 16. Ex parte Povall. 816

8. When an authenticated copy of a will proved in another or foreign state, is offered for probat here, if the probat shew that the will has been so proved there, as that if proved in like manner here, it could only be admitted to probat here, as a will of personality, it shall be so admitted; but if the proof in the foreign court of probat be such as if taken here, would suffice to establish it as a will of lands, it shall be admitted to probat here also, as a will of lands. Ibid., 816

9. Authenticated copy of a will and probat thereof in Kentucky, the probat shewing that it was proved by three subscribing witnesses, but not stating the substance of the proof there, admitted to probat here, only as a will of personals. Ex parte Todd. 819

10. Quære, whether if the law of Kentucky was ascertained to be the same with that of Virginia on the subject, the admission of a will to full probat there, would be sufficient to warrant the admission of it to full probat as a will of lands here, without the particulars of the proof there, appearing in the record of the probat. Ibid., 819

IV. Rules applicable to probats generally.

11. A court of probat occupies the place of a jury as to questions of fact, and its province is, like that of a jury, to draw all just inferences from the evidence. Boyd & another v. Cook, ex'r of Vass. 82

12. Upon a question of probat of a will, the testimony of one of the attesting witnesses is directly contradicted by that of another; the county and circuit courts both give credit to the witness for the will; on appeal from the sentence of probat, HELD, that the court of appeals, on a mere question of credibility of witnesses, will always presume that the inferior courts which saw and heard the witnesses examined, decided correctly. Dudleys v. Dudleys. 436

13. See Appellate Jurisdiction No. 5, and Duff v. Duff's ex'rs,

V. Construction of will.

14. Testator devises real and personal estate "to his two daughters, viz. the one moiety thereof to M. and the other moiety thereof to J. for their lives; remainder to their children, who shall be living at the time of the decease of either of his said daughters; which remainder to the children, to be per capita and not per stirpes; so that upon the death of either daughter, her moiety shall go in remainder, not to her children, but to them and the children of the surviving daughter, in fee."

Held, this was not a limitation of the whole remainder of the whole estate, to take effect on the death of the daughter first dying, and to vest in children of both then in esse, liable to open and let in children of the survivor after born; but, as it was a devise of the estate to the two daughters in several moieties for life, so the limitation was of the remainder in several moieties also; a limitation of the remainder of each moiety, expectant on each life estate, upon the death of each daughter, to children of both living at the death of each; so that, upon the death of the daughter first dying, the remainder of her moiety only should vest in children of both then in esse; and upon the death of the survivor, the remainder of her moiety should vest in children of both then in esse; a base fee in the real estate, and the undisposed of remnant of interest in the personal, descending and passing to the two daughters, the testator's heirs at law and distributees, and awaiting the contingencies on which the contingent remainder of the real and executory bequest of the personal, were limited.

Henderson's ex'rs &c. v. Peachy,

15. Testator devises all his land and slaves to his wife D. P. during life or widowhood, *for her and his son M. P.'s support; and if his wife should be then pregnant, and with a boy, he should have same benefit of the property with the son M. P. and at the wife's death or marriage, both land and slaves should be sold, and the proceeds equally divided between the two sons; if with a girl, she should share equal benefit of the property with the son M. P. while in the mother's hands, but, at her death or marriage, should have only an equal share of the slaves; and if the son M. P. should die without lawful issue, then the whole estate to go to his brother or sister, and if he should have neither, to testator's wife's brothers and sisters: the testator's wife was not ensettled, so that he left only one child, the son M. P. Held, that if the land, in consequence of the direction to sell, were considered as money, the son took the remainder expectant on his mother's estate for life or widowhood in absolute property, and the ulterior executory limitation was void; and considering it as real, he took an estate tail in the remainder, with a contingent remainder limited on his estate tail, upon the failure of his issue.

Callava, lessee of Bryant and wife and others
v. Pope,

103

16. Testator bequeaths three slaves and $1000, to trustees; and directs the profits of the slaves and the interest of the money, to be applied to the maintenance and support of his daughter M. and her child (M. being at the time a married woman); and on the death of his daughter, the slaves and money to be given to her child, or children, if she shall have more than one; the above advances to be made to his said daughter M. independently of any claim testator might have against her husband: Held, upon the construction of the clause, compared with context and general scheme of the will, the testator's daughter was entitled to the whole profits during her life, and the daughter's child had no right to demand a share of them for her support and maintenance—dissentiente TUCKER, P.

Wallace and wife v. Dold's ex'rs and others,

258

17. Testator, after directing the sale of certain property to raise a fund to pay debts, and after giving all the residue of his estate to his wife for life, directs, that at her death, all his estate, real and personal, shall be turned into money, to be distributed as follows—first, he desires, that his wife, by will or otherwise, may have the absolute disposal of £500—then, he bequeaths to his nephew W. P. £200—and, after deducting these two sums, he bequeaths two-thirds of the balance, to his niece A. S. and the other one-third to his sister A. C.; and he directs, that if the fund provided for debts prove inadequate, the sum to make up the deficiency shall be deducted in equal proportions from the sums bequeathed to his wife, his nephew, his niece and his sister: Held, the wife took by the will, the absolute property in the £500 bequeathed to her, and not a mere power to dispose of that sum.

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

Bowyer v. Chesnut.

November, 1832.

[90 Va. 268.]

(Absent CABELL, J.)

Appellate Practice—Bills of Exceptions Indefinite—Effect.—Whenever a bill of exceptions to an instruction of the court to a jury, on the trial of an issue, is so vague and imperfect, that the appellate court cannot ascertain the exact state of the case, nor consequently the import and effect of the instruction, it is the settled practice, to reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the cause for a new trial.

Debt on a bond for 200 dollars, brought by Chesnut against Bowyer in the county court of Bath. Bowyer cravedoyer of the bond, and pleaded non est factum. It appeared from the bond (set out onoyer) that one Sophia Burk was the subscribing witness to the execution thereof. At the trial, the defendant Bowyer filed a bill of exceptions to an opinion of the court, stating, "That on the trial of the issue, the plaintiff to support the same on his part, introduced testimony to prove various acknowledgments of the defendant, of sums of money he had borrowed from or owed to the plaintiff, said to be in corroboration of the testimony of Mrs. Burk—but none of which testimony went to prove the execution of the note in question; to the introduction of which the defendant by his counsel objected, but was overruled by the court, and the evidence was admitted: to which opinion the defendant excepted &c." There were two depositions of Sophia Burk, the subscribing witness to the bond, in which she deposed that Bowyer executed it in her presence, and the clerk certified, that these depositions were read in evidence for the plaintiff at the trial, but they were not regularly made part of the record. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant Bowyer applied to the circuit court of Bath for a supersedeas, which was awarded; but the circuit court affirmed the judgment of the county court; and then he appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant.

Bacchus, for the appellee.

CARR, J. The question is not as to the sufficiency or weight of the evidence, but as to its admissibility; and if under any circumstances which could exist in the cause, this evidence was admissible on the issue joined, the judgment of the courts below must be supported. Suppose, for instance, the plaintiff had introduced the subscribing witness to prove the execution of the bond, and her character was assailed, or facts and circumstances adduced tending to discredit her evidence; would not the plaintiff have a right to resort to circumstantial evidence to corroborate and support her? This cannot be denied. But the question is, what latitude might he take? The writers on the subject say, "that all facts and circumstances, upon which any reasonable presumption or inference can be founded, as to the truth or falsity of the issue, or disputed fact, are admissible in evidence." Stark. Law Ev. part 1, § 7, vol. 1, p. 17.* The disputed fact here, was, whether the defendant had executed the bond for the 200 dollars? And the subscribing witness having been examined as to that fact, it was sought to corroborate her evidence, by proving various acknowledgments of the defendant that he had borrowed, or owed sums of money to the plaintiff: and the question is, would these acknowledgments furnish any reasonable ground of inference or presumption as to the truth of the disputed fact? To my mind, they might go to found very strong presumptions of the truth of the fact in issue. The objection to their introduction is, that "they do not go to prove the execution of the bond;" but this would exclude all presumptive and circumstantial evidence, which we know is Appellate Practice—Bills of Exceptions Indefinite—Effect.—It has been held repeatedly that when a bill of exception is so indefinite as not to shew whether an instruction or evidence was proper or not, the judgment should be reversed. Strader v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 264, citing the principal case: Barrett v. Tazewell, 1 Call 215 (see also, foot-note to this case): Beatle v. Tabb, 2 Munf. 254; Brooke v. Young, 3 Rand. 106; Thompson v. Cummings, 2 Leigh 321. To the same effect, the principal case was cited in McDowell v. Crawford, 11 Gratt. 398. But see monographic note on "Bills of Exception" appended to Stoneman v. Com., 26 Gratt. 887, where it is shown that the later decisions sustained the rule that a bill of exception must clearly and distinctly point out the error complained of, otherwise the exception will be unavailing.

Appellate Practice—Record—Certificate of Clerk.—The evidence produced upon a trial can only be known and reviewed in the appellate court by its being spread upon the record by a bill of exceptions, or by the certificate of the judge himself. It is not the province of the clerk to add anything to the record; and his certificate, that certain papers copied by him in the transcript were read and filed, cannot be received as evidence of that fact, such a certificate does not make the papers a part of the record; nor does the certificate of counsel afford any evidence of opinions expressed, or evidence given, at the trial. To this point, the principal case is cited with approval in White v. Toncray, 9 Leigh 347, 352, and foot-note; Roanoke, etc. Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 592, 593; Johnson v. The Norton, etc., Co., 90 Va. 268, 269, 18 S. E. Rep. 36; Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 302.

In discussing the question as to whether exceptions taken to the rulings of the trial court are available in the appellate court where there has been no motion for a new trial in the lower court. Danks v. Rodeheaver, 26 W. Va. 378, cites the principal case.

On the subject of new trials, see monographic note on "New Trials" appended to Boswell v. Jones, 1 Wash. 332.

always resorted to when necessary to strengthen and support the direct and positive proof. I think, then, that the opinion of the county court was correct, and that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

TUCKER, P. I am of opinion, that the bill of exceptions in this case, is too imperfect to enable the court to decide, whether the evidence admitted by the county court was legal or otherwise. The issue made up in the cause was on the plea of non est factum, and no evidence was proper or admissible, which did not go to sustain that issue. The proof objected to was the testimony of witnesses "to prove various acknowledgments, on the part of the defendant, of sums of money which he had borrowed from or owed to the plaintiff." Now, the obligation being made part of the record by oyer, the court perceives there was a subscribing witness. The proof of the execution of the bond can only be by the subscribing witness, where there is one, unless the failure to produce him is sufficiently accounted for. The secondary evidence even of handwriting, is not admissible till this is done; much less the more vague and uncertain evidence of acknowledgments of debt. These principles are too familiar to require authority for their support. Unless, therefore, something is shewn to justify the introduction of this testimony, it was improperly admitted. If the subscribing witness had been examined, and this evidence was introduced to sustain her credit, it would have been proper evidence. But this does not certainly appear. The testimony was introduced to sustain the testimony of Mrs. Burk, but whether this was Sophia Burk the subscribing witness or not, does not appear; nor does it certainly appear, Mrs. Burk, even if she was the subscribing witness, had testified to the execution of the bond. In this, indeed, there is something equivocal in the bill of exceptions. It is there said, that the plaintiff "introduced testimony to prove various acknowledgments by the defendant, that he had borrowed money, or owed money to the plaintiff, said to be in corroboration of the testimony of Mrs. Burk—but none of which testimony went to prove the execution of the note." I understand these words not as applying to Mrs. Burk's testimony, but to the corroborating testimony. I think the counsel for the appellant understood it otherwise. According to my understanding, then, it is not denied that Mrs. Burk's testimony went to the execution of the note. If it did, and if she was the subscribing witness, then the corroborating testimony was proper; otherwise, it was not. In this state of uncertainty, the court cannot pronounce any definitive opinion, but must send the cause back for a new trial, when, it is hoped, if the question is again insisted on, a more perfect bill of exceptions will be filed. Raines v. Philips's ex'or, 1 Leigh, 483; Thompson v. Cumming, 2 Leigh, 321. The case might have been differed if the depositions of Sophia Burk were before us. But they are no part of the record. The clerk's certificate that they were read and filed, cannot be received as evidence of that fact; for the appellate court never can know what took place at the trial from the clerk's certificate. That is not within his province. Cunningham v. Mitchell, 4 Rand. 192. The evidence produced upon the trial can only be known by its being spread upon the record, by bill of exceptions, or by the certificate of the judge himself. The very object of the institution of bills of exceptions, was to enable a party to spread upon the record the matters that occurred at the trial; the improper evidence introduced, the instructions asked, the opinions given, and other matters of which the party could not otherwise avail himself in an appellate court. 1 Bac. Abr. 527, 2 Inst. 426. Unless this is done, the court sees nothing but the process, the pleadings, the verdict and the judgment. The certificate of counsel affords no evidence of opinions expressed, or evidence given, nor the certificate of the clerk, of the papers produced before the jury, or the depositions read in the cause.

BROOKE, J., concurring with the president, both judgments were reversed, the verdict set aside, new trial directed, and the cause remanded to the county court.

Buck v. Pennybacker's Ex'ors.

(Absent CABELL, J.)

Partnership*—Assignment for Benefit of Creditors—Suit against Trustee for Account of Surplus—Parties.—D. & A. partners, assign effects to B. upon trust to pay all debts due from a former partnership of D. & C. and all debts of D. & A. for which B. the trustee, was responsible as their surety, and to pay the surplus to the order of D. & A. Afterwards D. & A. draw an order on B. the trustee, in favour of P. for a sum of money they owed him, to be paid out of the surplus of the trust fund; and B. accepts the order, payable out of the surplus: Upon a bill in chancery by P. against B. the trustee alone, praying that he might render an account of the fund, that the surplus might be ascertained, and applied to discharge of the order. Held, that neither D. & A. nor D. & C. nor any other of the cestuis que trust, are necessary parties, since the trustee represents the interests of all the cestuis que trust.

By deed executed by J. Dickerson, T. Amis and H. Conn of the first part, T. Buck of the second part, and J. & R. Withers of the third part—reciting, that Dickerson & Amis, merchants and partners, were bound to indemnify H. 6 *Conn from all demands against him as a partner of a former house of Dickerson & Conn, and as security for the due performance of that undertaking, Amis had mortgaged certain real estate to Conn; that Amis had mortgaged the same estate to Buck, to indemnify him for indorsing notes at bank for Amis's accommodation, and had then mortgaged it to J. & R. Withers, to secure a debt due them; and that J. & R. Withers were apprehensive, that this mortgage was not a sufficient security for the debt due them—therefore, all the accounts, notes, bonds and judgments, for debts due to the house of Dickerson & Conn, and for debts due to the house of Dickerson & Amis, were assigned to Buck, upon trust, that he should apply the moneys, as they should be collected, to the payment of all the debts due from the house of Dickerson & Conn, and such debts of Dickerson & Amis as Buck had in any way become bound for, and to pay the surplus to Dickerson & Amis or their order; and it was agreed, that whenever 2000 dollars should be collected from this trust subject, Conn should release his lien on the real estate mortgaged by Amis for his indemnity; and Buck covenanted to appropriate all the moneys coming to his hands from the trust subject, to the purposes above mentioned; but he should not be bound to settle the accounts or collect the debts assigned, himself, or be accountable beyond the moneys paid over to him by the person employed to do the business; which agent Buck was authorized to employ.

Afterwards, Dickerson & Amis, being indebted to B. Pennybacker, by bond, in the sum of 1533 dollars, drew an order on Buck, requiring him to pay the same to Pennybacker, out of any moneys that might be in his hands, after paying the debts of Dickerson & Conn, and all moneys for which he was bound for Dickerson & Amis; and Buck accepted this order upon the conditions therein stated.

Pennybacker's executors exhibited their bill, in the superior court of chancery of Winchester, against Buck alone, setting forth the deed of assignment above mentioned, the *order of Dickerson & Amis on Buck, in favour of their testator, and Buck's acceptance thereof; alleging, that a surplus of moneys of the trust fund, had come to Buck's hands, which was properly applicable to, and sufficient for the payment of, the debt due Pennybacker; and praying an account of the trust subject, and a decree against Buck for the balance which should be found in his hands, after satisfying the debts of Dickerson & Conn, and the debts of Dickerson & Amis for which Buck was bound. Buck having put in his answer, in which he said, that the trust fund had been nearly exhausted in payment of the debts having precedence to that due Pennybacker, and that he was ready to render an account of the trust subject; an order was made, by consent of parties, referring the accounts to a commissioner. Dickerson was present at the taking of the accounts in the commissioner's office, and was a witness. The commissioner's report showed, that, after satisfying all the preferred debts out of the trust subject, there was a surplus in Buck's hands, applicable to the debt due to Pennybacker, of 1060 dollars, with interest &c. Whereupon the court decreed, that Buck should pay that sum to the plaintiffs. And Buck appealed from the decree to this court.

The cause was argued here by Briggs for the appellant, and Johnson for the appellees. There were some questions of fact and mere details, not necessary to be stated; the only point of law was, whether all necessary and proper parties had been brought before the court? and, particularly, whether Dickerson & Conn ought not to have been made parties?

CARR, J. The only question worthy of consideration in this case, is, whether the proper parties are before the court? The general rule is, that all persons interested in the subject of the suit, shall be made parties, in order that complete justice may be done, and future litigation prevented. These being the ends in view, and the rule adopted only as the *means of accomplishing them, we should be careful not to sacrifice the end to the means; and, on this ground, courts often modify and bend the rule, making it subservient to convenience and justice. We are to decide, whether justice requires, that we should undo all that has been done in this cause, and leave the plaintiffs to start afresh in this long race, because they did not make Dickerson & Conn parties to their bill. I cannot think that this would be right. The bill claimed nothing adverse to the rights of Dickerson & Conn. They were represented by the trustee, whose own interest was the same with theirs. They were probably standing by, looking on upon the whole transaction, and well satisfied with it. We see that one of them (Dickerson) was the collector of Buck as to this very trust fund, and a witness before the commissioner. It would seem to me, that the same principle, which requires that Dickerson & Conn should be made parties, would, if carried out, equally require that all their creditors should be brought before the court; for they are the persons to whom Buck was to pay the money, not Dickerson & Conn: and there can be no doubt, that, though they are not parties to the deed, they have a much deeper interest in the fund provided for the satisfaction of their claims than Dickerson & Conn have, and might have filed their bill against the trustee, called him to account, and made him liable to them for any mismanagement or misapplication of the fund. In the eye of equity, it was their fund, and Buck their trustee. Yet it is not pretended, that the plaintiffs, in order to come upon Buck for their claim, must have convened all these creditors before the court. In Van Vechten v. Terry, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 197, where real estate has been purchased by a joint fund raised by a number of subscribers, and the property conveyed to trustees, on a bill to foreclose and sell under a mortgage made by the trustees, it was held not necessary that the subscribers should be made parties; the trustees sufficiently representing all the interests concerned, for that purpose. In Branch's adm'x v. Booker's adm'or, 3 Munf. *43, where the will directed that each child's portion should be laid off to it, when it separated from the family, this court held, that it was not necessary that all the children should be made parties to every suit which each child might bring for his share: yet all were interested in the common fund. There are several other cases which shew the same course of decision; Lambert v. Nanny, 2 Munf. 196; Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 358; M'Clintic v. Manns, 4 Munf. 328. In Haycock v. Haycock, 2 Ch. Ca. 124, there were separate legacies to A. B. & C. and B. sued the executor, who pleaded in abatement, the omission to make the others parties; but the plea was overruled, and the executor ordered to answer. So in Attorney General v. Ryder, Id. 178, the same point met the same decision. The general rule as to parties is flexible, and subject to be modified according to the sound discretion of the court; Newland v. Champion, 1 Ves. sen. 105; Peacock v. Monk, Id. 131; Lawson v. Barker, 1 Bro. C. C. 303; Bishop of Winchester v. Beavor, 3 Ves. 314; Adair v. New River Co., 11 Ves. 429; Cullen v. Duke of Queensberry, 15 Ves. 14, in notes; Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. 321. I think the decree should be affirmed.

BROOKE, J. The only question in this case, is, whether Buck, as a trustee of the funds of the two houses Dickerson & Conn and Dickerson & Amis, on an order drawn by Dickerson, a partner in both firms, in behalf of Pennybacker, and accepted by Buck, the trustee, could be sued by Pennybacker's executors, without making all the partners of the two houses, and also all the cestuis que trust of the funds assigned, parties? The principle, that all persons having an interest in the controversy, ought to be made parties to it, is well settled; but this principle does not apply to a case where such persons are fully represented by a party designated by themselves, as in the case before us. By the terms of the deed of assignment to Buck, he was constituted a trustee to administer the funds of both Dickerson &

10 Conn *and Dickerson & Amis, according to the provisions of the deed. The order in behalf of Pennybacker, which he accepted, was drawn on the funds in Buck's hands by Dickerson, a partner in both houses, and accepted by Buck; conditionally, indeed, to be paid after other claims were provided for; but Buck had been constituted the trustee by the partners for this purpose; and it was not the duty of a stranger to question his authority to accept the draft drawn on him, or to take care of the interests of those who had confided that duty to him. It is true, the money drawn for was due to Pennybacker by the house of Dickerson & Amis, who were only entitled to the residuum of the funds after the payment of the debts of Dickerson & Conn: but there is no strict analogy between a trustee and an executor; the former represents all the cestuis que trust; the latter does not represent the legatees, in the same sense, and therefore, cannot be sued by one residuary legatee, without making the others parties. The house of Dickerson & Conn, certainly, had an interest in seeing that the debts of that house were paid, before the debts of Dickerson & Amis; but, as regarded the creditors of either house, they had confided that interest to Buck, their trustee, and they could not require of a creditor of Dickerson & Amis, to sue all the parties to the deed of assignment which constituted Buck their trustee, and also all persons interested in the funds assigned to him, instead of Dickerson & Amis, the debtors of the appellees. If they could, they might, by the assignment of their funds, have required that all interested in them should be before the court, before a single creditor could get his money. This ought not to be tolerated in a court of equity; otherwise, a principle settled for purposes of justice, would be made to defeat it. I concur in the opinion, that the decree should be affirmed.

TUCKER, P. In this case, there is but a single difficulty; and that is the want of proper parties. But I think the want of parties a fatal objection; not the omission

11 of Dickerson * & Amis as parties (as Mr. Briggs contended) but the omission of Dickerson & Conn, the peculiar objects of the trust. The rule is general and well established, that all persons concerned in interest shall be made parties, for two purposes—1. to settle the controversy all round; and 2. because no decree should be made affecting the interest of any man, unless he has had an opportunity to contest it; for, if all parties are not before the court, contradictory decrees may result, between which the rights of a party may be overlooked or crushed. See judge Coalter's remarks in Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 376, citing 1 Atk. 290, 2 Atk. 111, 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 165, pl. 5. Thus, in the present case: the court has decreed that there is a residuum which Buck must pay; yet if Dickerson & Conn hereafter sue Buck, as they may, for a settlement of the trust, they may shew, that there are yet other debts of their firm, for which the fund is primarily liable, and that there is no residuum; and they will have a decree accordingly. This decree, in this case, will be no barrier to it. Thus between the two inconsistent decrees, Buck must inevitably suffer.

The necessity of parties in interest being parties to the cause, is peculiarly strong in cases of trust. As a general rule, in all cases of suits by or against a trustee, or for the settlement of a trust subject, the cestuis que trust are essential parties. Malin v. Malin & al., 2 Johns. Ch Rep. 238; Kirk v. Clark, Prec. in Ch. 275; Adams v. St. Leger, 1 Ball & Beat. 181; Clark v. Long, 4 Rand. 451. The only known exception is, where the parties are so numerous as to render it extremely inconvenient to join them all, and the court has permitted a few to sue on behalf of themselves and others; as in the case of various companies not incorporated. 2 Madd. Ch. Prac. 173. But here Dickerson & Conn are the only parties wanting; they fairly represent their own creditors, if these last be even considered cestuis que trust.

This case, however, presents the singular fact of a debtor who has conveyed his property in trust for his creditors, being 12 *aided in drawing these funds out of the hands of the trustee, by the decree of the court of chancery, without giving the creditors an opportunity of contesting it, and of saying whether the fund will be adequate to their demands or not; and this too when the trust expressly provides, that the trustee shall not be bound to see into the accounts. It must be observed that the appellees' testator was not one of the creditors secured by the deed. The funds were to be applied to the payment of the debts due by Dickerson & Conn, and such debts of Dickerson & Amis as Buck was bound for. Now, Pennybacker was not a creditor of Dickerson & Conn, but of Dickerson & Amis; therefore, he did not come under the first description of persons. Nor was Buck bound for Dickerson & Amis's debt due to him; therefore, he did not come under the second. He was not then a cestui que trust, and the only way in which his debt could have been made payable out of the fund was by a draft of Dickerson & Amis, who were to have the residuum. This draft he obtained. It was a draft, then, on the residuum; and the payment of the draft to the order of Dickerson & Amis, would have been a payment to themselves, of a part of that residuum, which they were to have after the debts of Dickerson & Conn were paid, and not till then. Yet this has been decreed by the chancellor to be paid, without giving the cestuis que trust, Dickerson & Conn, an opportunity of contesting it, and of shewing that the fund will be insufficient to pay even them. If this should prove to be fact, Buck must pay this money over again to them; or, if he prove to be insolvent, then the cestuis que trust will have lost their debts, in consequence of the trustee, under the order of the court, having violated the trust, and dissipated and misapplied the trust subject.

The analogy to the case of a suit against an executor, which was suggested by Mr. Johnson, at first view, appeared to me to be apt. But it is said, that the case of suits by creditors and legatees against an executor, form an exception to the general rule as to parties. Brown v. Rickett's ex'ors

13 * &c., 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 555. Yet even where a residuary legatee or a distributee sues, he must make all persons parties, who are to share with him that residuum. And so I conceive, even in the case of legatees, if a testator direct a particular part of his estate to be divided between three persons, all must be parties in a suit against the executor; or if he directs one half of his personal estate to be given to A. and the residue to B.—B. cannot sue the executor for his residuum, without making A. a party. Much more, if the devise had been to sell a particular estate, and out of the proceeds to pay first the debts of the testator's son A. and then to pay the residuum to his son B. would it be necessary in a suit for the residuum, to make A. a party. For where a fund is to be distributed among several, it is common justice, that all who are to partake of it, should be present at the division, that they may see they get their proper portion. Had Pennybacker been a creditor named in the deed of trust, it could not have been questioned that it was necessary that the other claimants should be parties. Is the case not yet stronger, when his claim is for the residuum? The suit here, is in effect for the residuum, and the whole residuum; for even the whole is insufficient to pay the demand. It is a demand of that residuum, too, in right of the debtor to whose order it is to be paid. Now, is it not a judicial solecism to decree the residuum of a fund for payment of debts, to the debtor, without convening the creditors before the court, and giving them an opportunity to shew, that after the payment of their demands, there will be no residuum. I think it is; and, therefore, am of opinion to reverse the decree.

Decree affirmed.

Adversary Possession—What Constitutes*—Case at Bar.—C. being seized of land in fee, agrees to sell

Adversary Possession—What Constitutes.—It is not every possession of land for the period prescribed by the statute that constitutes adversary possession under the law, and will sustain the plea. The possession to be adverse must be actual, exclusive, open and notorious, and be accompanied with a bona fide claim of title against the claim of all and convey the same to J. and receives the purchase money, and puts him in possession, but does not make a conveyance to him; J. agrees to sell and convey the same land to W. and puts him in possession, but W. not paying the purchase money, this contract is rescinded, and W. agrees to give up to J. all his claim to the land; W. nevertheless, remains in possession, without paying any rent, and without pretence of title; and while W. is thus in possession, C. conveys the title to J. by deed of bargain and sale: Held, W.'s possession was not an adversary one, and, therefore, C.'s deed to J. passed the legal title to him, so that C. cannot maintain a writ of right against W. for the land.

Writ of right brought by Christian Snidow against Abraham Williams, in the circuit court of Giles, for 196 acres of land. The pleadings were in the form prescribed by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 118, p. 463, 4, and the mise joined on the mere right. The jury found a special verdict, stating the following case:

The land in question was granted by the commonwealth to Christian Snidow, the demandant, by grant regularly issued from the land office, dated September 12, 1787, under which the grantee entered, and was seized in fee; and being so seized, in the year 1796, he covenanted, by articles in writing, to sell and convey the land to John Byars; who, thereupon, received and held the possession, and paid the whole purchase money, but no conveyance was ever executed to him. Byars having thus acquired possession of the land, and a right to demand a conveyance thereof from Christian Snidow, by articles in writing executed in October 1799, covenanted to sell other persons, and be continued for the period prescribed by the statutory bar. Drumright v. Hite, 2 Va. Dec. 467, citing the principal case, Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 480, and Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. Rep. 813. "Adverse possession is not the mere holding over against the will of the party from whom you obtain the possession. It is the holding by claim of title, adverse to another's title, that constitutes an adverse possession." Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 400, 21 S. E. Rep. 813, quoting with approval from the opinion of PRESIDENT TUCKER in the principal case.

So it is well settled that the possession of the purchaser of land, under an executory contract is not adverse to his vendor, although he has paid all the purchase money and used and occupied the land for his own exclusive benefit. The contract, being executory and made in contemplation of a conveyance by a deed, recognizes the legal title as outstanding, and his possession will be treated as in subordination thereto and not as adverse. Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 244; Hudson v. Putney, 14 W. Va. 575, both citing the principal case. To the same effect, see the principal case cited in Clarke v. McClure, 10 Gratt. 310, 311, 314.

For a possession not adversary in its commencement will be presumed not to be adversary in its continuance, unless and until the presumption be repelled by proof that the party in possession claimed to hold adversely to the other and with his knowledge. To this effect, the principal case was cited in Layne v. Norris, 16 Gratt. 242, 248 (distinguishing the principal case); Cross v. Cross, 9 Leigh 252.

See generally, monographic note on "Adversary Possession" appended to Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 137.

Conveyance—Necessity of Actual Possession by Grantor.—Actual possession by the grantor is not indispensable to give effect to his deed, for if the possession held by another be of a fiduciary character or if its origin and continuance was such as not to amount to a disavowal except at the election of the owner for the purposes of the remedy, it will not impede the operation of the deed. Early v. Garland, 18 Gratt. 8, citing the principal case; Duval v. Bibb, 8 Call 362; Tabb v. Balrd, 8 Call 475.

Statute of Pretense Titles—Effect.—To the point that the statute against conveyance of pretense titles merely creates a penalty and does not affect the right, the principal case was cited in Middleton v. Arnolds, 18 Gratt. 491. See also, foot-note to Tabb v. Balrd, 8 Call 475, foot-note to Middleton v. Arnolds, 18 Gratt. 489.

the land to Jacob Snidow, and put him in possession; and Jacob Snidow paid Byars the whole purchase money, but no conveyance was executed to him, at the time, by either Byars his immediate vendor, or Christian Snidow in whom the legal title yet remained.

Jacob Snidow, in 1803, by a verbal contract with Abraham *Williams, the tenant, agreed to sell him the land, and he put him in possession of it, and Williams paid him some part of the purchase money; but in the year 1807 or 1808, this contract between Jacob Snidow and Williams, was rescinded by them, and the latter gave up to the former all the claim he had to the property; nevertheless, Williams continued in uninterrupted possession to the present time, exercising in-tire control over the subject, without paying any rent to Jacob Snidow, Christian Snidow, or any other person, though he never pretended any other claim or right than that which he derived from the contract between him and Jacob Snidow made in 1803, and rescinded in 1807-8. Christian Snidow, by deed of bargain and sale, dated in November 1824, conveyed the land to Jacob Snidow, Williams being still the tenant in actual possession, as above mentioned; and, not long afterwards, Jacob Snidow demanded the possession of Williams, who refused to give it to him. Whereupon, the writ of right in this case, was sued out in the name of Christian Snidow. And the question referred to the court, was, whether the legal title of the land was in Christian Snidow, the demandant? in other words, whether or no his conveyance to Jacob Snidow of November 1824, executed while Williams still held the possession as above mentioned, operated to pass the legal title to Jacob?

The circuit court gave judgment on the special verdict for the demandant; and Williams, the tenant, appealed to this court.

The case was argued by Johnson for the appellant, and Daniel for the appellee. The only question was as to the nature of the possession held by Williams at the time of Christian Snidow's conveyance to Jacob in November in 1824—whether that possession was an adversary one, and so prevented the conveyance from operating to pass the legal title? If it was, the legal title remained in Christian Snidow notwithstanding the conveyance, and the suit was properly brought in Christian's name; but if Williams's possession 16 *was not adversary, then the conveyance passed the legal title to Jacob Snidow, Christian had no right, and the suit should have been brought in Jacob's name.

CARR, J. The only question arising upon this special verdict seems to be, has the jury found an adversary possession in Williams? I think not. His possession certainly commenced legally: it was delivered by Jacob Snidow to him, under his contract of purchase: and the jury find, that, after holding under this purchase for some three or four years, Williams gave up to Jacob Snidow, all claim which he had to the land under the contract, and the contract was then rescinded. Williams's continuance in possession after this, without claim or pretension, I consider as no possession adversary to the right of Jacob Snidow, but a possession under him; just as if Williams had leased the land from him for years, and at the end of the term, had held over without any agreement. He was, in truth, the tenant of Jacob Snidow, and his possession was Jacob Snidow's; which so far from being adverse to Christian Snidow, was held under the purchase from his vendee Byars. I think, then, that the deed made by Christian to Jacob Snidow thus in possession under him, was valid and operative; and that, upon the facts found, the fee was in Jacob. It follows that the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed.

BROOKE, J. I am of the same opinion.

TUCKER, P. The question in this case, is, whether the deed from Christian Snidow to Jacob Snidow operated to pass the legal title to the land in controversy, from Christian to Jacob? If it did, then at the time of the commencement of the writ of right, Christian Snidow had no title, and judgment should have been rendered for the tenant.

The judgment of the court below has obviously been given upon the supposition, that the possession of Williams 17 *was such an adverse possession as prevented the operation of the deed of bargain and sale from Christian to Jacob, upon the principle of the cases of Duval v. Bibb, 3 Call, 362; Tabb v. Baird, Id. 475; Hall v. Hall, Id. 488; Clay v. White, 1 Munf. 162; Bream v. Cooper's heirs, 5 Munf. 7; Hopkins v. Ward, 6 Munf. 38. I do not think so. The incapacity of a person out of possession, to pass an estate in the land of which another has possession, does not arise out of the statute against pretended titles, as we are told by judge Roane in Tabb v. Baird: that statute does not declare the deed void, but leaves its effect to be decided by the principles of the law relative to the subject. According to these principles a man cannot give that which he has not; nor can the statute of uses transfer to the bargainee, a possession which is not in the bargainor; for it only provides that the possession of the bargainor shall be transferred to the bargainee; if he has none, none can be transferred.

It is, however, very justly observed, that this possession may be a statutory possession, and an actual possession is not essential. Thus if A. in actual possession bargains and sells to B., the vendee, before actual entry, has a statutory possession, and may bargain and sell to C. Moreover, it is a familiar principle that the possession of my tenant is my possession. If, therefore, I lease for years, I may nevertheless convey by bargain and sale, and my deed will pass the title. So, if there be a fiduciary possession, it will not impede the operation of the deed; Bibb v. Duval and Tabb v. Baird. So too, I think it clear, that if I put a party in possession, or if a man holds possession under me, such possession will not impede the operation of my deed. For, to give it that effect, there must be an actual adverse possession. Was there such a possession here?

It is found by the verdict, that Williams came into possession by the consent of Jacob Snidow, and indeed under a purchase from him, he having in like manner possession derivatively from Christian Snidow, the patentee, who yet held the legal title.

18 That his possession from the time of *his purchase until the rescission of the contract between himself and Jacob Snidow, was an adverse possession, cannot be pretended. He claimed under Christian Snidow derivatively, and not adversely to him; he claimed under his title and not adversely to that title. Until the moment of his refusal to deliver the possession, this state of things continued: he continued in the possession by the permission or sufferance of Jacob Snidow, a privy in title, who held his possession under and not adversely to Christian. Jackson v. Sharp, 9 Johns. Rep. 163. He was strictly a tenant at sufferance; for "an estate at sufferance is where one comes into possession of land by lawful title, but keeps it afterwards without any title at all;" 2 Blacks. Comm. 150. It is not confined to holding over after the determination of a lease for years: even a mortgagor left in possession, is a tenant at sufferance; Patridge v. Bere, 5 Barn. & Ald. 604, 7 Com. Law Rep. 204, S. C. And if a purchaser be let into possession before conveyance of the legal interest, he is a mere tenant at sufferance; Doe v. Sayer, 3 Camp. 8; Right v. Beard, 13 East 210. Here then Williams was, at least after the rescission of the contract, a mere tenant at sufferance. That such a tenant has no adverse possession, it cannot be necessary to establish by reference to authority. It remains, then, to consider, whether his refusal to surrender the possession, changed his character from that of a tenant by sufferance into that of a disseizor? from a rightful possessor into a tortfeasor, against the will of his lord?

That this cannot be, is obvious from various considerations. As the landlord can, at any moment, evict his tenant by sufferance, by entry after demanding possession, his omitting to do so, leaves the tenant still a possession by sufferance. The character of his tenure is not changed until entry. Moreover, even the owner "cannot maintain trespass against a tenant by sufferance, as he might against a stranger; and the reason is, that being once in by a lawful title, the law (which presumes no wrong in any man) will suppose him to continue upon a title equally lawful, unless the 19 *owner of the land, by some public and avowed act, such as an entry is, will declare his continuance to be tortious, or in common language wrongful." 2 Blacks. Comm. 150. I think, indeed, we shall not err in laying it down as a general proposition, that if a person comes into possession lawfully, his or his heirs subsequent unlawful continuance in possession, will not of itself operate as a disseizin, unless at the election of the party injured. Thus it is that though a tenant at sufferance, who has but a bare possession, cannot by continuance of his possession become a disseizor, yet if the owner thinks it more expedient to suppose or to admit himself to be disseized, and his tenant to have gained a tortious freehold, he may do so, and is then remediable by action.

3 Blacks. Comm. 175, 1 Johns. Ca. 88. Such is the case here as to Williams. When the deed was made, he still held as tenant by sufferance; but when the owner found it necessary to seek his remedy by suit, he was obliged to elect to consider himself disseized, and to consider Williams as in of the freehold, in order to maintain the writ of right, which is only sustainable against the tenant of the freehold. Nor will the refusal to surrender the possession to the rightful owner, operate a disseizin against his will. The rightful owner must have been tortiously ousted, either by violence or by some act that the law regards as equivalent in its effect, to constitute a disseizin; for it is an estate gained by wrong and injury. Smith v. Burtis, 6 Johns. Rep. 198. Thus, even a lease for a thousand years made by a tenant at will, is no disseizin except at the election of the owner, Blundel v. Baugh, Cro. Car. 302. And even a bargain and sale by a mere tenant, unaccompanied by livery of seizin, would not operate to divest the seizin of the reversioner; for a particular tenant can only effect this by feoffment, which is therefore called a tortious conveyance, since it can work a disseizin. The rightful conveyances of bargain and sale and lease and release, can never effect this. They only pass what the party lawfully may pass. See on these topics, Co. Litt. 239a, n. 1; Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burr. 60, 111, 5 Cruise's Dig. 371.

20 *From these authorities it is clear, that Williams's refusal worked no disseizin, except at Snidow's election. But if by his refusal, his possession became adverse, it must have operated a disseizin. For, although he who dispossesses a mere tenant for years, may perhaps by disclaiming title to the freehold, avoid the divesting of it, yet it is a universal principle, that he who divests the possession of the tenant of the fee, is a disseizor. Hob. 323, Harg. Co. Litt. 180b, n. 7, 296b, n. 1.

If then there was no disseizin, and by consequence no adverse possession in Williams, the seizin remained in Christian Snidow, until the execution of his deed to Jacob, when it passed to him by the operation of the statute of uses.

It appears to me, that the error in this case has arisen, from a misconception of what an adverse possession means. It is not the mere holding over against the will of the party from whom you obtain the possession. It is the holding by claim of title, adverse to another's title, that constitutes an adverse possession. Though a mere intruder or squatter, without pretence of title, holds possession of my land, and keeps me out of it, such possession does not amount to an adversary possession within the meaning of the law. Having no pretence of title, he cannot hold by title adverse to my title; and this it is which the law meant to protect. It pays no respect to the wrongful intrusion of a party without a scintilla of title. It requires too, that this adverse possession should be made out not by inference but by clear proof, and makes every presumption in favour of the possession being subordinate to the true owner. Jackson v. Shark, 9 Johns. Rep. 162.

These opinions are sustained by the decisions of some of our most respectable tribunals. Authorities upon such a subject, are naturally more abundant in a newly settled country, where adventurers set down, very often, upon the land which suits them best, without pretence of title. Judge Spencer, in the case of Jackson v. Todd, 2 Caines 185, remarks, that "it has been adjudged, that mere possession 21 by "a person claiming no title, is no disseizin of the rightful owner, and consequently he may convey or devise, notwithstanding the statute against champerty and maintenance. That to constitute that possession adverse to the true owner, which is equivalent to a disseizin in spite of him, there need, indeed, be no legitimate right, but it must be accompanied by a claim to the land." And judge Livingston said, "coming in as an intruder, or as a mere occupant, without any claim of title, will not prevent an alienation by the real owner, or be regarded as a holding adverse to his title." In the case before us, Williams had no pretence of title.

The judgment must be reversed, and judgment entered for the tenant.

Bream v. Marsh.

November, 1832.

(Absent CABELL, J.)

Dependent Covenants.—When Construed as Independent.*—Where reciprocal covenants have been contracted, and one party has partially performed the covenants on his part, and has no other remedy for compensation therefor but by action on the covenant, there, whatever be the form of the contract, and even though the covenants are expressly dependent covenants in form, and though they are pleaded as dependent covenants, yet they shall be held independent covenants and the plaintiff shall recover compensation for his part performance.

This was an action of covenant, brought by Marsh against Bream, in the circuit court of Kanawha.

The declaration alleged, that, by sealed articles of agreement between the defendant Bream and the plaintiff Marsh, Bream covenanted with Marsh, in consideration of the covenants therein contained to be performed by Marsh, that, Bream being the owner of a salt well and two furnaces in Kanawha, at which furnaces Marsh was to manufacture salt, Marsh should receive 22 one or both the furnaces, at his election, "in the then state of the same, with the machinery, pumps and appendages, and possession thereof should be given to him on the monday next after the date of the articles; and Marsh covenanted, that he would go on, immediately afterwards, to manufacture the quantity of 14,000 bushels of salt; for which Bream covenanted to pay Marsh after the rate of ten cents per bushel loose, for the whole quantity manufactured, in consideration of Marsh furnishing the whole of the fuel to be used at the furnaces, which he covenanted to furnish; and Bream also covenanted to let Marsh have one half of all the salt manufactured at the furnaces, in addition to ten cents per bushel on the whole quantity, which last was to be in lieu of all the expenses which Marsh undertook to defray; and it was further covenanted, that, in case the water in the well should fail in quantity or quality, so as to be unfit for the manufacture of salt in the usual way, Bream would, at his own expense, bore deeper in the well, until water of the ordinary quality of the salt waters on the river Kanawha, should be obtained; and that Bream would furnish the usual quantity of metal for the furnaces, which, with the metal, should be restored to him by Marsh so soon as the quantity of 14,000 bushels of salt should be manufactured, but in all events by the 1st day of January next after the date of the articles. And Marsh averred, that he performed all the covenants in the articles contained on his part to be performed, until the water in the well intirely failed both in quantity and quality so as to be unfit for the manufacture of salt; and that Bream had failed to perform the covenants on his part, and had broken the same, in this, that, after Marsh had manufactured 8000 bushels of salt, the water in the well became insufficient, both in quantity and quality, and unfit for the manufacture of salt, and Bream failed and refused, though requested by Marsh, to bore the well deeper at his own expense,—and Bream also refused, and still refused, to pay Marsh ten cents per bushel for the quantity of 8000 bushels, 23 actually manufactured before the failure of the water in the "well,—and Bream also failed and refused to allow Marsh the half of the 8000 bushels of salt so manufactured &c.

Bream pleaded performance of the covenants in the declaration mentioned; and on this plea an issue was made up.

At the trial, Bream filed a bill of exceptions to an opinion of the court, in which it was stated, that he moved the court to instruct the jury, that, under the pleadings in the case, unless the jury should be satisfied from the evidence, that, after the making of the salt proved to have been actually made (namely, 7697 bushels), the water in the well failed in quantity or quality, according to the true meaning of the covenant in that particular, and that thereupon Bream failed and refused to bore the well deeper according to the covenant, Marsh was not entitled to recover any thing for the salt which was actually made. But the court refused to give such instruction, and instructed the jury, on the contrary, that the covenant in relation to the quantity of salt to be made, and the covenant in relation to the price per bushel to be paid by Bream for making the same, were independent covenants; and that Marsh, in order to recover the price of ten cents per bushel for the quantity really made, was not bound to prove, either that he had made the whole quantity of 14,000 bushels in the *Covenants—How Construed.—Covenants and agreements are construed according to the intention of the parties, and the good sense of the case. Though in form they may be dependent, yet, to prevent injustice, they will be construed as independent, and vice versa. Todd v. Summers, 2 Gratt. 109; Osborne v. Cabell, 77 Va. 406; each case citing Bream v. Marsh, 4 Leigh 21, as its authority. The principal case was also cited with approval in Tait v. Tait, 6 Leigh 165. See generally, monographic note on "Covenants" appended to Todd v. Summers, 2 Gratt. 109.

covenant mentioned, or that the water had failed and that Bream had failed and refused to bore &c. as alleged in the declaration: to which opinion Bream excepted. (The covenant itself, on which the action was founded, was nowise set out in the record).

There was a verdict for Marsh, for 685 dollars 27 cents, with interest &c. But Marsh entered a release of 97 dollars 83 cents (it did not appear, why) and the court gave him judgment for only 587 dollars 44 cents, with interest &c. Bream appealed to this court.

Briggs and Nicholas, for the appellant, premised, that the terms and the intent of the covenants, on both sides, could only be ascertained from the declaration; and they insisted, that however these covenants might have been in fact, dependent 24 *or independent, the declaration pleaded them as dependent covenants. It alleged, that Bream covenanted to do what he undertook to do, in consideration of the covenants to be performed on the part of Marsh; and it averred, that Marsh performed all the covenants on his part, until the water in the well failed both in quantity and quality, and that Bream failed and refused to bore the well deeper; which is only an excuse for his own failure of full performance of the precedent covenant on his part; and thus Marsh shewed and pleaded, that the covenants, according to his own understanding, meaning and intention, were dependent covenants. It could not, with any propriety, be held that the intent of the covenants was that they should be independent, when the declaration pleaded them as dependent; yet the circuit court told the jury, in direct opposition to the case as stated in the declaration, that they were independent covenants. Marsh was bound to prove his case as laid in the declaration; Bristow v. Wright, 2 Doug. 665. He was bound to prove, that he had proceeded to perform the covenant on his part, until the water in the well had failed in quantity or in quality, that being the only excuse he alleged for his default of full performance of the covenants on his part. The circuit court held that he was entitled to recover, without proving his case as he had pleaded it.

Johnson, for the appellee, said, that covenants were to be construed to be dependent or independent covenants, according to the intention of the parties, and the good sense of the case; and technical words should give way to such intention; that a covenant going only to part of the consideration on both sides, a breach of which might be compensated in damages, was an independent covenant; and that, even in the case of dependent covenants, when a party has performed a part, for which he can have no other remedy but by action on the covenant, unless the plea goes to the whole consideration, there, from the necessity of the case, and because the defendant has his remedy for the failure of the plaintiff in part, an action may 25 be maintained in the same *manner as if the covenants were independent. 1 Wms. Saund. 320, note 4, and the authorities there collected. Lewis v. Weldon, 3 Rand. 71, 81; Seers v. Fowler, 3 Johns. Rep. 272. As to the argument deduced from the circumstance of the covenants being stated in the declaration as dependent covenants, he referred to Havens v. Bush, 3 Johns. Rep. 387. Marsh must be entitled to recover his ten cents per bushel for the salt he actually manufactured, though it fell some thousands of bushels short of the quantity he stipulated to manufacture, and though it were owing to his own fault that he did not complete the stipulated quantity; otherwise, if he had manufactured 13,999 bushels, he would have been entitled to no compensation whatever, because he had not manufactured the whole quantity of 14,000 bushels. This consideration, he said, was decisive of the case; Lewis v. Weldon, before cited; and Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Blacks. 273, in notes.

CARR, J. The question is, whether the instruction given by the circuit court to the jury, upon the trial, was correct? It is laid down, that covenants are to be considered dependent or independent, according to the intention of the parties, and the good sense of the case, and technical words should give way to such intention. The authorities on this subject are collected, and the principles deducible from them clearly stated, by sergeant Williams, 1 Saund. 320, note 4. Looking to the good sense of the case, and the meaning of the parties, what feature is there in the contract that would lead to the conclusion, that the plaintiff should receive nothing for his labour and expense, unless he made the whole 14,000 bushels, or shewed a failure of the water, and a failure of the defendant to bore deeper? Justice and good sense would seem to require, that the redress given for a breach of the covenant, should be measured by the injury resulting from that breach: but if these were held dependent covenants, this principle would be reversed; and the nearer the plaintiff had approached 26 to a full performance, *the smaller the injury he committed, the greater would be the redress to the defendant. Thus, if the plaintiff had made 13,000 bushels, the loss resulting to the defendant by the plaintiff's breach would have been trifling, and the defendant would gain the whole quantity made, without paying a cent. To be sure, if parties make such contracts, they must abide by them; but this on the ground of positive contract, not of justice. But here, there is nothing in the covenant (testing it by the rules deduced from the cases) that would, either upon the ground of the intention of the parties, or the good sense of the case, make these dependent covenants. The plaintiff was to have "after the rate of ten cents per bushel, for the whole quantity manufactured:" surely, this does not mean that unless he manufactures 14,000 bushels, he shall have nothing; that would not be after the rate of ten cents per bushel, for the quantity made. He made 7697 bushels; give him his ten cents upon that; and if he has broken his covenant in not making 14,000 bushels, let the defendant sue him, and recover the exact damage he has sustained by the breach. This seems to me the good sense of the case, and the meaning of the parties. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. This case turns upon the question, whether the covenants of the parties respectively, in the deed declared on, are independent or dependent covenants? The circuit court was of opinion, upon the trial, that they were of the former character.

It was justly said at the bar, in the language of the books, that covenants are construed to be dependent or independent, according to the intention of the parties and the good sense of the case; and technical words should give way to such intention. If the justice of the case requires it, though the words of a covenant are dependent in form, it shall yet be construed to be independent. This was the precise case

27 *of Boone v. Eyre. There A. sold a tract of land and a number of negroes to B. and covenanted that he had good title and was possessed of the negroes. B. covenanted, that, A. well and truly performing all things on his part, he, B., would pay a certain annuity. In an action for the annuity, B. pleaded that A. was not legally possessed of the negroes. But though no language could be stronger for the creation of a dependent covenant, yet the plea was held ill; "for, if such plea were allowed, the fact that any one negro was not the property of A. would, on the same principle, bar the action for the price of the land, or, the rest of the slaves, though B. was enjoying the profit of all but one." To avoid this gross injustice, the covenant was construed to be independent, against the express form of the words. Hence, in these cases, the first and most appropriate inquiry seems to be, what does the justice of the case require between the parties?

In the case before us, Bream was the proprietor of certain salt works; Marsh was a manufacturer of salt. Bream let his works to Marsh, put him in possession of them, and bound himself, if the water failed, to bore deeper for more. Marsh agreed to go on to manufacture 14,000 bushels of salt; to pay all expenses and furnish all the fuel; and to return the salt works as soon as the salt was manufactured, but at all events by the succeeding new year's day. And Bream agreed to pay Marsh ten cents per bushel, for the whole quantity manufactured, and to let him have one half of all the salt manufactured, besides. These were the simple terms of this agreement. Suppose it had been fully complied with, and the 14,000 bushels of salt made. What would Marsh the manufacturer have got? 7000 bushels of salt, and ten cents on each bushel manufactured besides, equal to 1400 dollars. What would Bream, the proprietor, have been entitled to? To 7000 bushels of salt, minus ten cents per bushel on the whole quantity manufactured, that is 1400 dollars. And what has he got, as appears by this record under the course

28 *He has got 7697 bushels of salt, minus 587 dollars 44 cents, the amount of the judgment of the court. I am hard of belief, that there can be any error to his prejudice, in a case which has redounded so eminently to his advantage.

Let us next see what, in fairness, the parties ought respectively to have had under the real state of things. Only 7697 bushels of salt have been manufactured, and we are bound to take it upon this record, that the wells did not fail. Does it follow, because the manufacturer has not made the full amount of 14,000 bushels which he might have made, that he is to have nothing? Is the contract so entire that it can admit of no apportionment, and that the plaintiff must prove he manufactured every bushel before he can shew himself entitled to recover even the ten cents per bushel which were allowed to cover expenses? The affirmative is the answer given to these inquiries in the argument of the counsel for the appellant. If so, the consequence (as Mr. Johnson justly said) is inevitable, that if he had manufactured 13,999 bushels, he would nevertheless not have been entitled to one cent for the labours of a year, and the heavy expenses of such an establishment. Lord Mansfield did not think thus, when overruling the demurrer in Boone v. Eyre; he said, "if this were allowed, any one negro not being the property of the plaintiff, would bar the action." And so I say here, if this pretension be allowed, the failure by a single bushel of salt, would bar the plaintiff's action for the whole compensation. This is not reason; neither is it law.

It is said by a learned author, that the spirit of the common law is opposed to apportionment of contracts. See 2 Evans's Pothier, 40. This certainly was anciently strictly true; and it is still true, I imagine, as to all entire contracts, which do not admit of apportionment, and indeed as to many others. In contracts for service between master and servant, the principle seems often very rigorously to prevail; as in the case of a clerk who quitted his employer within

29 *the year for which he engaged to serve—he was held entitled to nothing. Pagani v. Gandolfi, and Huttman v. Bulnois, 2 Carr & Payne, 370, 510; 12 Com. Law Rep. 177, 239. So too, as to ordinary servants; Spain v. Arnott, 2 Stark. Rep. 256; 3 Com. Law Rep. 339. See also Cutter v. Powell, 6 T. R. 320, though that case can only be sustained, I think, on the ground, principally relied on, of extra wages. But, notwithstanding these and other cases, which rigorously deny compensation unless there is intire performance, there can be no doubt, that where the subject is divisible, where the failure as to part can be fairly and accurately compensated by an apportionment of the consideration, the law permits, as justice certainly requires, that it should be done. In such cases the parties have their cross actions; as here,—if Bream had not really received full as much as under any circumstances he would have been entitled to, he might have his action against Marsh for the damages. With these views of the case, I do not think it necessary to go into a comparison of it with the strongly analogous case of Lewis v. Weldon. It is proper, however, to remark, that the circuit court was not only right in instructing the jury, that these covenants were to be considered independent, but it was extremely guarded in saying, that the plaintiff was not bound to prove the making of 14,000 bushels of salt, in order to entitle him to recover the ten cents per bushel. There is no intimation, that he was entitled to recover any part of the salt itself; and accordingly he seems to have been allowed none. I certainly think he was entitled to all above 7000 bushels. Nor do I see why the verdict, which I presume was for the 10 cents per bushel, was reduced. Some reason appeared, I suppose, on the trial. Be this as it may, these things were in favor of the appellant, and he cannot complain of them.

Judgment affirmed.

30 Seekright on Demise of Gilliam v. Moore.

November, 1832.

Dower—Transitory Seizin of Husband—Deed of Trust for Purchase Money.—G. by deed of bargain and sale, sells and conveys a parcel of land to M. and M. by deed of the same date, conveys the same land to trustees, upon trust to secure the purchase money thereof to G. HELD, the two conveyances shall be intended parts of the same transaction, and the seizin of M. was instantaneous and transitory, so that M.'s widow is not entitled to dower of the land.

Ejectment, in the circuit court of Goochland, by W. B. Gilliam against Anna Moore, for a parcel of land described in the declaration as being "so much of a larger parcel of land lying part in Hanover and part in Goochland counties, containing by estimation 560 acres, more or less, and adjoining the lands of E. L., S. M., W. W. and others, as lies in the county of Goochland." Upon the trial, the jury found a special verdict, stating, in substance, the following case:

W. B. Gilliam being seized in fee of the 560 acres of land, whereof the land in question was parcel, sold the whole 560 acres to J. S. Moore, for £1000. and conveyed the same to him by deed of bargain and sale, dated the 10th October 1804; and Moore, on the same day, by deed of bargain and sale (purporting to be the deed of Moore and Anna his wife, but she never executed it) conveyed the land to trustees, upon trust to secure payment of the purchase money to Gilliam. Several years afterwards, the whole 560 acres of land was duly sold by the trustees, in pursuance of the deed of trust, to pay the purchase money due to Gilliam; and at that sale, Gilliam himself became the purchaser, and the trustees conveyed the land to him; but before he got possession of it, Moore died. Moore's mansion house was on that part of the land which lay in Goochland; and his widow Anna Moore claimed to hold possession of this part on which the mansion house was situated, until dower of the whole tract should be assigned to 31 *her, under the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 107, § 2, p. 403. And the question of law upon the verdict, was, whether Mrs. Moore was entitled to dower of the 560 acres of land or not?

The circuit court gave judgment for her; to which, upon the petition of Gilliam, this court awarded a supersedeas.

Daniel and Lyons, for the plaintiff in error, said, there could be no doubt, that the conveyance of the land by Gilliam to Moore, and the reconveyance thereof by Moore to the trustees to secure the purchase money to Gilliam, were contemporary, and, in fact and in law, parts of one and the same transaction; and that Gilliam's seizin was merely transitory as well as instantaneous, and, therefore, his widow was not entitled to dower. They cited Co. Litt. 31b; 1 Rep. on Prop. 370; 2 Bac. Abr. Dower, c. 2, p. 370; Holbrook v. Finney, 4 Mass. Rep. 566; Clark v. Munroe, 14 Id. 351; Stow v. Tift, 15 Johns. Rep. 458; Childers v. Smith, Gilm. 200.

Forbes and Nicholas, for the defendant in error, insisted, that the verdict did not find, with certainty, that the conveyance by Gilliam to Moore, and the reconveyance by Moore to the trustees, were contemporary, much less that they were in fact, or were intended to be, parts of the same transaction; and the court could not supply the defects of the verdict by intendment or inference from the facts found. For aught that appeared, Gilliam might have made his conveyance to Moore, and Moore being unable to secure the purchase money otherwise, might have agreed to secure it by the deed of trust, after Gilliam's conveyance to him was executed and delivered, and might have executed the deed of trust in pursuance of such subsequent agreement. In such case, Moore's seizin, however short its duration, and though it might have been momentary or instantaneous, would not have been merely transitory, and his widow would have been entitled to dower. Therefore, Gilliam was not *entitled to judgment on this verdict. They also objected, that the description of the parcel of land claimed in the declaration was so vague and uncertain, that it could not be known whether the circuit court of Goochland had jurisdiction over the subject.

Lyons in reply, shewed, by a critical examination of the declaration, that there was no ground for the last objection.

*This seems to be part of the same controversy which was before this court in 1817, Moore v. Gilliam, 5 Munf. 346.

Dower—Transitory Seizin of Husband—Deed of Trust for Purchase Money.—Where land is conveyed to a husband, and he, by deed of the same date, executes a deed of trust or other incumbrance to secure the purchase money, in which the wife does not join, she will take her dower in the estate subject to the incumbrance. For, in such case, the two instruments are regarded not as separate or distinct transactions, but as parts of the same contract, taking effect at the same time, and investing the husband with a seizin for a transitory instant only; and not such seizin as will entitle his wife to dower. This principle of law seems settled both in Virginia and West Virginia, several cases citing the principal case in support of it. See Wilson v. Davison, 2 Rob. 398; Wheatley v. Calhoun, 12 Leigh 374, and foot-note; to Robinson v. Shacklett, 29 Gratt. 99; Summers v. Darne, 31 Gratt. 801; Coffman v. Coffman, 79 Va. 508; Hurst v. Dulaney, 87 Va. 445, 12 S. E. Rep. 800; George v. Cooper, 15 W. Va. 674; Holden v. Boggess, 20 W. Va. 73; Roush v. Miller, 30 W. Va. 641, 20 S. E. Rep. 664; Schmertz v. Hammond, 47 W. Va. 524, 35 S. E. Rep. 952; Randall v. Jaques, 20 Fed. Cas. 233.

tion arising on this special verdict is, whether under the deed from Gilliam to Moore, a title to the land vested in Moore, whereof his wife was dowerable? I am clearly of opinion, that she was not dowerable. It was objected, that the verdict has not found, that the deeds were executed at the same time, and as parts of the same transaction, and that, this being a special verdict, we cannot draw this inference; but to my mind the finding is abundant to justify, and indeed to compel, the conclusion, that the two instruments were parts of one and the same transaction, and that the seizin of Moore was that instantaneous seizin, spoken of in the books, where the land was merely in transitu, and never vested in the husband. The deeds bear the same date; they are between the same parties; relative to the same subject matter. The vendor conveys the land, for so much money; the vendee reconveys it to secure that money. It is impossible to doubt for a moment, the meaning, connection and (I may say) unity, of the transaction. We have no reported case in our own books directly in point; and this, no doubt, has resulted from the general impression of the bar, that no such right existed in the widow; for the case must have happened a thousand times. The english books, however, all lay down the position that a transitory seizin in the husband for an instant, does not entitle the wife to dower, and the point has been decided in the same way, in Massachusetts and New York. A different decision at this day, would be exceedingly mischievous, and open an inexhaustible source of litigation. With respect to 33 *of uncertainty, it seems to have been founded in misapprehension of the meaning of the declaration. I think the judgment ought to be reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff on the special verdict.

CABELL, J. I am of the same opinion. The jury having found that the deed by which Moore acquired title to the land, and also that by which he conveyed it in trust to secure the payment of the purchase money, were both executed on the same day, I am of opinion, that both deeds must, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be regarded as having been executed at the same time, and to have constituted parts of one and the same transaction; and consequently, that Mrs. Moore is not entitled to dower.

TUCKER, P. I have no doubt that the description of the land demanded by the declaration is sufficiently certain, and that no part of what is demanded, lies beyond the county line of Goochland, and so out of the jurisdiction of the circuit court.

Nor have I any doubt as to the operation of the deed from the trustee to Gilliam. That deed was executed shortly before Moore's death. It is found, that Moore was in possession at his death, and that the widow was in possession at the time of the verdict; but no adverse possession is found. This will never be presumed against the true owner, but the law will rather presume, unless the contrary is proved, that the party who has possession holds it for the owner. And this is done not only to uphold his right, but because the law will always presume that the acts of the party are rightful rather than wrongful. If in this case (as we think) the widow has no title to dower, and if her possession is adverse, then she is a trespasser or disseizor. This the court cannot presume. The jury must find it, and hence the rule that adverse possession must always be expressly found, or such facts as amount to it incontestably.

34 *The real question, in this case, is as to the right of dower. The authorities cited by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, leave no doubt that where the vendor passes the title to the vendee, and at the same times takes a mortgage or deed of trust for the security of the purchase money, in which the wife of the vendee does not join, she will nevertheless take her dower in the estate subject to the trust or mortgage. In such case, the husband is seized but for an instant, and not beneficially for his own use; the deed of conveyance, and the mortgage or deed of trust, are to be considered, like the levy of a fine, as parts of the same transaction and of the same contract; as taking effect at the same instant, and as constituting but one act. If both contracts were contained in the same instrument, there could be no doubt; and it is the same thing though they are contained in different instruments, provided they are parts of the same contract, and make together but one transaction. That they are parts of the same transaction, must be presumed where they are executed at the same time; and, moreover, as they cannot be absolutely isochronous, as there must be some interval, however small, the court ought always to take the same day to mean the same time, unless the contrary be found,—unless it be found, that the acts were separate, distinct and independent.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

35 *R. & I. Moon v. Pasteur's Adm'r.

November, 1832.

Debts of Decedent*—Priorities.—A debt due by recognition of special bail, is of higher dignity than a debt due by specialty, and shall have preference accordingly, in the administration of the assets of a decedent.

In an action of debt brought by R. & I. Moon against Ware, in the circuit court of Fluvanna, Pasteur entered into recognition of special bail for the defendant Ware; and judgment having been recovered against Ware, a scire facias was sued out against Pasteur, the bail, upon the recognition. The scire facias was executed on Pasteur, but he died soon afterwards, and the proceeding was revived by scire facias against Shores his administrator. Shores the administrator pleaded in bar, that he had duly administered all the assets of his intestate Pasteur's estate, except an amount of assets sufficient to pay a specialty debt due from his intestate to himself, which amount, therefore, he retained to satisfy his own debt. To this plea there was a general demurrer. The circuit court held that the plea was a good bar to the scire facias, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiffs, R. & I. Moon, appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant.

Forbes, for the appellee.

TUCKER, P. In the payment of the debts of a decedent, recognizances are always regarded as of higher dignity than specialties. 3 Bac. Abr. Ex'ors & Adm'ors, L. 2, p. 81; Off. of Ex'or, 138; 2 Wms. on Ex'ors, 562. In this case, the recognizance of bail being the solemn acknowledgment of obligation in a court of record, and the bail having been irrevocably fixed for the debt by the return of the scire facias executed before his death, and his failure to surrender his principal, the obligation upon him was complete *and final. Against a debt of this dignity, it was not competent to the administrator of the bail, to retain a debt due by specialty to himself.

Judgment reversed—the demurrer sustained—and judgment entered for the appellants against the appellee de bonis testatoris.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Bill of Exchange—What Deemed Foreign Bill—Judicial Notice—Law of Sister State.—In an action by indorsee against drawer of a bill of exchange, it is found by special verdict, that the bill was drawn in Maryland on a person in Virginia, and no law of Maryland found, declaring such a bill an inland bill: HELD, the court cannot take judicial notice of any law of Maryland to that effect, unless it be expressly found; and such bill being a foreign bill of exchange, according to the general law merchant, it must be so regarded.

Same—Notice—Time Allowed for Giving.—Every party upon a bill of exchange, even (it seems) a party who is a mere agent for collection, indorsing the bill, though only for the purpose of collection, is entitled to one full day, to give notice to the party next before him, in succession:

Same—Same—Each Party Must Exercise Due Diligence—Onus Probandi.—But the over diligence of one party to a bill, shall not supply the under diligence of others; and though the drawer or indorser sought to be charged, in fact receive notice as early as he would have been regularly entitled to it, yet the holder, in order to charge him, is bound to shew due diligence in each and every party through whose hands the bill has passed; the onus probandi, in such case, lying on the plaintiff, to prove due diligence, not on the defendant, to prove negligence.

Same—Same—Valuer by Drawer—Case at Bar.—A bill of exchange is drawn by a creditor on his debtor, payable sixty days after date; the drawee being advised thereof, before acceptance, writes to the drawer, that he will be unable to pay the bill at its maturity; whereupon the drawer, by letter to the drawee, authorizes him, when the bill approaches maturity, to redraw on himself. In order to raise funds to honor the bill; the drawee redraws accordingly, and then the drawer refuses to accept his bill; but no credit is given, by the holder or any other person, to the drawee, on the faith of the drawer's authority to him so to redraw: HELD, the drawer has not, by this authority to the drawee to redraw, waived notice of dishonor of his own bill, nor do the facts constitute any excuse for neglect to give such notice; nor is there any assumption to the holder, but only a promise to the drawee, which being without consideration is not binding.

Special Verdict—Uncertain—Effect.—If a special verdict be uncertain, so that the court cannot say for which party judgment ought to be given, there ought to be a venire de novo; but if the verdict be not uncertain, but the plaintiff's case thereby shewn to be a defective case, or a defective title, there should be no venire de novo, and judgment must be given for the defendant.

This was an action of assumpsit, in the circuit court of Norfolk, brought by Brown & Sons, indorsees of a bill of exchange, against Ferguson, the drawer. § There was a *great deal of special pleading, on both sides, but the case having been tried at last on the general issue, the jury found a special verdict; and the question was, Whether, upon the case found in the verdict, and upon the merits, the plaintiffs were entitled, on any ground, to recover?

1. It was found, in the special verdict, that the bill of exchange, on which the action was brought, was drawn on the 30th January 1817, at Baltimore, Maryland, by Ferguson a merchant of that city, on Foster & Moore merchants of Norfolk, Virginia, in favor of M'Donald & Son of Baltimore, for 3775 dollars, payable sixty days after date; and was, on the same day, indorsed in blank by M'Donald & Son for Ferguson's accommodation, and put into the hands of a broker of Baltimore, to be sold on Ferguson's account. The broker sold it, the next day, to Brown & Sons, who filled up the blank indorsement of M'Donald & Son, and made it an indorsement in full to W. & J. Cummings of Petersburg, Virginia, to whom they sent the bill for collection; so that the name of Brown & Sons, the real holders of the bill, did not appear upon it. W. & J. Cummings indorsed it in blank to Wilder, cashier of the bank of Virginia at Petersburg, who indorsed it in full to Williamson, cashier of the same bank at Norfolk, and forwarded it to him, to be presented to the drawees for acceptance, and payment at its maturity, according to the usages of the bank in such cases. The bill was presented to Foster & Moore, at Norfolk, for acceptance, § Special Verdict—Uncertain—Effect.—The proposition laid down in the last headnote—that if a special verdict is imperfect by reason of any ambiguity or uncertainty, so that the court cannot say for which party judgment ought to be given, there ought to be a venire de novo, but that, if the verdict be not ambiguous or uncertain, in itself, but the case made by the plaintiff is a defective case, or a defective title, then the judgment should be for the defendant and a venire de novo should not be granted—has met with approval in several subsequent cases. See, citing the principal case, Taylor v. Hill, 10 Leigh 466; Anderson v. Com., 18 Gratt. 301; McCrowell v. Burson, 79 Va. 295; Oney v. Clendenin, 28 W. Va. 48; Williams v. Ewart, 20 W. Va. 668, 2 S. E. Rep. 886.

Same—Inferences by the Court.—Although it is an inflexible rule that the court upon a special verdict cannot infer other facts from those found, yet it is the province of the court to make all legal inferences from the facts found in the verdict. Layne v. Norris, 16 Gratt. 242, citing the principal case; Robertson v. Ewell, 8 Munf. 1; Betty v. Horton, 5 Leigh 618; Charlton v. Gardner, 11 Leigh 281, and Purcell v. Wilson, 4 Gratt. 16.

§ It did not appear, that any suit had been brought on the bill in Maryland, though defendant resided at Baltimore: this action was brought many years after the transaction, against Ferguson, then at Norfolk.—Note in Original Edition.

Bill of Exchange.—See generally, monographic note on "Bills, Notes and Checks" appended to Archer v. Ward, 9 Gratt. 622.

†Same—Notice—Time Allowed for Giving.—In discussing this subject, HAYMOND, P., in Cox v. Boone, 8 W. Va. 500, cites the principal case.

To the point that knowledge of dishonor does not constitute notice, the principal case was cited in Bank of Old Dominion v. McVeigh, 29 Gratt. 559.

and accepted, on the 24th March; and, when it came to maturity, namely, on thursday the 3rd April, it was again presented to them for payment; and payment being refused, it was, on the same day, duly protested by a notary for non-payment. The notary returned the bill, with the protest, to Williamson, on friday morning the 4th April, which was the time at which he ought so to have returned it. Williamson sent notice of the dishonor of the bill, to Wilder the cashier at Petersburg from whom he received it, by the next mail, which left Norfolk in the 39 afternoon *of saturday the 5th (but without then returning the bill itself and protest to him) and the notice was received by Wilder at Petersburg, on monday morning, the 7th.

2. It was not found, when Wilder gave notice to W. & J. Cummings, or when the latter put their letter in the post office at Petersburg, giving notice to Brown & Sons, or whether such notices were given at all: but it was found, that Brown & Sons addressed a letter to Ferguson, dated Baltimore, 12th April 1817, giving him notice of the dishonor of the bill, in these words—"Your draft on Foster & Moore, in favor of M'Donald & Son, dated the 30th January last, at sixty days, for 3775 dollars, is this day returned under protest for non-payment; and we have to request that you will have the same immediately settled."

3. It was found, that the course of the mails, at the time, was as follows: the mail was closed at Norfolk, at one o'clock P. M. and left Norfolk at two o'clock, every tuesday, thursday and saturday; and, if it proceeded without interruption, would reach Baltimore in three days; that is, a letter mailed at Norfolk for Baltimore, on saturday the 5th April 1817, would have arrived at Baltimore, in regular course, on tuesday the 8th. And a letter mailed at Norfolk for Petersburg on saturday the 5th, would have arrived at Petersburg, in regular course, on sunday the 6th at night, and been delivered the next morning. From Petersburg to Baltimore there was a daily mail, which was closed at nine o'clock P. M. every day, left Petersburg the next morning, and arrived at Baltimore in about forty-five hours; so that a letter mailed at Petersburg for Baltimore, on wednesday the 9th, would have arrived at Baltimore, in regular course, on friday the 11th. But it was found, that, at that season of the year, the state of the roads between Petersburg and Richmond, and between Fredericksburg and Alexandria, on the mail route to Baltimore, was generally such that delays in the mail might frequently occur, though there was no proof of any such delay having occurred at the particular period in question, namely, from the 5th to the 12th April 1817.

*Allowing each party one day to give notice of the dishonor of the bill to the party next before him.—Williamson, to whom the bill was returned protested by the notary on friday morning the 4th April, sent notice to Wilder in due time by the mail from Norfolk of saturday the 5th. Wilder received it on monday the 7th, and ought to have given notice to W. & J. Cummings, on tuesday the 8th. They ought to have forwarded notice to Brown & Sons, the real holders, or to M'Donald & Son, the first

4. It was found, that it was not the usage of the bank at Norfolk, or of the notaries there, in case of bills protested for non-acceptance or non-payment, to send notice of dishonor to the drawer, but only to the person or the bank, from which the bill was immediately received for collection.

5. It was found, that it did not appear, that Ferguson, the drawer, in this case, had sustained any actual damage in consequence of not receiving earlier notice of the dishonor of the bill, other than what the law might presume from the other facts found.

6. It was found, that at the time the bill in question was drawn by Ferguson, and when it was accepted by Foster & Moore, and when it was protested for non-payment, the drawees were indebted to the drawer in a sum exceeding the amount of the bill—but, that Ferguson having advised Foster & Moore that he had drawn the bill on them, they *wrote him a letter on the subject (of which they kept no copy) to which Ferguson returned an answer, dated Baltimore, March 15th 1817, wherein he said—"Your's of the 11th inst. at hand, and note its contents—I am sorry you will be unable to retire the draft, but am well aware of the hard times, and have every disposition to accommodate my friends—When the draft is nearly due, you can draw on me at sixty days, to enable you to take it up; I should like, if possible, you would lessen it—The draft, I think, is due the 1st—4th April." That according to the permission given them in this letter, Foster & Moore, on the 20th March, drew a bill on Ferguson, for 3650 dollars, at sixty days, in favor of J. & W. Southgate of Norfolk, who agreed to give them the cash for it, as soon as they should be advised of Ferguson's acceptance of it: this bill was forwarded to Baltimore, and presented to Ferguson some days before the 3rd April when his own bill on Foster & Moore came to maturity; but Ferguson, notwithstanding his letter of the 15th March, refused to accept it; of which advice was received at Norfolk on the 5th or 6th April.

7. It was found, that when Ferguson's bill on Foster & Moore, was presented by the notary for payment on the 3rd April, they informed him of their draft on Ferguson, and of their arrangement with J. & W. Southgate in relation thereto, to enable them to meet their own acceptance, and requested him to hold up the bill, and to forbear to protest the same, saying, they were sure Ferguson would furnish them funds to indorsers, by the mail which closed at Petersburg on wednesday the 9th; and then the notice would have reached Baltimore. In regular course of mail, on friday the 11th; and the notice should have been given to Ferguson, the drawer, on the 12th. But as Brown & Sons, in their letter to Ferguson, dated the 12th, stated that the bill was that day returned under protest.—therefore, they did not receive any notice of its dishonor on the 11th; and either Wilder did not give the notice to W. & J. Cummings on the 8th; or, if he did, they did not send the notice to Brown & Sons, by the mail which closed at Petersburg on the 9th; or there was some irregularity in the mails. Yet, by the over diligence of Brown & Sons, who gave notice to Ferguson, the drawer, on the same day they themselves received the bill and protest, he had notice on the 12th, which was as early as he would have been entitled to it, if the most perfect regularity had been observed.—Note in Original Edition.

take it up, for his own credit-sake; but the notary refused to comply with this request. And then, on the same 3rd day of April, Foster & Moore made application to the officers of the bank; and, informing them of the arrangement they had made with Ferguson, and with J. & W. Southgate, to enable them to pay the bill, they requested that it should be held up for a day or two; in consequence of which representation, the bill itself, and the protest, were retained by the bank, till tuesday the 8th, when 42 they were forwarded by mail to Wilder at Petersburg; but, the bill and protest were so retained, merely in the expectation (founded on the statement of Foster & Moore) that they might be able to take it up, without any agreement to give them time; and, meanwhile, notice of the dishonor of the bill was forwarded to Wilder by the mail of the 5th April, as above mentioned.

The question referred to the court, was, Whether upon the whole case, as stated in the special verdict, the plaintiffs Brown & Sons were entitled to recover the contents of the bill from Ferguson, the drawer?

The circuit court held that they were not, and gave judgment for the defendant. Brown & Sons appealed to this court.

Stanard and Leigh, for the appellants, said, 1st, that it was very material to ascertain the character of the bill on which the action was founded; that is, whether it was an inland or foreign bill of exchange; and this depended on the law of Maryland, where the bill was drawn and negotiated. By the law of Virginia, a bill drawn here on any other state in the union, was an inland bill, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 125, § 1, p. 483, and so, by a statute of Maryland (as they were informed) a bill drawn there on any other state in the union, was an inland bill. In Maryland also, they said, the statute of 9 & 10 Will. 3, ch. 17, was in force; whereby it is provided, that inland bills of exchange may be protested for non-payment at maturity, and that such protest shall be notified within fourteen days after to the 43 party *from whom the bills were received, who, upon producing such protest, is to repay the bills, with interest and charges from the protesting. This case must be governed by the law of Maryland, the lex loci contractus. If this court would take judicial notice of the law of Maryland, it could be easily shewn to the court; and the plaintiffs would be entitled to judgment, since the bill was duly protested, and the protest produced to the drawer within the fourteen days. But, if the court could not take judicial notice of the law of another state, then the special verdict was defective in not finding the law of Maryland, by which alone the character and effect of the contract, and the manner in which it behoved the holders of the bill to proceed in order to entitle them to recover of the drawer, could be ascertained; and there ought to be a venire de novo.

But, 2ndly, taking this to be a foreign bill of exchange, and that the holders were bound to proceed upon it as such, according to the general law merchant, in order to entitle them to recover against the drawer; then, they said, every party upon the bill, or indorsee, was entitled to one day, to give notice of its dishonor to the party next before him, in succession; and this, whether such parties were bankers or any other, or were themselves the owners, or in fact only agents of the holders; for an agent of the holder by indorsing a bill, no matter with what motive, made himself party to it. 4 Petersd. Abr. 468; Wright v. Shawcross, 2 Barn. & Ald. 501, note a.; Haynes v. Birks, 3 Bos. & Pull. 599; Colt v. Noble, 5 Mass. Rep. 167. Now here, Williamson, the cashier at Norfolk, gave notice of the dishonor of the bill (but without sending at the same time the bill and protest) to Wilder, the cashier at Petersburg and his immediate indorser, in due time, by the mail of the 5th April, which notice Wilder received on the 7th; he had till the 8th to communicate the notice to his immediate indorsers, W. & J. Cummings; they were to send it to Baltimore by the mail which closed at Petersburg on the 9th; and then (supposing perfect regularity of the mails) it would have reached

were bound to give notice to the drawer on the 12th. They in fact gave the drawer notice on the 12th. It was not found, that Wilder communicated the simple notice of the dishonor of the bill, which he first received from Williamson, to W. & J. Cummings, or that they communicated it to Brown & Sons; but, on the other hand, it was not found, that they did not give the notices, regularly, from one to the other, in succession. It only appeared, that the bill itself and the protest, which were certainly sent from Norfolk by the mail of the 8th, and reached Petersburg on the 10th, were received by Brown & Sons at Baltimore on the 12th. It is perfectly consistent with the facts found, to suppose that Brown & Sons received the simple notice of dishonor on the 11th, and waiting till the next day to give the same notice to the drawer (as they had a right to do), and receiving the bill itself with the protest by the mail of the next day, they then gave notice to the drawer, of the fact of the bill being that day returned protested. Therefore, they said, for aught that appeared, the parties proceeded regularly with the bill. And, they argued, that as notice was in fact given to the drawer on the 12th, which was as early as he was entitled to it, as want of diligence was not found, and as the facts were entirely consistent with due diligence in all parties, it should be intended that due diligence was used by them all. If as early notice was given to the drawer as he was entitled to, it was not necessary to shew that it was transmitted through the mail. And they endeavoured to maintain, as a just and reasonable general rule, that whenever it appears, that a party to be charged upon a protested bill, has had notice of dishonor as early as he was regularly entitled to it, and yet insists that there has been want of due diligence in any of the parties through whose hands it had passed, so that the timely notice given him was owing to over diligence in other parties, such party ought to be held bound to shew the under diligence in any of the parties, on which he relies to discharge him from liability.

*The bill and protest thus sent from Norfolk by the mail of the 8th, would have arrived at Petersburg, in regular course of mail, on the 9th at night, and been delivered to Wilder in the morning of the 10th; and if they were sent to Brown & Sons by the next mail from Petersburg, which left that place in the morning of the 11th, they would have arrived at Baltimore on the 12th. In the letter of Brown & Sons to Ferguson, dated the 12th, they said that the bill had been that day returned under protest; whence, it seemed, that the return of the bill itself with the protest was the first notice of its dishonor received by them, and that this was on the 12th; and so the court understood the transaction.—Note in Original Edition.

45 *However, supposing the court should not think the appellants entitled to judgment on this special verdict, they said, it did not follow that the appellee was. For if due diligence in each and every party through whose hands the bill passed, was not found, neither was negligence in any of them found; such negligence could only be imputed by way of inference. In this respect also, the verdict was imperfect, and a venire de novo should be awarded.

3rdly. They contended, that Ferguson had, by his conduct in respect to the bill in question, made himself liable to Brown & Sons, whether notice of its dishonor was regularly transmitted to him or not. It was found, that, at the time he drew the bill on Foster & Moore, and they accepted it, they were indebted to him in a greater amount; but it was also found, that, on their representation, he had authorized them to draw on him at sixty days, to raise funds to take up the bill when it should come to maturity. This was, in effect, to give them sixty days further credit for the debt they owed him; and the case was the same as if he had drawn for the money they had contracted to pay him, sixty days before it was due; that is, in other words, before he had funds in their hands. The case, in principle, was like that of Claridge v. Dalton, 4 Man. & Selw. 226. Ferguson undertook to furnish funds to pay the bill; and the obvious effect of his promise to accept their bill on him, was to induce them to neglect any exertion to raise money by other means, to meet their acceptance of his bill; and thus his own conduct was calculated to lead to the dishonor of his bill, which, but for his promise and the breach of it, the drawees might have otherwise raised funds to take up. The authority, too, which Ferguson gave Foster & Moore to draw on him, was a letter missive, which they had a right to shew to any party interested in the transaction; and they did, in fact, state to the notary and to the officers of the bank at Norfolk, that they had such authority from Ferguson, that they had drawn on him in pursuance of it, and that they expected funds from that source to take up his bill on them;

46 *all which was calculated to throw the holders of the bill, and all through whose hands it passed, off their guard, as to giving Ferguson notice of dishonor. A drawer thus actively and wilfully accessory to the dishonor of his own bill, and to the failure of the holders to give him regular notice of its dishonor, ought not to be allowed to allege want of such notice to avoid his liability. A case so singular in its circumstances, ought to form an exception to all general rules, and to be determined on reasons peculiar to itself.

Johnson, for the appellee, as to the 1st point, said, that the general law merchant must govern this case, as it does every case of the kind, unless some local law or usage affecting it, and variant from the general law, was shewn. If it were at all material (which he did not admit) to ascertain, whether the bill in question was a foreign or an inland bill of exchange, it was enough to say, that, according to the general law merchant, a bill drawn in Maryland, on persons in Virginia, and negotiated in Maryland, was a foreign bill, and the holders must deal with it as a foreign bill, in order to entitle them to recourse against the drawer; and that, if the holders relied on the local law of Maryland, as varying the nature of the contract, or constituting, in any way, part of their title to recover, it was incumbent on them to have exhibited the law, and had it found in the verdict. There was no uncertainty or imperfection in the verdict, in this respect; but the plaintiffs' case, as they shewed and proved it to the jury, and as it was accordingly stated in the verdict, was defective. It was the simple case of a foreign bill of exchange protested for non-payment by the acceptor, and not so dealt with by the holders as to entitle them to recourse against the drawer.

As to the 2nd point, he insisted, that, in this case, in order to charge the drawer, notice of the dishonor of the bill ought to have been sent by the bank at Norfolk, directly to the drawer at Baltimore: if that had been done, the notice would have reached Ferguson as early as the 8th. The rule which allows every party to a bill one full day to give notice of dishonor, in succession, should be confined to parties in interest; certainly not extended to mere agents of the holders, such as W. & J. Cummings were. English authority had been cited, indeed, to shew that bankers through whose hands bills had passed, whether interested in them or not, should be allowed a day to give notice of dishonor, probably out of respect to an established course of business: but no case had gone so far as to allow, for every mere private agent for collection, having no interest in the bill, a full day to communicate notice of dishonor; and it would be most mischievous to extend the rule so far; for, if a bill passed through the hands of many agents, and each were allowed a day to give notice of dishonor to the next agent, and so on in succession, notice to the person to be charged might be postponed till it could be of no use to him. But admitting the rule, in its full extent, as the appellants' counsel stated it, he said, there was manifestly want of due diligence in this case. If the bill itself and the protest was all that was transmitted to Brown & Sons (and their letter to Ferguson of the 12th April, shewed that this was really the case); then it was expressly found, that these were transmitted from Norfolk to Petersburg, by the mail of the 8th, whereas they ought to have been transmitted by that of the 5th.

If the simple notice of dishonor, which was sent from Norfolk to Wilder by the mail of the 5th, were relied on, then it did not appear, that Wilder, who received it on the 7th, communicated it to W. & J. Cummings, or that they communicated it to Brown & Sons, at all: and if they had regularly communicated it from one to another, it ought to have reached Baltimore on the 11th. Yet it appeared, that the earliest notice received by Brown & Sons, was received on the 12th. And though they gave immediate notice to the drawer on the 12th, their over diligence could not make good the under diligence of the other parties through whose hands the bill had passed. Marsh v. Maxwell, 2 Camp. 210; Turner v. Leech, 4 Barn. & Ald. 451, 6 Eng. C. L. R. 484. In any view of the case, therefore, there was want of due diligence to charge the drawer.

48 *Here too, the imperfection of the appellants' case, was not in the verdict, but in the case itself. They were bound to shew, that notice of the dishonor of the bill was regularly given to the drawer; it was an essential part of their title to recover of him. If they had pretended, that Wilder gave timely notice to W. & J. Cummings, and they gave timely notice to Brown & Sons, it had been easy to prove the facts by those parties; and if proved, they must have been found in the verdict. As to W. & J. Cummings, it was only necessary to prove that they deposited the notice for Brown & Sons in the post office, in time to go by the mail which closed at Petersburg on the 9th April; the irregularity of the mails was not material; and if it was, it was incumbent on the appellants to shew it.

3rdly. The letter from Ferguson to Foster & Moore, authorizing them to draw on him at sixty days, to raise funds to pay his bill on them, could not, in any way help their case. That letter contained no promise to them, nor did they act upon the faith of it. It was most a promise to Foster & Moore, and a promise without consideration, and not binding. The appellants could not possibly avail themselves of it, as an assumpsit to pay them the contents of the bill. And it was well settled, that it did not dispense with regular notice of dishonor; it only proved that Ferguson had reason to apprehend that the bill would be dishonored; but even positive knowledge of dishonor was not equivalent to notice. Nicholson v. Gouthit, 2 H. Black. 609; Staples v. O'Kines, 1 Esp. 332; Clegg v. Cotton, 3 Bos. & Pull. 239; Esdaile v. Sowerby, 11 East 114, and the other cases collected in Chitty on Bills, 264, & seq.

CARR, J. This case was admitted, in the argument, to depend entirely on the special verdict; I have therefore confined my examination to it. Two points were considered as arising out of it: 1. Whether a regular notice of non-payment of the bill, was necessary, under the circumstances, to charge the drawer? 2. Whether such notice was given?

49 *Upon the reason and justice of the case, I at first felt doubts, whether the drawer was entitled to strict commercial notice. There is no doubt, that he was authorized to draw the bill, for the jury find, that the drawees owed him the sum for which it was drawn. This, under the general rule, would entitle the drawer to notice. But it is also found, that before the bill was presented for acceptance, Foster & Moore, the drawees, having been advised of it, wrote a letter to Ferguson, the drawer, on the subject; in answer to which letter Ferguson writes—"I am sorry you will be unable to retire the draft"—"When the draft is nearly due, you can draw on me at sixty days, to enable you to take it up." It is found also, that when the time for paying the bill drew near, the drawee did draw on Ferguson for the purpose of meeting it; that this bill was sold, on condition that Ferguson should accept it; and was sent on and presented to him, and dishonored by him. These facts seemed to me to shew, clearly, that Ferguson had, if not a perfect knowledge, the strongest grounds to conclude, that Foster & Moore would not pay the bill he had drawn on them; and, therefore, was not entitled to strict notice. An examination of the subject, however, has satisfied me, that my first impressions are in opposition to the fixed and settled law of the subject. Nicholson v. Gouthit, 2 H. Blac. 609, is the leading case on the point, which has been since uniformly followed. In Esdaile v. Sowerby, 11 East 117, the indorser of a bill had full knowledge of the bankruptcy of the drawer, and the insolvency of the acceptor, before and at the time when the bill became due; yet the court held, that this did not dispense with the necessity of giving such indorser regular notice of the dishonor of the bill. The case of Staples v. O'Kines, 1 Esp. Rep. 332, seems directly in point to the present case: in an action against the drawer of a bill, the defence was want of notice; the plaintiff called the acceptor, who proved, that when the bill was drawn, he was indebted to the defendant in more than the amount, but 50 that he then represented to *the defendant, that it would not be in his power to provide for the bill, when it should become due, and that it was, therefore, then understood between them, that the drawer should provide for it: and it was contended that this superseded the necessity of giving the drawer notice: but lord Kenyon held that it did not, and non-suited the plaintiff. There are many more cases to the same point. The authority of these adjudications, and the reason on which they are founded, satisfy me, that the drawer, in the case before us, was entitled to regular notice of the non-payment of the bill by Foster & Moore.

Has he received such notice? The general rule is, that each party must give notice of dishonor of a bill, as soon as he reasonably can; and this reasonable time is a question of law, depending upon the circumstances of each case. Where persons live in the same town, notice must be given the next day; where they live at different places, notice should be sent by the next post; each party having a full day to give notice, but not so that the over diligence of one shall be made to supply the under diligence of another. To this standard, let us bring the facts found by the special verdict. They are substantially these: the bill was protested on the 3rd April and returned to the bank at Norfolk, on the 4th. By the next mail, which left Norfolk on the 5th, a notice of the dishonor of the bill (not the bill and protest) was forwarded to Wilder, which reached him on the 7th; thus far, all was regular. The jury has not found when Wilder gave notice to W. & J. Cummings, nor when they gave notice to Brown & Sons; but it is found that there was a daily mail from Petersburg to Baltimore, reaching the latter place in about forty-five hours, and that Brown & Sons gave Ferguson notice of the non-payment and protest on the 12th April, at Baltimore; saying "Your draft &c. is this day returned under protest for non-payment." It is further found, that the bill and protest were forwarded from Norfolk to Wilder on the 8th April, being the second mail after the protest. From these 51 facts, the conclusion seems *irresistible, that there must have been a delay of twenty-four hours more than there ought to have been, in the arrival of the notice at Baltimore: for Wilder receiving notice on the 7th, was bound to give it to W. & J. Cummings on the 8th; and they ought to have given it to Brown & Sons by the mail of the 9th; which if they had done, it would have reached Baltimore on the 11th; whereas no notice was in fact received by Brown & Sons, at Baltimore, till the 12th. And though Brown & Sons gave immediate notice to Ferguson on the same day, yet this over diligence on their part could not cure the want of due diligence in any of the parties standing before them.

No doubt there might have been causes excusing the delay; but if such had existed, they ought to have been found; for in special verdicts, the maxim de non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio, applies with peculiar force. Standing as they do, I cannot but say, that the facts found shew such negligence as under the settled rule discharges the drawer.

I have come to this conclusion, not without a feeling of reluctance; for, like some other questions stricti juris, this requisition of exact notice does not, in the case before us, seem to lead to the justice of the case. But we must recollect, that the rule which prefers a private hardship to a public inconvenience, applies to no subject of the law, with more force than to that in which the mercantile world is concerned.

I do not think the law of Maryland can have any influence on the case. The judgment should be affirmed.

CABELL, J. I am of the same opinion.

TUCKER, P. The bill of exchange in this case, having been drawn in Maryland by a merchant of Baltimore on a house in Virginia, was by the law merchant a foreign bill; for as to such bills the several states of the union are held to be foreign to each other; Longdale v. Brown, 3

52 Wash. *C. C. R. 404. This decision is in conformity with the legislative understanding of the matter: the legislature of Virginia has thought it necessary to provide, that bills drawn in Virginia on other states, shall not be taken to be foreign bills; a provision certainly unnecessary, if these commercial securities had been deprived of that character by the mere act of the adoption of the federal constitution. As to bills drawn in other states on Virginia, the statute is however silent. It may well indeed be doubted, whether it could have declared bills drawn and negotiated elsewhere, though drawn in Virginia, to be inland bills; since this would have been to declare the law of the contract of another jurisdiction. Be this as it may, it has not thought proper to do so; and, therefore, the principle of the law merchant remains unchanged, in its application to this bill, unless the law of Maryland has expressly enacted otherwise: this is not found by the verdict, and cannot be presumed. Considering the bill in this light, the question is, Whether there has been due diligence on the part of the holders?

The transaction relative to the engagement of Ferguson to accept the bill of Foster & Moore, for the purpose of enabling them to take up his bill on them, has been introduced with a view to strengthen the plaintiffs' case. I do not think it varies it. It neither amounted to an assumpsit, of which the holders of the bill could avail themselves, nor can it have the effect of a waiver of notice. 1st, It cannot amount to an assumpsit to Brown & Sons; it was only an engagement with Foster & Moore to accept; and this without consideration, for they were Ferguson's debtors. It was, therefore, revocable at any time, until either Brown & Sons, or some third person, on the faith of that engagement, had advanced their money or given credit to Foster & Moore. Had J. & W. Southgate, for instance, purchased absolutely, Ferguson might have been bound. But their purchase was qualified by a condition, that the bill should be accepted before they advanced their money; thus leaving Ferguson still 53 at liberty to accept or to refuse payment of the bill. So, "if Brown & Sons had accepted a bill of Foster & Moore on Ferguson, in payment of the first bill, or had even given credit on the faith of Ferguson's engagement to accept, Ferguson might have been bound. But the verdict expressly finds, that they gave no credit; they stood upon their rights, as holders of the protested bill, which is the foundation of the present controversy. 2ndly, The agreement to accept and the knowledge of the drawer in anticipation, that the bill would not be paid, did not amount to a waiver of notice. It has been long since settled, that notice or rather knowledge by anticipation, will not dispense with the necessity of notice of non-payment. Even the known insolvency of the drawee will not have that effect; for, as many means of securing payment may exist through the assistance of friends or otherwise, it is reasonable that the drawer or indorsers shall have notice that the holder designs to look to them, in order that they may have the opportunity of availing themselves of such means. Knowledge of the fact of insolvency, or that a bill will be dishonored, is one thing, and notice of protest for non-payment is another. For, until the drawer or indorser receives such notice, he has no reason to conclude that resort will be had to him. He is lulled into security, instead of being awakened to the necessity of providing for his own indemnity. If he receives no notice of dishonor, he may reasonably conclude, either that contrary to expectation, the bill has been paid, or that the acceptor has been able to provide for it by redrawing or otherwise, or that the holder, notwithstanding the failure to pay at maturity, may hold up the bill from his confidence in the house, and may prefer to look to the acceptor as a matter of convenience. Thus, if a bill were drawn in Richmond on London, in favor of a London merchant, and was not paid at maturity, the payee might nevertheless find it more convenient to arrange with the acceptor in London, than to send back the bill to Virginia for collection. When, therefore, notice is not given, the drawer is diverted from the necessity of providing for his own safety, by the supposition that the holder has given credit to the 54 acceptor. A distinction, however, has been attempted, in this case, because it appears the holders here were informed, that the drawer had notice by anticipation. I do not think this makes any difference. The drawer still had a right to due notice, in order that, knowing of the intention to look to him, and being distinctly informed that what had been anticipated had really occurred, and that no provision was made for taking up the bill, he might provide for his own safety. Even, if the case of Brett v. Levitt, 13 East 214, be deemed altogether reconcilable with the current of decisions from Nicholson v. Gouthit to Esdaile v. Sowerby, yet that case would not sustain this: for there, it appeared, that the holder received notice of the fact of the anticipated dishonor from the drawer himself, and this too upon his own express application to the drawer to know if the bill would be paid; but here, the drawer was not at all aware, that the holder had been informed that he (the drawer) had had notice that the bill would not be paid. He could not, therefore, attribute the failure of the holder to give notice, to any such cause, but was left to the conclusion that the holder did not design to look to him, and had either given time, received payment contrary to expectation, or had otherwise arranged with the acceptor. Nor could Ferguson's offer to accept a new bill have lulled the holders into security; since they must have been aware, that it was a revocable promise until some bill had been negotiated upon the faith of it; and, in fact, they were not lulled into security; for, though they held up their protested bill for a few days, they stood upon their rights as holders, and proceeded to give notice of the protest for non-payment.

Was notice duly given? The bill was returned by the notary to the bank on the 4th April; notice was sent to Wilder on the 5th, and he received it on the 7th; this was in due season. If he gave notice to W. & J. Cummings on the 8th, and they transmitted a notice to the parties in Baltimore, on the 9th, it would have reached there on the 11th; and then a notice to the drawer on the 12th, would have been good. Now, the drawer did receive notice on 55 *the 12th, which was as soon as he had a right to receive it, provided the intermediate parties had proceeded regularly. But it is not enough, unless it is also shewn that each indorsee gave notice within a day after receiving it: if there be a defect in any link of the chain of notices, it is fatal to the holder's demand. We can not eke out the under diligence of one party, by the over diligence of another. This is settled by authority, and upon sound reason: for, as the recourse of any immediate indorser against those who lie behind him, arises from his own liability to pay the bill to him to whom he passed it, the laches which takes away his liability, takes away theirs also. The instant such laches occurs in any, all who might otherwise have been liable are discharged at once. It would be unreasonable to permit the over diligence of a prior indorser, to give new life to a responsibility which had once been annihilated by the negligence of another party to the bill. It is, therefore, not sufficient, that, in the aggregate, the drawer had notice as soon as he had a right to expect it. The plaintiff must shew that each indorsee has given regular notice. The onus as to this matter is upon him. He recovers upon the ground, that he has used diligence and given due notice; and, therefore, he must shew due diligence and due notice. And it is not more incumbent upon him to prove that the drawer in fact received notice of the non-payment and protest, than it is to shew that the notices have all been regular in the several gradations. This is a part of his title; and seems, moreover, to be a matter which cannot be permitted to rest upon mere inferences, but must be expressly proved; Lawson v. Sherwood, 1 Stark. Rep. 314; 2 Eng. C. L. R. 405. In this case, such proof must have been in the power of the appellants, if the fact was as their case requires. W. & J. Cummings and Wilder must have been able to establish when they respectively gave notice, if they gave it at all. If we look to the special verdict, it is a blank as to these notices. It does not appear, that any other notice was forwarded from Petersburg to Baltimore, except the bill and protest; and these could not have been 56 sent on until the *10th, as they left Norfolk on the 8th, and must have reached Petersburg on the 10th, according to the usual course of mail. This was too late, and accordingly they were not received until the 12th, as the letter of notice of Brown & Sons explicitly proves.

Thus, then, it appears the special verdict does not set forth a good right of action on the part of the plaintiffs. They have failed to establish the various facts upon which alone the defendant could be made liable. Feeling well satisfied of the hardship of the case, and that the rigorous rules as to these commercial securities, which a just policy requires to be inflexible, probably work injustice in this case, I have earnestly revolved this matter in my thoughts, with a view to discover whether a venire de novo could with propriety be awarded. I am satisfied, upon the maturest reflection, that it cannot. If a verdict is indeed imperfect by reason of any ambiguity or uncertainty, so that the court cannot say for which party judgment ought to be given, a venire de novo ought to be awarded. Brown & Rives v. Ralston & Pleasants, 4 Rand. 504. But if the verdict be not ambiguous or uncertain in itself, but the case made by the plaintiff is a defective case, or a defective title, then the judgment should be for the defendant and a venire de novo should not be granted. Bellows v. The Hallowell and Augusta Bank, 2 Mason 31. Now, in this case, there is nothing ambiguous or uncertain; but there is a total failure to trace down the notices from Wilder to Ferguson, through W. & J. Cummings; which was essential to the plaintiffs' right of action. With every disposition therefore to have sustained the plaintiffs' action, if it could have been done consistently with settled rules, I am compelled to give my judgment against them; saying with the lord chief justice in Nicholson v. Gouthit, in reference to these commercial securities, that "it is, perhaps, better to adhere to a rule, however strict, than to relax it," although the justice of the case be, without doubt, on the side of the party against whom it operates.

Judgment affirmed.

57 *Newcomb v. Drummond.

November, 1832.

Appeals—Destruction of Record Pending—Right to Bring Debt on the Judgment.*—D. recovered judgment against N. from which N. complaining of error, regularly took an appeal: but before this appeal was or could be prosecuted, the office of the clerk of the court, and with it the record of the judgment, were destroyed by fire, and therefore the appeal was never prosecuted: then D. brought debt on the judgment whereof the record was so destroyed: HELD, he was entitled to recover, notwithstanding the appeal taken from the judgment, and the circumstances which prevented the prosecution thereof.

Debt by Drummond against Newcomb, in the county court of Gloucester, upon a judgment of the same court for 100 dollars, previously recovered by the former against the latter, in an action of trespass, assault and battery. The declaration excused the production of the record of the action and judgment, by stating that since the judgment was rendered, the clerk's office had been consumed by fire, and this record among other papers wholly destroyed. Newcomb put in a special plea in bar, alleging that the proceedings and judgment in the action of assault and battery against him were erroneous, and shewing particularly wherein they were supposed to be so, and that he had filed a bill of exceptions to the proceedings, taken an appeal from the judgment, and given an appeal bond, but that before his appeal was or could be prosecuted, or any steps taken to prosecute it, the clerk's office, and this record therein contained, had been wholly consumed by fire; concluding with a verification. And upon this plea an issue was made up.

At the trial in the county court, Newcomb filed a bill of exceptions to an opinion of the court, stating, that Drummond having proved, by parol testimony, the rendition of the judgment in the action of assault and battery against Newcomb, and Newcomb's appeal from the same, and due execution of the appeal bond, and the subsequent destruction of the clerk's office by fire, and of the whole record of the action of assault and battery,—Newcomb, thereupon, moved the court to instruct the jury, that this action of Drummond 58 *could not be maintained; but the court refused to give such instruction, and instructed the jury, on the contrary, that though the effect of Drummond's judgment was suspended by the appeal taken by Newcomb, yet the judgment was an evidence of Drummond's demand; to which opinion Newcomb excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for Drummond. The circuit court of Gloucester, upon a supersedeas awarded at the instance of Newcomb, affirmed the judgment of the county court. And then he applied to this court for a supersedeas to the judgment of the circuit court; which was awarded.

Johnson for the plaintiff in error; no counsel for the defendant.

TUCKER, P. There is no error in the judgment. In considering the case, it shall be taken for granted, that the plea sets forth, distinctly, the fact that an appeal had been taken and consummated by giving bond, but that by the burning of the record the party could not take steps to prosecute his appeal. The appeal of a party can have no greater effect upon the judgment appealed from, than a writ of error awarded by a superior tribunal: if there be a difference, that difference would preponderate in favor of the considerate act of a court, rather than the arbitrary appeal of the party. Now, it is no bar to an action of debt upon a judgment, that a writ of error has been awarded. The writ of error is, indeed, so far a supersedeas to the judgment, that an execution cannot regularly be issued upon it, and if issued will be quashed. But an action of debt may, nevertheless, be brought upon it; and unless for some cause, deemed adequate by the court, the proceedings be suspended, the plaintiff will be entitled to his judgment. 2 Wms. Saund. 101, h; 1 Tidd 574, 5, 6. On the judgment so obtained, an execution will not, generally, be permitted, until the writ of error is determined;
59 but the rule is *not uniform, but depends upon circumstances. Thus, where the plaintiff obtained judgment in the second action, before the writ of error sued out to the first, he was permitted to take his execution. Bishop v. Best, 3 Barn. & Ald. 275; 5 Eng. C. L. R. 281. And in Fisher v. Emerton, 1 Stra. 526, where the plaintiff got the second judgment against the bail, on a scire facias, pending the writ of error, the execution levied on their bodies was not set aside; the court saying that as the party did not apply to stay the proceedings, the court would not set them aside. In the present case, then, Drummond was entitled to the second action on the judgment. Now was it a vexatious one; for the destruction of the record rendered it the most proper, as it certainly was the fairest, course. Therefore, the instruction of the court was not erroneous to the prejudice of Newcomb; for if he could have produced the fullest evidence of an appeal or writ of error, it could not have barred the action. The plea was, in fact, an immaterial plea; and had the verdict been for Newcomb, Drummond would have had judgment non obstante veredicto. The verdict having been for Drummond, the judgment upon it cannot be questioned.

*Appeals.—The principal case is cited in Hudgins v. Marchant, 28 Gratt. 183. See monographic note on "Appeal and Error" appended to Hill v. Salem, etc., Turnpike Co., 1 Rob. 263.

It must be observed, too, that the plea distinctly admits, that by burning of the papers, the party could take no steps to prosecute his appeal. His appeal then was not prosecuted. Putting technicalities out of view, it may be asked, whether a plaintiff who has obtained a verdict of twelve jurors and the judgment of a court in his favor, shall be debarred of his judgment by an appeal which his adversary has never prosecuted, and which he certainly cannot now prosecute. The destruction of the record may have operated a prejudice to him perhaps; but if this unprosecuted appeal, which cannot now be prosecuted, is to have the effect of a reversal of the judgment out and out, the plaintiff will sustain greater injury. In a question whether the consequences of this accident should fall on the plaintiff who had the verdict of a jury and the judgment of a court in his favor, or on the defendant who complains that that court erred in its decisions, we should not hesitate.

60 *There was a mode, perhaps, in which the appeal might have been prosecuted. The facts might have been ascertained as to the bill of exceptions and the consummation of the appeal by the execution of the appeal bond, under the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 130, and then, it is possible, the transcript of the evidence obtained might have been acted on by the court of appeals. It struck the court, at first, that Drummond could only have been permitted to prove his case by evidence taken under that statute; but, as there was no objection to the testimony introduced, as there was no proof that a board of commissioners had ever been appointed and had acted, and as independently of the statute, a record which has been burnt or destroyed, may be set up by parol evidence, according to the common law, there is no good ground of objection on that score. Stark. Law Ev. part 2, § 39, p. 159.

Judgment affirmed.

61 *M'Alexander v. Montgomery.

December, 1832.

Breach of Contract—Assumpsit—Allegations—Proof.

—In assumpsit, plaintiff declares, that defendant contracted to locate a treasury warrant for plaintiff on waste and unappropriated lands, and to cause the same to be surveyed and patented, and alleges a breach, that defendant did not cause lands by him located on the warrant, to be surveyed and patented; but at the trial, plaintiff proves a contract whereby defendant did not undertake to cause the lands to be patented as well as located and surveyed: on demurrer to evidence, HELD, the evidence does not prove the contract laid in the declaration, and plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

Same—Limitation—Case at Bar.—Contract to locate a treasury warrant on lands in Kentucky, is made in August 1783; and it appeared, the breach, if any, must have occurred before the erection of Kentucky into a separate state: HELD, the act of limitations of Virginia began to run from the time of the breach, and was, therefore, a bar to an action on the contract brought in 1816.

Assumpsit by M'Alexander against Montgomery, in the circuit court of Nelson. The action was brought in 1816, but (for some cause not explained in the record) remained pending and undecided there, for some ten or twelve years.

The declaration alleged, in substance, that, on the — day of — in the year —, M'Alexander delivered to Montgomery a treasury land warrant of Virginia, dated the 1st April 1782, for 4612 acres of land, and agreed with Montgomery, that if he would locate the warrant on waste and unappropriated lands, and cause the same to be surveyed and patented, he M'Alexander would give Montgomery one half of the lands so located, surveyed and patented, under the warrant, and pay him all the costs of surveying the same; in consideration whereof, Montgomery assumed upon himself, and promised and agreed to and with M'Alexander, that he would well and truly locate the warrant on waste and unappropriated lands on the western waters in Virginia, so soon as such location could conveniently be made, and would cause the lands so located, to be surveyed and patented for M'Alexander, within reasonable and legal time after such locations—and that at the time of the contract, there were waste and unappropriated lands on the western

62 waters in Virginia, of great value, subject to *be located, surveyed and patented, under the warrant, and which might have been located within a reasonable time, in pursuance of Montgomery's promise and agreement, if he had used reasonable and due diligence in making such locations—Yet Montgomery had evaded, failed and refused to perform his promise and agreement, in this, 1. that he had altogether neglected and failed to locate part of the warrant; 2. that he had negligently located other part thereof on lands not then waste and unappropriated, so that the title thereof was wholly lost to M'Alexander; 3. that, having located other part of the warrant on waste and unappropriated lands of great value, he had neglected, failed and refused to have the lands so located, surveyed and patented, so that the title of the same was wholly lost to M'Alexander; 4. that having located other part of the said warrant on other waste and unappropriated lands, he neglected, failed and refused, to have a part of these lands so by him located, surveyed and patented for M'Alexander, so that the title to this part of the lands so located was wholly lost to him; and 5. that Montgomery, having located other part of the warrant on waste and unappropriated lands, instead of having these lands surveyed and patented for M'Alexander, had them surveyed and patented for himself, and appropriated them to his own use. By reason whereof &c.

Montgomery pleaded, 1. the general issue, and 2. the statute of limitations. To the second plea, M'Alexander replied, that, at the time his cause of action accrued, Montgomery was out of Virginia, and in Kentucky, and so continued out of Virginia from the time when the action accrued, till the year 1815, within five years before the commencement of the action. Montgomery put in a rejoinder to this replication,—that he was, at the time the cause of action accrued, and long before had been, a resident of Kentucky, which was then a part of Virginia, and had always thenceforth continued to reside in Kentucky, where the contract in the declaration set forth, was, by agreement 63 *between the parties, to have been executed, until the year 1815, when he came to Virginia on a visit; and that there were, at the time the action accrued, and thenceforth until the year 1792, courts of justice in Kentucky established by authority of Virginia, and courts of justice there since 1792, established by authority of Kentucky and of the U. States, of competent jurisdiction, at all times, to hear and determine the claim alleged in the declaration. Then, there was a sur-rejoinder,—that, at the time when the action accrued, that part of the territory of Virginia in which Montgomery then resided, namely, the district of Kentucky, had been erected into a separate state, and was nowise subject to the jurisdiction of Virginia, and so Montgomery was, at the time the action accrued, out of the state of Virginia, namely, in the state of Kentucky, and thenceforth continually kept himself in Kentucky, out of the limits and jurisdiction of Virginia, so that the action could not be brought against him, until the year 1815 within five years next before the action was commenced. And a general rebutter being put into the sur-rejoinder, an issue was thereupon made up.

Upon the first trial of the issues, the jury found a verdict for M'Alexander for 1584 dollars damages. But the court, on the motion of Montgomery's counsel, set aside the verdict, on the ground that it was contrary to evidence, and directed a new trial; and M'Alexander filed a bill of exceptions to this opinion of the court, detailing at large all the evidence which had been given at the trial. The evidence set forth in this bill of exceptions, was the same with that set forth in the demurrer to the evidence, which Montgomery filed upon the second trial, and in which the court compelled M'Alexander to join.

Without detailing the evidence set forth in the demurrer to evidence filed upon the second trial, of which there was a good deal, and that very vague and very confused, it is sufficient to state, that it appeared—1st. That the treasury land warrant 64 by *M'Alexander to Montgomery, and the contract between them in relation thereto was made, in August 1782.

2ndly. That the evidence of the contract, and of its terms, consisted, 1. Of a bond executed by M'Alexander to Montgomery, dated the 3rd August 1782, in the penalty of £2000. with a condition in these words —“The condition of this obligation is such, that whereas the above bound A. M'Alexander hath given W. Montgomery, treasury land warrants amounting to five thousand seven hundred and some odd acres, to be located on the western waters; now, if the said M'Alexander, his heirs &c. make or cause to be made unto W. Montgomery a good and sufficient right in fee simple to the one half of all the lands he locates for him, and pay all costs for surveying, then this obligation to be void &c.” 2. A receipt for a land warrant given by Montgomery to M'Alexander, in these words—“August 4th 1782, Received of A. M'Alexander one land warrant containing 4612 acres of land, likewise two silver dollars; by me, W. Montgomery.” 3. The evidence of a witness, proving that Montgomery informed the witness, that he had been employed by M'Alexander to locate some land for him in Kentucky, and had located part thereof, but that owing to his want of knowledge of a sufficient quantity of vacant lands, he had been induced to employ the witness's father to locate a part of the lands, agreeing that he should make the locations on the same terms, on which he, Montgomery, was to have made them; and he stated the terms of the location to be one half of the land, M'Alexander defraying all expenses incident to surveying and patenting.”—And 4. proof that Montgomery, acting under the contract did locate, and cause to be surveyed and patented for M'Alexander, about 1300 acres of land, which was afterwards equally divided between them; and Montgomery charged M'Alexander with the expenses of locating, surveying and patenting, this land, and of making the division thereof between them, and M'Alexander paid him the amount of those expenses.

65 *3rdly. There was evidence, that there were waste and unappropriated lands in Kentucky, in 1782, subject to location under the land warrant, on which the quantity mentioned in the warrant might have been located; and that, besides the 1300 acres which Montgomery located, and had surveyed and patented, as above mentioned, he made an entry for 3312 acres on Green river, of which however only 1728 acres could be surveyed, because there was no more vacant land there, subject to be surveyed under the entry; and of the 1728 acres, which were surveyed, the greater part was included in prior and conflicting entries and surveys.

4thly. There was evidence, that though M'Alexander paid Montgomery the expenses of locating, surveying and patenting, the 1300 acres above mentioned, after the same had been patented, yet he refused to advance money for defraying the expenses of surveys; saying, that though he was bound to defray such expenses after the surveys and patents were completed, yet he was not bound to advance money for the purpose before he got the title for the lands.

5thly. There was evidence, that after January 1783, there were not to be found in Kentucky, any large quantities of good lands lying in one body, subject to location under the warrant; and that though a Kentucky surveyor located 10,000 acres of land after November 1783, yet it was of such inferior quality, that he sold parcels thereof for two dollars per hundred acres.

And 6thly. There was evidence, that Montgomery resided in Kentucky at the date of the contract, in August 1782, and there continued until the year 1815, when he came to Virginia on a visit to his friends; and during his stay here, this action was brought.

The jury, upon the second trial, found a verdict for the plaintiff M'Alexander, for 1584 dollars damages, subject to the opinion of the court upon the demurrer to evidence. But the court held, that the law upon the demurrer, was for the defendant Montgomery, and gave judgment for him; from which M'Alexander appealed to this court.

66 *Johnson for the appellant; no counsel for the appellee.

TUCKER, P. The declaration sets out a contract on the part of Montgomery, to locate a land warrant on waste and unappropriated lands, and have the same surveyed and patented; and one of the breaches assigned is, that after locating, he failed to have the lands conveyed and patented. The jury has found a verdict for 1584 dollars upon this declaration, and, for aught we know, for the breach of failing to patent what may have been located and surveyed; which renders the patenting a most essential ingredient in the case, even if we could disregard the general principle, that in an action upon a special contract, the contract must be proved as laid.

To the declaration, the general issue and the statute of limitations were pleaded; and upon the last plea, the parties came to issue, at last, upon this question,—Whether at the time the action accrued, the district of Kentucky had been erected in an independent and separate state, no wise subject to the jurisdiction of any court of Virginia? Upon these issues, I am clearly of opinion, that the verdict in the first trial, and the judgment on the demurrer to evidence in the last, should have been given for the defendant, Montgomery. The contract proved did not bind him to have the land patented, as well as located and surveyed; nor is there evidence from which any such term in the contract could fairly have been inferred. The statement which he made to one of the witnesses, of the terms of the contract,—that he was to have one half of the land, and M'Alexander to defray all the expenses incident to surveying and patenting, refers to the terms of his compensation, which was to be one half, without any charges to him for surveying or patenting. For, in speaking of what he had been employed to do, he says nothing of patenting, but only that he was to locate. I think, therefore, on this point, the judgment was right.

67 *On the second issue, I think there can be no question, that the judgment should have been given for Montgomery. He received the warrant in 1782. The whole current of testimony goes to shew that if there was any negligence,—any breach of the contract, it must have occurred long before the year 1789, when the first act was passed for the erection of Kentucky into a state; and it was not until after November 1791, that the jurisdiction of the courts of Virginia was determined. It was not necessary, that the breach should have been five years anterior to the separation: one day before would have sufficed, for then the statute would have commenced running. Now, if the defendant be chargeable on the ground of negligence, I think it cannot be denied, that he was as guilty at the expiration of nine years from the date of the contract, as at this moment. That would have brought the breach down to August 1791; and from that date the statute would have been a bar. Indeed, if there was a cause of action, it probably accrued as early as 1784. One witness deposed, that good lands, in large quantities, in one place, could not have been procured after January 1783. Another, who was a Kentucky surveyor, after November 1783, made an entry for 10,000 acres, but of such inferior quality, that he sold part of it for only two dollars per hundred acres. Afterwards, it seems probable, more could not be obtained. Now, the statute runs from the time the negligence occurred; as, in the case of an attorney, it is not the loss of the debt which gives the action, but the unskilfulness or negligence whereby it was ultimately lost, and the statute runs from the date of that negligence; Wilcox v. Plummer's ex'ors, 4 Peters 172; Short v. M'Carthy, 3 Barn. & Ald. 626; 5 Eng. C. L. R. 403; Howell v. Young, 5 Barn. & Cres. 259; 11 Eng. C. L. R. 219. The application of the statute, in the present instance, can be no subject of regret. The transaction is very stale; and the evidence in support of the action, very vague and inconclusive. The question how far a party is to be required, relictis omnibus negotiis, to proceed to the 68 fulfilment of one *of these contracts, is not very easily answered; and the presumption that the locator, who had an equal interest, and no expenses to incur, would not grossly neglect the concern, is very strong. Add to this, that Montgomery did not abscond from our jurisdiction, but was cut off from it by an act of sovereignty, and that M'Alexander might, at any time within the last forty years, have asserted his claim in Kentucky, where the question of due diligence would have been settled by a Kentucky jury, surrounded by a cloud of Kentucky witnesses, who best knew what in those times did, and what did not, amount to due diligence in such cases. We have little reason to fear, that the rigorous principles of law will work injustice between the parties in this controversy.

The judgment is to be affirmed.

Mortgage of Term of Years—Liability of Mortgagee to Perform Covenants.—A mortgagee of a term of years, though he never in fact enters into possession, is, like any other purchaser, bound to perform the covenants in the lease, after the date of the mortgage.

Term of Years—Assignee—Liability for Breach of Covenants.—In general, the assignee of a term of years is not liable for breaches of the covenants in the lease before the assignment—but, if the assignee by express covenant with his assignor, bind himself to pay the rents, and perform all the covenants in the lease contained, and required to be done and performed on the part of the lessee,—such a covenant not only binds the assignee to fulfil the covenants during his own time, but makes him liable for breaches before his time.

The corporation of the Borough of Norfolk, being the proprietor of a parcel of land on Town Point in that borough, had the same laid off in lots in 1792; and by indenture, made in May in that year, leased two adjoining parcels thereof to Nicholas Booze, for a term of ninety-nine years, renewable forever, at a certain stipulated ground rent for each parcel respectively, payable yearly. And Booze covenanted for himself, his executors, administrators and assigns,—that he and they would pay the ground rents to the borough yearly, and would also pay the public and all other taxes—and that he and they would, within three years from the date of the lease, improve the premises in such manner that the yearly ground rents should be thereby sufficiently secured; and, on failure so to improve the premises within the three years, would give bond with sufficient surety to the borough for the further payment of the yearly ground rents *and taxes, until improvements should be made sufficient to secure the same; and, in case such security should not be given within three months from the expiration of the three years, the borough might lease out the premises again, at auction, for the best price to be had, and Booze, his executors, administrators and assigns, would make good any deficiency in the rents obtained, and any difference between the first and last prices; the borough, on its part, accounting for and paying to him, his executors, administrators and assigns, any overplus that should be obtained on the re-letting of the premises—and further, if the ground rent and taxes should be in arrear and unpaid for three years, at any time during the term, in such case also, the borough might in like manner lease out the premises again, with all the improvements thereon, for the residue of the term, on the best terms to be had; and Booze, his executors, administrators and assigns, would make good to the borough any deficiency between the first and last prices, together with the arrears of rents and taxes—And the borough covenanted on its part, that in case the improvements should be made as stipulated by the lessee, and the ground rents and taxes punctually paid, so as not to leave three years rents and taxes in arrear at any one time during the term, then, after the expiration of the term, it would renew the lease for a further term of ninety-nine years, and so on forever.

Booze proceeded to put improvements on the premises, according to his covenant in the lease. He sold the term in 1796; and, after passing through several hands, it was purchased by Henry M'Dowell in September 1815, who, not long afterwards, effected insurance of the buildings on the premises, with The Mutual Assurance Society against fire &c.

At the time the term was assigned to M'Dowell, the ground rents for above five years, that is, from the 10th May 1810 were in arrear, and neither those arrears, nor any of the rents accruing in M'Dowell's time, after the assignment of the term to him, were ever paid, or (it seemed)

71 *demanded, though there was always, while the buildings remained, sufficient distress on the premises for the rents.

By deed of trust, dated the 20th March 1817, and duly recorded,—reciting that M'Dowell was indebted to the Bank of Virginia at Norfolk, in the sum of 4648 dollars by note dated the 18th of the same month, payable sixty days after date, indorsed by T. Powell for his accommodation, which note it was contemplated should be renewed from time to time till the 1st March 1818, and that it was the intent of the deed to secure the payment of the debt at that time, or whatever sum should then be due to the bank,—M'Dowell conveyed the residue of the term of ninety-nine years held under the lease from the borough of Norfolk, to trustees,—“they, the trustees, or their assigns, paying the ground rents, and performing all the stipulations and covenants in the original deed [of lease] of the said land contained, and required to be done and performed on the part of the lessee:” upon trust, that if M'Dowell should fail to pay the bank the contents of the note then existing, or of such other note as might afterwards, from time to time until the period before mentioned, be given in lieu or renewal thereof, then the trustees, whenever requested by the bank, might enter on the premises, sell them at auction, and pay the debt out of the proceeds; and the trustees covenanted with M'Dowell, that they would execute and discharge the several trusts stipulated to be performed on their part.

M'Dowell remained in possession of the premises. And the bank not only renewed the loan to him, and he the note for the same to the bank, from time to time until the 1st March 1818, but continued to do so, upon the credit of the same indorser Powell, until July 1819, when Powell failed, and the note was protested for non-payment; but in October following, it was again renewed, with the same indorser, until May 1822, when, M'Dowell having died, it was again protested for non-payment. The debt then due on the note to the bank was 4548 dollars.

72 *Meantime, by another deed of trust, dated the 7th October 1818, and duly recorded, M'Dowell conveyed his equity of redemption in the premises to trustees, in trust to secure a similar debt, to a large amount, contracted by him and due to the Farmers Bank at Norfolk.

The buildings on the premises were consumed by fire, on the 30th April 1822; and the amount of loss, for which the Mutual Assurance Society admitted itself to be liable on the policy of assurance, was 6262 dollars, with interest from the 6th January 1823, when the claim for the loss became demandable at the office of the society.

M'Dowell died about the time the fire happened; and the hustings court of Norfolk committed administration of his estate to the sergeant of the borough. The estate proved utterly insolvent.

In August 1822, the trustees for the Bank of Virginia offered the residue of the term of ninety-nine years in the premises, for sale at auction, under the deed of trust of the 20th March 1817, but no bid was made for it. It appeared, indeed, that, owing to the abandonment of that part of the town, the property, now destitute of improvements, was almost if not quite valueless, and certainly unsaleable.

The Farmers Bank exhibited a bill in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, against the Mutual Assurance Society, the sergeant of Norfolk administrator of M'Dowell, the Bank of Virginia and its trustees, and the Borough of Norfolk,—setting forth the facts above stated; and that conflicting claims to the money due on the policy of assurance, were set up by the Farmers Bank and the several defendants respectively, and the society refused to pay the money till those conflicting claims were adjusted; claiming satisfaction, out of this fund, of the debt due the Farmers Bank, in preference both to the Bank of Virginia and the Borough of Norfolk; and praying, accordingly, that the society should be directed to pay the Farmers Bank the amount of its claim, and that the premises should be sold, 73 *and the proceeds applied as justice required, under the circumstances of the case; and general relief.

The Mutual Assurance Society admitted the amount of the loss for which it was liable on the policy of assurance, and expressed its readiness to pay the money to the party or parties to whom the court should decree it. The society was a mere stake-holder.

The administrator of M'Dowell claimed this money, as assets of his intestate, applicable to his debts in due course of administration.

The Bank of Virginia, in its answer, insisted, that it had a specific lien on the fund, and was entitled to satisfaction of it in preference to the Farmers Bank; but as to the question of preference between it and the Borough of Norfolk, the answer was silent.

The Borough of Norfolk answered, and insisted, that the fund should be applied to the ground rents which had accrued and were in arrear since the 10th May 1810 (amounting to 1575 dollars in arrear in August 1821), in preference to the claims of both the banks. And it also insisted, that by the failure of the lessee or his assigns to perform the covenant for payment of the ground rents, so as to let them be in arrear for three years, the term was ipso facto forfeited, and the premises reverted in the lessor.

The chancellor declared, that the Borough of Norfolk was entitled to priority over both the banks, and that the Bank of Virginia was entitled to priority over the Farmers Bank; and, therefore, decreed, that the Mutual Assurance Society should pay the borough, the sum of 2080 dollars (being the aggregate of the principal of the rents claimed, and interest thereon from August 1821 when the last of those rents accrued, to the date of the decree) with interest on 1575 dollars, part thereof being principal, from the date of the decree, and the costs of the borough in this suit; and then pay the residue of the money due on the policy of assurance, to the Bank of Virginia, in part satisfaction 74 *of its claim, it being not enough to discharge the whole.

From this decree the Farmers Bank appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Nicholas for the Farmers Bank, Leigh for the Bank of Virginia, and Johnson for the Borough of Norfolk: there was no counsel for M'Dowell's administrator.

I. As to the claim to the fund in question, set up by M'Dowell's administrator in the court of chancery, it was clearly shewn,—by reference to the 8th section of the original act of incorporation of the Mutual Assurance Society (an abstract of which may be seen in the report of the M. A. Society v. Stone & others, 3 Leigh 219.) and by the rules and regulations of the society, to which all the assured are parties,—that when property there assured, is mortgaged, the policy of assurance is ipso facto assigned to the mortgagee.

II. Nicholas argued for the Farmers Bank, that it had a right to have satisfaction out of the money due on the policy of assurance, in preference to the Bank of Virginia; because M'Dowell's notes, by the express provisions of the deed of trust of the 20th March 1817, under which the latter claimed, were only to be renewed until the 1st March 1818, and the security provided by the deed was only a security for the contents of the note existing at the date of the deed, or of such other note as might, afterwards, from time to time until the period before mentioned (namely, the 1st March 1818), be given in lieu or renewal.

thereof. But the Bank of Virginia continued the accommodation to M'Dowell upon notes renewed from time to time (with an interval of three months in 1819) until May 1822. Therefore, the note protested at the last date, was not a note whereof the contents were secured by the deed of trust under which the Bank of Virginia claimed; it was a wholly different note, the contents of which were not secured or intended to be secured by the deed, but on the contrary distinctly excluded from the security thereby provided.

75 *Leigh, for the Bank of Virginia, answered, that the original note given for the debt due that bank, was not the debt, but only the evidence of the debt and personal security for it, and the notes renewed from time to time, were only renewed evidences of the debt and of the personal security; the debt itself, of which it was the purpose of the deed of trust to provide collateral security, remaining throughout one and the same. The original debt remained unpaid, acknowledgedly, till the 1st March 1818. The effect of the renewal of the notes for it from time to time afterwards, was to give a further credit for it, beyond what was at first intended; but, notwithstanding the extension of credit, the same original debt, which was due the 1st March 1818, remained still unpaid. The giving such further credit nowise changed the debt, or impaired the collateral security for it: the rights of the Bank of Virginia were exactly the same, in this regard, as if it had allowed the further credit, without a renewal of the notes. The Farmers Bank was the assignee of M'Dowell's equity of redemption, and so entitled to redeem upon the terms on which he would have been; and, surely, M'Dowell could not have been heard to object to the lien of the Bank of Virginia, that it had renewed his notes for a longer time than it had stipulated to renew them.

III. Leigh said, the chancellor erred in adjusting the question of preference between the Borough of Norfolk and the Bank of Virginia, upon the bill and the pleadings in this cause; for they presented no such question between those parties. The bill, indeed, claimed a priority for the Farmers Bank over both; but the only question it presented, was, whether that bank was entitled to such priority? It nowise concerned the Farmers Bank, which of the defendants was entitled to priority over the other; on this point, therefore, the bill presented no issue. Accordingly, the Bank of Virginia, in its answer, only controverted the priority insisted on by the Farmers Bank over its own claim, and properly avoided to put in issue the question of priority between itself and the borough.

76 *Johnson, for the borough, answered, that the obvious purpose of the bill was to have the rights of all parties, as to priority of satisfaction out of the insurance money, adjusted. The claim of the borough to priority equally affected the interests of both the banks: that claim, therefore, the Farmers Bank contested; it claimed priority over the borough as well as over the Bank of Virginia; and the adjudication of the claim asserted in the bill, necessarily involved the examination, comparison and adjustment of the rights of co-defendants.

IV. Nicholas and Leigh then contended, 1st. That the decree was erroneous in giving preference to the borough over the banks, for satisfaction out of the money due on the policy of assurance. The policy was a personal subject assigned to the banks as collateral security for debt: the borough had no specific lien on the policy, or on the money due upon it: with respect to this fund, the banks were specific incumbrances; the borough a general creditor. There could be no question in equity, between the borough as lessor of the premises and creditor for the rents in arrear, and the banks as assignees of the policy of assurance: the only questions between the borough and the banks grew out of the relation of the borough as lessor, and the banks as assignees, of the term originally leased to Booze, and from him through M'Dowell derived to the banks; and these were questions which could properly be controverted only in an action at law brought by the borough, upon the covenants in the lease. 2ndly. Supposing the first objection unfounded, yet, they said, the decree was erroneous in allowing the claim of the borough, and giving priority of satisfaction, for rents in arrear for which the banks as assignees of the terms were not bound, and which, therefore, were not properly chargeable on this fund. The only breaches of the covenants in the lease, consisted in the non-payment of the ground rents reserved. The amount of about eleven years rents in arrear was claimed by the borough, and allowed by the decree; comprising

77 the rents of about five years, *which accrued before the term was assigned to M'Dowell in September 1815; the rents of about two years following, which accrued before M'Dowell mortgaged the term to the Bank of Virginia; and the rents of about four years, which accrued after that mortgage was executed, but while M'Dowell, not the bank, held the possession. Now, M'Dowell was not bound to pay the rents in arrear, or liable for any breach of covenants, before the assignment of the term to him; nor were the banks bound to pay any rents which accrued before the term was mortgaged to them. For the assignee of a lease could not be held liable for any breaches of covenants before the assignment; he was only liable in respect of his possession, and for breaches during his own time. Walker's case, 3 Co. 23; Grescot v. Green, 1 Salk. 199; Tovey v. Pitcher, Id. 80; Cook v. Harris, 1 Ld. Raym. 368; St. Saviour's church wardens v. Smith, 3 Burr. 1271. Whether the banks were bound for the rents accrued during the four last years, which elapsed after the execution of the first mortgage of the term, but while M'Dowell the mortgagor remained in possession, was a doubtful point. In Pilkington v. Shaller, 2 Vern. 374, it was held, that the mortgagee of a term, though never in possession, was bound for breaches of the covenants in the lease after the execution of the mortgage; but the contrary was adjudged by lord Mansfield and the whole court of King's Bench, in Eaton v. Jaques, 2 Doug. 455. And then, in Williams v. Bosanquet, 1 Brod. & Bing. 238, 5 Eng. C. L. R. 72, it was decided, that by the mortgage of a lease, the whole interest passed to the mortgagee, and he became liable on the covenant for rent, though he never entered into the possession; and it was said to have been the opinion of a great majority of all the judges, that Eaton v. Jaques was not to be considered as having been rightly decided. This court would decide, between these conflicting authorities, which was the better opinion. But 3rdly, they insisted, that, whatever rents in arrear the borough was entitled to, the decree was erroneous 78 in allowing interest on *those rents, even from the time the last of the rents in arrear accrued; for it appeared that, during the time when those rents were accruing,—until, indeed, the buildings on the premises were destroyed by fire in April 1822,—there was always sufficient distress on the premises. Cooke v. Wise, 3 Hen. & Munf. 463; Newton v. Wilson, Id. 470; Dow v. Adams, 5 Munf. 21; Michie v. Wood, 5 Rand. 571.

Johnson answered, 1st. That as the lease from the borough to Boozé was a building lease, and the lessee covenanted, for himself and his assigns, to improve the premises within three years, in such manner that the yearly ground rents should be thereby sufficiently secured, and that in case the rents should be in arrear at any time during the term for three years, the borough might lease out the premises again, with all the improvements thereon, for the residue of the term,—it was, therefore, plain, that the lessor had a specific lien on the buildings erected on the premises in pursuance of the covenants, for the ground rents; and, in equity, after the destruction of the buildings by fire, the money due on the policy of assurance thereof, must be regarded as standing in the place of the buildings, and subject to the same specific lien for the security of the rents to the lessor. The assignees of the lease, too, were expressly bound for the performance of all the covenants, and took subject to all the rights of the lessor, and subject especially to the specific lien on the buildings to secure the rents. 2ndly. He went into an examination of the general doctrine, that an assignee of a lease is not liable for breaches of covenants before the assignment, in order to shew that it was inapplicable to this case. Here, there was an express covenant, that in case the rents should be in arrear at any time for three years, not only the lessor might lease the premises again for the residue of the term, and that the lessee and his assigns should make good any deficiency, but that he and they should make good the arrears of rents. Therefore, the assignees of the term were expressly bound to pay all arrears of rent, whether they accrued before or after 79 the assignment. *And he considered it now settled, by the case of Williams v. Bosanquet, that there is no difference, in respect of liability to the lessor for breaches of covenants in a lease, between a mortgagee and any other purchaser of the whole term; and that the mortgagee is bound, like any other purchaser, though he never enters into the possession. But here again, he said, there was an express contract which obviated all doubt: it was expressly covenanted in the deed of trust executed by M'Dowell to secure the debt to the Bank of Virginia, that the trustees and their assigns should pay the ground rents, and perform all the covenants in the original lease contained, to be performed on the part of the lessee. 3rdly. As to interest on the rents, he said, the decisions of this court on the point, amounted in effect to this,—that interest on rents should be allowed or not according to circumstances. And under the circumstances of this case, he said, the decree was right as to the allowance of interest: or, at least, interest should be allowed from the time the buildings were destroyed, since, thenceforth, a distress would have been unavailing, and M'Dowell being dead insolvent, the borough had no means of recovering the rents: or, at any rate, interest should be allowed from the 6th January 1823, when the insurance money fell due; for that money ought to have been then immediately applied to the payment of the rents; and as it had not been so applied, and had been yielding interest all the time, that interest justly belonged to those to whom the principal ought to have been paid. Lastly, he himself objected to the decree, that it had not given to the borough what it had a right to insist upon: that the chancellor ought, undoubtedly, to have made provision out of the fund at his disposal, for the payment of all rents to accrue in future during the residue of the term; and more, he ought to have made provision to secure the future rents, in the manner in which it was intended and covenanted in the original lease that they should be secured; that is, by putting such new buildings on the premises as would suffice to secure them. He insisted, 80 that the intent *and effect of the covenant for improving, was, not only that buildings should be erected on the premises, but that they should be erected and kept up during the whole term. Therefore, he contended, the whole insurance money should have been appropriated to the erection of new buildings in lieu of those which had been destroyed by fire.

Leigh replied, that the covenant for improving, bound the lessee and his assigns to make improvements once only; for the improvements which the lessee covenanted to make, were to be made within three years from the date of the lease, and there was no stipulation that they should be kept up. The claim to have the insurance money appropriated to the erection of new buildings was wholly untenable. And unless that proposition could be established, he thought it would be impossible to give the borough a specific lien on the insurance money for any purpose. It could not be inferred from the covenant, that if the rents should remain in arrear for three years, the borough might sell the premises with the improvements, and the lessee and his assigns should make good the deficiency, together with the arrears of rents: the borough had not sold, or attempted to sell, the premises, and so the casus foederis had not occurred. As to that covenant, he also insisted, that, in just legal construction, its obligation on the assignees of the lease, was, that they should make good the arrears of rent accruing in their own time. So, too, as to the covenant in the mortgage to the Bank of Virginia, it ought to be taken prospectively, that the bank should perform the covenants in the lease after the assignment of the term to it, as M'Dowell was bound to perform them before the assignment. In fine, he said, the borough, if it had any specific lien on the insurance money for any purpose, was only entitled, at the utmost, to have provision made out of it for the payment of the ground rents which should accrue during the residue of the term yet to come; and (having regard to the present state of the premises, which were now unsaleable and abandoned) he suggested, that this might best be accomplished, by considering 81 the "annual ground rents, as an annuity to the same amount, for as many years as yet remained unexpired of the term; and decreeing to the borough, out of the insurance money, a sum equal to the present value of such an annuity.

TUCKER, P. I do not concur in the opinion intimated at the bar, that the present state of the pleadings in this case, neither calls for, nor permits, a decision upon the rights of the parties before us in all their different relations. The Farmers Bank being the junior incumbrancer in point of time, and therefore prima facie inferior to the prior claimants, having filed its bill praying for the satisfaction of its demand out of the insurance fund, we cannot possibly decide upon its claim, without comparing the conflicting claims in the first place; and if, as I apprehend, that bank must yield in point of right to the Bank of Virginia, it then becomes all important to ascertain the validity and precise extent of the rights of the Borough of Norfolk, upon which will depend the amount that can be decreed to the Farmers Bank out of the fund in question. If the borough has rights in this matter; if those rights have priority; if they entitle it not only to back rents but to interest, and to a demand of the investment of a principal sum so as to secure an interest adequate to the payment of the rent during the residue of the term; then it would seem, indeed, very probable that the struggle of the Farmers Bank has been for nothing; for nothing will remain to be paid to it. Hence it becomes absolutely necessary to look at the demands and rights of the borough in every aspect, before we scatter the funds out of which the counsel have supposed that it has a title to be secured in the payment of the rents reserved on its lease. I shall therefore proceed first to examine the title of the borough to the funds in court.

The borough being the proprietor of land at the Town Point, proceeded in 1792 to have it divided into lots, and to lease the lots for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, reserving a ground rent payable 82 annually by the lessee and "his assigns. The object on the part both of lessors and lessees, was to build upon the property, since otherwise it would be useless to the latter, and to the former the payment of the rents would be precarious. Among other lessees was one Booze, under whom M'Dowell, the debtor of the banks, claimed to hold. By the lease to Booze, the borough reserved a certain rent on each of the lots leased to him: and Booze, for himself, his executors, administrators and assigns covenanted, 1. to pay the rent annually: 2. to pay the taxes: 3. to improve the land in the space of three years, in such manner as that the yearly rent should be thereby sufficiently secured; and 4. on failure thereof, at the expiration of three years, that he, his executors, administrators and assigns, would tender bond with sufficient security for the further [future, probably] payment of the yearly ground rents and taxes, until improvements should be made sufficient to secure the same; or 5. if such security should not be given within three months from the expiration of the three years, the borough might lease out the premises again, for the best price to be had, and the lessee, his executors, administrators and assigns would make good the deficiency, or be entitled to the surplus if the new lease brought a higher rent: and 6. if the rent should be in arrear at any one time for more than three years, there was a like privilege to re-let, and a like obligation on the lessee, his executors, administrators and assigns, to make good the deficiency, together with the arrears of rent. Such were the terms of this lease, which Booze parted with, it seems, in 1796, and which M'Dowell did not acquire until September 1815; from which time he became liable for the accruing rents. Previously, it seems, the covenant as to the erection of buildings had been complied with; but, if the account filed by the mayor of Norfolk be correct, there were, at that time, more than five years rent in arrear and unpaid; and, of course, two years before his purchase, it had been lawful for the borough to have leased out the premises again to some other tenant.

83 *This provision, however, had not the effect of avoiding the lease, ipso facto, without some act on the part of the lessor. The answer of the borough, in this regard, misinterprets the lease. A lease for years, indeed, may be avoided without entry, if it be so provided, though a lease for life cannot. But a prudent landlord will so provide, as to give him an option to avoid the lease or not; for if it be an advantageous lease, it may be better for him to waive the right to enter and be reinvested with his old estate. So, in this case; the draftsman has secured the power to re-let; but it was a power which might be waived or not at the lessor's pleasure. That pleasure has never been exerted to defeat this lease, although it may at any moment be exerted. But it is obviously not their interest; for it seems the time has gone by when this property could be leased for a cent, with provisions like those of this lease.

M'Dowell having purchased the property, proceeded to insure it. He then, in 1817, executed a deed of trust of it to secure the Bank of Virginia, and another in October 1818, to secure another debt to the Farmers Bank. In 1822, the houses were burned down; and about the same time he died. The insurance company are ready to pay the insurance money; and four claimants are competitors for it,—M'Dowell's administrator (whose claim however is not urged), the Borough of Norfolk, the Bank of Virginia, and the Farmers Bank.

In the examination of the rights of the Borough of Norfolk, I shall take it for granted, for the present, that the Bank of Virginia, though a mere mortgagee, is to be looked upon as an assignee of the term; for, however the general doctrine may be on the subject, if the bank takes the benefit of the lease, it must assume its burdens, to the same extent as if it was assignee of the term out and out. But as such, it is very manifest, that, unless there is something in the lease which varies its case from that of ordinary assignees, the bank is not chargeable with any breach which occurred anterior to its title. For an 84 assignee is only liable *in respect of his possession; he bears the burden while he enjoys the benefit, and no longer. In particular, the assignee cannot be liable for rent in arrear before his title accrued. Rents due and in arrear are considered as debts severed from the realty sub modo. Moreover, it is inconsistent with any principle of the law, that one man should bind any other than his heir or his executor; and they are only bound in respect to the assets passing to them. He cannot bind his assignee; but the assignee, by the acceptance of the estate, binds himself to fulfil the obligations of the contract devolving upon him during his occupation. By law he is bound for nothing more. In the present case, however, a doubt hangs over this question from the peculiarity of the covenants. The difficulty is to say, whether the breach has occurred, or may be made to occur, in the time of the bank or not. The breach in non-payment of the rents, certainly occurred even before M'Dowell's time; for when he purchased in September 1815, there were five years rent in arrear. Now, I have much doubt, whether M'Dowell, or those who come after him, could have been bound for the rents in arrear, or to give security for deficiency in price, for rents to become due after their possession and estate might have been passed away. Boozee certainly and his estate are bound, that his assigns shall do what is provided; for he is bound for the performance of all his express covenants, during the continuance of the whole lease, notwithstanding the assignments; and this, although the lessor accepted the assignee as tenant: But after assignment and acceptance, he is not liable on covenants merely implied by law. 2 Bac. Abr. Covenant, E. 4, p. 72, and the cases there cited.

The next question under these covenants, is, Whether the covenant to improve is satisfied by the erection of the first buildings, or is a continuing covenant, binding the parties to renew the buildings from time to time, in case they should be destroyed by flood or fire? The language of the covenant affords no ground for this latter construction. If an action for breach of the

85 covenant were brought, the plea *of covenants performed would be sustained, by proving that the party has once improved or built according to his engagement. A different construction cannot be given to the lease in a court of equity. It is the misfortune of the landlord, indeed, that by the burning of the houses, the lot is reduced to its originally naked condition, and still more that the change of times has reduced its value to nothing. But the conflagration fell more heavily upon the tenant than upon the landlord, and if the holders are bound for prospective rents forever, upon these valueless lots, the change of times, which has desolated that part of the town, will prove ruinous to them. These are losses which the parties must be content to bear in proportion to their respective interests. The tenant must put up with the loss of his house, and the landlord with the loss of his rents. Neither can throw his share of the loss upon the shoulders of the other. It is said, that the houses were insured, and that the insurance money stands in the place of the buildings. And what is the sequitur? Is it that the rents are to be paid out of it, or that a court of equity may compel the rebuilding out of this fund, because of its supposed relation to or substitution for the buildings which have been destroyed? I think not. Whatever the supposed relation may be between the houses and the insurance money, the landlord has no sort of equity in this case to demand its application to the payment of arrears, or to rebuilding the premises. The tenant was neither bound to rebuild, nor to insure. Had he been so bound, the case would have been otherwise. As it is, the insurance money is the price paid by the insurance society for the consideration of the premiums and quotas advanced by M'Dowell out of his own pocket. Upon what pretext could the borough claim the benefit of this covenant purchased by M'Dowell's funds for his own benefit, if he was not bound to purchase it for their benefit? If they had bound him to insure, or had borne the charges of insurance in proportion to their interest, the case would have been widely different. As

86 they did not, it would be iniquity instead *of equity, to take from him what has been acquired by his own advances.

If the case, then, stood solely upon the original lease, and there was nothing in the deed of trust to the bank, which could enure to the benefit of the borough, I should be clearly of opinion that the borough had no rights whatever in relation to this fund. But that deed, I conceive, changes the whole aspect of the case, and would have rendered unnecessary an investigation of the questions I have been considering, but that the earnest discussion of them at the bar, forbade that they should be passed over in silence.

What, then, were the rights and obligations of the Bank of Virginia? By the operation of the deed of trust, the bank became assignee of M'Dowell of the lease; for it seems to be now settled, that when a party takes an assignment of lease by way of mortgage, the whole interest passes to him, and he becomes liable on the covenant for payment of rent, though he had never occupied or become possessed in fact: Eaton v. Jaques, which had determined otherwise, is now considered as not rightly decided; Williams v. Bosanquet, 1 Brod. & Bing. 238. This case is certainly in strict analogy to the doctrines of courts of law, which look upon a mortgage as the conveyance of the title, and not as a mere security for money. And as they also consider the mortgagor as tenant at will only of the mortgagee, the mortgagee must be the tenant for years, unless the estate for years is gone by the assignment, which cannot be. In this case, moreover, the Bank of Virginia is before the court, claiming the benefit of this lease, and demanding to be paid its debt out of funds to which it could have no title except as assignee of the lease; and if they take the benefit, they must be content to bear the burden. But this is not all. When M'Dowell encumbered this property to the Bank of Virginia, it was a valuable tenement. Its insurance amounted to 7000 dollars. M'Dowell was aware, that by the terms of the lease under which he held, the Borough of Norfolk had a right, if the rent was three 87 years in arrear, to re-let *the tenement upon such terms as they could, and to hold him responsible, moreover, for the back rents accruing in his own time a lease. He, therefore, expressly provides in the deed of trust for the rights of the borough. He assigns the premises to the trustees,—they or their assigns paying the ground rents and performing all the stipulations and covenants in the original deed of lease for the said land contained, and required to be done and performed on the part of the lessee. Is this a covenant? Then the trustees of the bank covenant, that they will perform all that the original lessee was bound to do and perform. Is it a condition? Then they took the estate upon the condition that they should do and perform all that he was bound to do and perform. Is it a trust? Then this deed enures to the Borough of Norfolk, as a security for the payment of the ground rents, and the performance of all the stipulations and covenants in the original lease, required to be done and performed on the part of the lessee. One of these is, that if the rent be behind for three years, the landlord may re-let; and upon re-letting, the lessee bound himself to pay up and make good the deficiency, together with the arrears of rents and taxes. This obligation, then, rests upon the assignees here. The rent is now three years and more in arrear; and in the language of the books, having been due then, and there having been no tender, it has been due and payable every day since; 6 Bac. Abr. 29. The borough may therefore now, at its pleasure enter and re-let. If it do so, it is obvious the property will bring nothing, and the assignees of the term, who have assumed to do and perform what the lessee had bound himself to do, will be bound to pay up and make good the deficiency, together with the arrears of rent. The arrears of rent, and the future payment of the rents stipulated, are thus secured by this deed of trust. The consciences of the trustees for the bank, are as much affected by this part of the undertaking, as by any other. Indeed, from the language of the deed, this is anterior to all others; for provision must be made for the payment 88 of past and future rents, before the bank can take any thing. This may be effected by decreeing the amount of the rents due, and that the Bank of Virginia be permitted to retain a capital sum equivalent to the production of an interest equal to the annual rents, or in some other way,—leaving this matter, however, to be arranged by the court of chancery, upon the principles I have laid down.

With respect to interest on the rents in arrear, the court is of opinion, that no interest whatever should have been allowed.

A few words are now necessary as to the rights of the Bank of Virginia. As assignee of the term, it would have been clearly entitled to the benefit of the policy of insurance, which is a covenant real, running with, and entered into for the purpose of upholding, the estate, even if there had been no provision on this subject in the insurance regulations. These however expressly provide for the case, and that the mortgagee shall be paid out of the insurance money. As against M'Dowell's estate, therefore, there can be no difficulty.

But it is contended for the Farmers Bank, that the lien of the deed of trust of the Bank of Virginia, did not extend to any note renewed after the 1st March 1818. To this it might be a sufficient answer, that it indisputably extended to the note that was due and unpaid on the 1st of March 1818; and, to say the least, it is questionable, whether the new credit ought in equity to be considered as a discharge of the debt. Equity looks to the substance, not to the forms, of things. Equity sees that when a dealer at bank pays off a note by renewal, the debt is the same; the debt remains unpaid, and the credit only is extended. The Farmers Bank, conversant with such transactions, must also have known this. It had full notice of the deed of trust of the Bank of Virginia, and therefore stands, as to this question, precisely in the shoes of M'Dowell. It knew the contents of the deed, and was bound to know the legal operation of it. If it did not know 89 that the note was renewed, *then as the debt was not paid, it knew there was a lien for its amount. Had it inquired, it would have learned, indeed, that there were subsequent renewals; but it would have found also that the debt was not paid; and it was bound to know the legal inference from that fact. It was bound to know, that until it was paid, M'Dowell could not be received to say that the additional indulgence granted by the bank, discharged the lien. Upon what equity could he have demanded a reconveyance of the legal title, before the payment of the debt, which it was conveyed to secure? Upon none. The property would have been bound in his hands, and it is equally bound in the hands of the subsequent incumbrancer, with full notice of the prior lien.

In this opinion of the president, the other judges concurred. And the decree of the court was as follows:

"The court is of opinion, that by the deed of trust executed by H. M'Dowell deceased to the trustees of the Bank of Virginia, that bank became entitled to the benefit of the insurance fund, subject nevertheless to the obligation of discharging the arrears of rent on the leasehold premises, and to the further obligation of paying and discharging all future rents which may accrue during the continuance of the lease; that the rents in arrear should, therefore, not only have been decreed to be paid by the said bank, but provision should have been made for securing the payment of future rents; that this should have been effected, either by decreeing, that the said banks should retain, or should invest, so much of the said fund as would be equivalent to the production of an interest equal to the annual rents, or in such other way as might be deemed most convenient and advisable; and that the decree is, therefore, erroneous in having made no such provision: that, under the circumstances of this case, no interest whatever ought to have been allowed upon the rents in arrear; and that the decree is accordingly erroneous in allowing such interest: that the insurance fund ought to be applied, 1. to the satisfaction of *the rents in arrear and 90 unpaid on the leasehold premises; 2. to making a provision for future rents; 3. to the satisfaction of the debt secured by the deed of trust to the Bank of Virginia; 4. to the satisfaction of the debt secured by the deed of trust to the Farmers Bank; and the residue, if any, ought to be paid over to the administrator of M'Dowell. Therefore, it is decreed &c. that the said decree be reversed and annulled, and that the appellants pay to the appellees, as the parties substantially prevailing, their costs &c. and that the cause be remanded &c."

Same—Same—Same—Same—Statute Abolishing Words of Inheritance.—Quære, how far, in determining what is an estate tail on which the statute for abolishing entails shall operate, the statute which dispenses with the necessity of words of inheritance, in deeds or wills, to give an estate of inheritance, may affect the construction of the grant or devise?

Ejectment, brought by George, William and Ann Bramble in the circuit court of Norfolk, for a parcel of land in that county. The question of title was referred to the decision of the court upon a case agreed; which was thus:

Matthias Christian died in the year 1794, seized in fee of the premises; and, by his will duly made and published in August 1788, after a devise and bequest 91 to his step daughter *Molly Baynes and her husband John Baynes, he devised as follows: "I give to my step daughter Nancy Ashley my house and that part of my plantation on the north side of the road leading to Norfolk borough, to herself and her offspring, if she have any, if not to her half sister Lydia Bramble and her offspring if any, if not to her sister Molly Baynes's offspring, as she pleases to give it: my will is, that, so long as my step daughter Nancy lives a single life, the rent of the house and land on the north side of the road be equally divided between her and my daughter Lydia"—"I give and bequeath to my loving daughter Lydia Bramble and her husband John Bramble, the rest of my real and personal estate, to them during the life of the longest liver of them, and then to their offspring if any by my daughter Lydia, as they shall think best to give it; and in default of such offspring, to Molly Baynes (the wife of John Baynes) and Nancy Ashley's offspring, if they have any, and as they think best to dispose to their offspring; and if they have none, then to the poor of Elizabeth-River parish." In this last devise of the residue of the testator's real estate, to his daughter Lydia and her husband John Bramble, the land in controversy was included.

The testator's daughter Lydia died before her father, namely, in March 1789, leaving two children by her husband John Bramble. The elder of these children was born before, and was living at, the date of the execution of the testator's will, and this was known to him at the time: and both of them survived him, but died in 1795, infants and without issue.

John Bramble survived the testator, and, immediately after his death, entered upon the land in question, under the devise thereof in the testator's will contained, and held the same till his own death in 1814. He never attempted to execute the power of appointment vested in him by the will. He died intestate, leaving three children by a second marriage, his heirs at law, namely, George, William and Nancy Bramble, the lessors of the plaintiff in this ejectment, who claimed the land by descent from their father.

92 *The testator's step daughter Nancy Ashley died in 1798, without issue, and never having had any.

His step daughter Molly Baynes died in 1804, having first duly made and published her will, whereby she devised as follows: "I give all the rest and residue of the lands formerly Matthias Christian's, to be equally divided among all my children." This devise included the lands then held by

*Wills—Estates Tail—Statute.—On this question the principal case is cited in Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh 368: See v. Craigh, 8 Leigh 450, 452: foot-note to Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 78: Tinsley v. Jones, 13 Gratt. 297, 299, and foot-note: Hood v. Haden, 82 Va. 597; 4 Va. Law Reg. 655. See Graham v. Graham, 4 W. Va. 322. See monographic note on "Wills."

John Bramble under the devise to his first wife Lydia and him, in the testator Matthias Christian's will, if the testatrix Mrs. Baynes had power so to dispose of or appoint the same. She left four children, all of whom had been born before the date of the execution of the testator Christian's will, and he was apprised of their existence at the time. Three of them died intestate and without issue, before the year 1810. The other, Patsey Baynes, was the wife of the defendant Billups. She died before this action was brought, leaving issue one daughter by Billups. And Billups claimed, that the remainder of the land in question after John Bramble's death passed to his deceased wife, by force of the executory limitation thereof in the testator Christian's will contained, and of the appointment in Mrs. Baynes's will to her four children, and by descent from the three deceased children of Mrs. Baynes, as to their shares, to their sister Mrs. Billups.

Upon this case agreed, the circuit court held, that the law was for the defendant, and gave him judgment; from which the lessors of the plaintiff appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Johnson for the appellants, and Leigh for the appellee; but it was discussed by the judges yet more fully than at the bar, and all the arguments of the counsel on both sides are stated in their opinions.

CARR, J. The question is, what estate was given by the will of Matthias Christian to his daughter Lydia and her husband John Bramble? Was it an estate for life, with a contingent remainder to such 93 of the offspring as shall be *living at the death of the survivor? or an estate tail, by implication, in the first takers?

It was admitted, and must be admitted, that the word offspring is as much nomen collectivum as issue, embracing the whole line of descendants, of which the most remote is just as much the offspring of the original stock, as the most immediate. Suppose the devise had been to husband and wife for life, and to the longest liver, and then to their issue, and in default of such issue, over; it would hardly have been denied, that, according to the rule in Shelly's case, the word issue must be taken as a word of limitation, and the estate of the parents an estate tail. But it is said, that admitting the general words for default of issue, or offspring, would be taken to mean an indefinite failure of issue, yet there are words superadded in this devise, which tie up the contingency to the death of the tenant for life, shewing the word offspring to be used as a word of purchase; such offspring as should be living at the death of the surviving partner: and the superadded words supposed to have this effect, are the limitation to the offspring, if any by the daughter Lydia, and as they (the parents) should think best to give it. Let us examine, first, the effect of the words, if any by the daughter, and then that of the power of appointment.

"I give to my loving daughter L. B. and her husband J. B. the rest of my real and personal estate, during the life of the longest liver of them, and then to their offspring if any by my daughter L." Do these words shew, that the testator meant, if there be any offspring living at the death of the surviving parent? No adjudged case, no dictum even, has been adduced to prove that such a construction has ever been given to them; neither is that, to my mind the import of the language. The testator was making provision for his daughter and her descendants: in looking forward, it was natural for him to reflect, that his daughter might have no offspring at the time of his death, and none born after, and he would of course direct to whom, in 94 that event, he wished *the property to go; he did not wish it to go to the issue of the husband by any other woman; therefore, he said to their offspring if any by my daughter—these last words being mere expletives, thrown in from abundant caution, and shewing that the matter pressed upon his mind. I call them expletives, because we know that a devise to husband and wife for life, and then to their offspring, means their joint offspring, and that if they have no offspring there will be nothing on which the devise can operate: but the testator did not wish to leave this to inference or construction, and therefore said, "to their offspring if any by my daughter." If any, when? why, if any at all. This is further shewn by the limitation over:—it is not in default of such offspring living at the death of the surviving parent, but, generally, in default of such offspring; shewing that his mind was not fixed to any limited time, but that the estate was not to go over till after a general, indefinite failure of the offspring of the first takers. It was said, such offspring meant offspring living at the death: how can that be? Nothing had been said before of offspring living at the death. The testator had given the estate to his daughter and son in law for life, and then to their offspring; and the words in default of such offspring meant, simply, and clearly, offspring of the son in law and daughter. This exposition of the words if any by my daughter, is much strengthened by the other clauses of the will, where we find the phrases if any and if she have any, used by the testator indiscriminately, as being exactly synonymous; thus, "I give to my step daughter Nancy Ashley my house &c. to herself and her offspring if she have any, if not, to her half sister Lydia Bramble and her offspring if any; if not, to her sister Molly Baynes's offspring." Again, in the latter part of the clause under consideration, and by the very devise under which the lessors of the plaintiff claim, the testator after giving the estate to Lydia and her husband for life, and then to their offspring, adds—"and in default of such offspring to Molly Baynes's and Nancy Ashley's offspring, if they have any &c. and if they have none, to the

95 *poor of the parish &c." Surely, no one will contend, that a devise to A. for life, then to his issue, if he have any, and in default of such issue, over,—will make A. tenant for life only, with a contingent remainder to such of his issue as may be living at his death. It is too well settled at this day, and for ages past, that in such case, A. is tenant in tail, the word issue being taken as a word of limitation. Our case seems to me exactly the same, using offspring for issue.

Let us now consider, whether the power of appointment changes the case, and makes the word offspring a word of purchase? "To their offspring, if any by my daughter L. as they shall think best to give it:" to their offspring; not a part; not to such as their parents shall appoint; but to the whole offspring, as they shall think best to give it. To shew that this power makes no difference in the construction of the will, I think it sufficient to refer to the case of Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 73, and the cases there cited; particularly the case of Doe v. Goldsmith, 7 Taunt. 209, 6 Eng. C. L. R. 73, where the devise was to F. G. for life, and immediately after his decease, to the heirs of his body lawfully begotten, in such parts and shares as F. G. should by deed or will appoint, and in default of such heirs of the body of F. G. then immediately after his decease, over to J. G.; and the question was, whether F. G. took an estate tail? Chief Justice Gibbs, in delivering the opinion of the court, thus states the argument of the counsel who contended that F. G. took an estate for life only—"that the words heirs of the body, mean children of F. G., for when he devises to the heirs of the body of F. G. in such shares as the tenant for life shall appoint, that is a gift to persons who must be in esse when F. G. was to appoint to them; that the default of such issue, must therefore be a default of such persons, who can only be children; and that the testator by this expression, therefore, manifestly means to refer to the same persons who were to take as tenants in common under the appointment, not to the heirs of the body of 96 the *first taker, in the ordinary legal sense. This is the precise argument used in the case before us, as to the effect of the power of appointment. But in Doe v. Goldsmith, the court said—"It is an established rule, that where a general intent appears, any particular intent which appears, however clearly expressed, shall never take effect, where it is inconsistent with the general intent; and it was clearly the testator's general intent, that the estate should never go over to J. G. till all the heirs of the body of F. G. were extinct;" and, therefore, that it was an estate tail in F. G. So said this court, in Ball v. Payne, where there was the same power of appointment. And so say I here, where the general intent of the testator, expressed by the words in default of such offspring, is clear, that the estate should not go over to the offspring of Molly Baynes, till all the issue of his daughter Lydia was extinct.

I see nothing, then, in this case to take it out of the settled course of decision, in support of which I shall not cite authorities, but merely refer generally to those with which we are all so familiar, and with which our books teem.

With respect to the operation of our law dispensing with words of inheritance, upon this subject, I refer to the case of Ball v. Payne, where the point was expressly decided, and though by a court of only three judges, I feel authorized to say, from conversations with my absent brethren, that they approved the decision.

Upon the whole, I conclude, that John Bramble and Lydia his wife took an estate tail, under the will of Matthias Christian, which was enlarged by our statute into a fee, which on the death of the wife, became the sole estate of the husband, and descended at his death, to the lessors of the plaintiff; and, therefore, that the judgment must be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellants.

CABELL, J. The real question in this case, is, Whether the words in the will of Matthias Christian, purporting to limit the estate to the offspring of John 97 Bramble and Lydia *his wife, after the determination of the previous life estate given by the will to them and the longest liver of them,—were words of purchase to the offspring, or words of limitation operating to enlarge the life estate of Bramble and wife into a fee tail? I can see nothing in the case, to distinguish it from Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 73. If that case was rightly decided, it must rule this: I did not sit in it, but I have considered it with great attention; the opinion delivered by judge Carr, for the court, has my entire approbation; I could add nothing to its strength or clearness. I am, therefore, of opinion that the will before us gave to John and Lydia Bramble an estate tail; and, consequently, that the judgment should be reversed, and entered for the appellants.

It may not be improper, however, to observe farther, that if the words offspring of John and Lydia Bramble, be (as I think they are) words of limitation, then our statute of 1785, dispensing with words of perpetuity and of inheritance, can have no application to the case; for that statute was not intended to convert words of limitation into words of purchase, but to give a new effect to words that are already words of purchase. But I am still of the opinion expressed in Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh 368, that there may be cases of wills made since the statute of 1785, on which that statute will have an overruling influence, in deciding the question whether the estates devised be or be not fees tail: as, for example, where the extent of the first limitation in a will, depends upon the extent of the second, and the extent of the second depends on the operation of the statute. I allude to such cases as Roe v. Jeffery, 7 T. R. 589. There, the devise was "to T. F. and his heirs forever, and in case he should leave no issue, then to E. M. and S. or the survivor or survivors of them, share and share alike;" and the court of King's Bench decided that the limitation over to E. M. and S. was good as an executory devise limited on the fee devised to T. F. solely on the ground that E. M. and S.

took only life estates; for, as the 98 limitation to them *was to take effect, if at all, in the course of a life in being, it is obvious, that the failure of issue, on which the estate was to go to them, was not an indefinite failure, but a failure of issue living at the death of T. F.

and, therefore, there was no ground for implying an estate tail. And such would, I presume, be the decision of this court, on the same case arising on a will made before the statute of 1785 dispensing with words of perpetuity and of inheritance. But I apprehend the result would be widely different, on a will made since that statute; for I suppose no one could doubt, that the limitation over to E. M. and S. would, by virtue of the statute, give them an estate in fee simple, in the same manner as if it had been given, expressly, to them and their heirs for ever. This would, of itself, remove the sole ground of the decision in Roe v. Jeffery. There would, then, be nothing to restrain the generality of expression, and confine it to a failure of issue living at the death; for the limitation over to E. M. and S. and their heirs, would take effect at any period, however remote, when the issue might fail: this would manifest an intention in the testator, to provide for the whole line of the issue of the first taker: and whenever that is the case, the limitation in favor of the first taker will be held to be a fee tail, in whatever words it may be couched, since, otherwise, the general intent of the testator would be defeated. I have thought it necessary to say thus much, as to the statute of 1785, to prevent misconception as to the extent of the opinion I expressed in Jiggetts v. Davis.

BROOKE, J. This is one of those cases, in which there has been so great a diversity of opinion among judges and lawyers, since the decision of the case of Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590, which is said by lord Kenyon (in Porter v. Bradley, 3 T. R. 146), to be the foundation, and as it were the magna charta of executory devises: a diversity that has, I think, proceeded from not enough regarding a rule of construction, settled and admitted ever since Shelley's case—that the general intent of the testator to provide for all the issue of the first devisee, must overrule any particular intent, no matter how plainly expressed, unless it amount to evidence that the testator did not intend to provide for issue generally. In the case before us, I think it impossible not to see, that the testator did not intend the estate devised to his daughter Lydia and her husband for life, and then to their offspring, to go over to the offspring of Molly Baynes and Nancy Ashley, so long as there was any offspring (which is as comprehensive as issue) of his daughter Lydia and her husband; and that to carry that intent of the testator into effect, Lydia and John Bramble must take an estate tail according to the settled rule of construction, “as the law aforetime was.” Nor can any inference against this intent of the testator to provide for all the offspring of Lydia and John Bramble, be drawn from the circumstance, that, in the devise over to the offspring of Molly Baynes and Nancy Ashley, no estate is given to Molly Baynes or Nancy Ashley; on the contrary, I think, this last devise to the offspring of Molly Baynes and Nancy Ashley, strengthens the evidence of the testator's intent to provide for all the offspring of Lydia and John Bramble before the estate was to go over to the offspring of the other two. Lydia Bramble was his daughter, and her offspring must have been more dear to him, than the offspring of his step daughters; and accordingly, the testator evidently preferred all the offspring of his daughter Lydia to any of the offspring of the step daughters. The power to Lydia and John Bramble to dispose of the estate to their offspring, as they shall think best, is not in conflict with his intent to provide for all their offspring (or issue) so long as there should be any. The case of Doe v. Goldsmith, cited by this court in Ball v. Payne, was a stronger case than this; and yet no inference was drawn from the power of appointment, to change the intent to provide for all the issue, however remote. Nor can I think, that, consistently with the decisions of this court, any stress can be laid on the existence at the date of the will, of the provision of the statute of 1785, re-enacted *from that of 1776, abolishing entails, or of the other provision of the same statute, which dispenses with words of inheritance or perpetuity to pass an estate of inheritance. 12 Hen. Stat. at large 155, 7. If the intention of the testator is to be inferred from a supposition that those statutory provisions were in his contemplation when he made his will, we must take it that, as he knew that his will would be construed “as the law aforetime was,” and that the latter provision would not be so applied as to defeat the intent and effect of the former, he would have taken care, in wording his will, to conform to the construction thereof, “as the law aforetime was;” and if he had intended, that the estate devised to the offspring of his daughter and her husband, should go over before a total failure of their offspring, he would have used terms which, under the construction “as the law aforetime was,” would have created an executory devise over to the offspring of Molly Baynes and Nancy Ashley. He would not have relied on the application of the statute, to give an estate of inheritance to the offspring of his daughter and her husband. To give consistency to the two provisions of the statute, it will be impossible to apply the provision which dispenses with words of inheritance to pass an estate of inheritance, to any case, in which, without it, an estate tail, of an executory devise, would be created, under the rules of construction “as the law aforetime was.” It would be to reject altogether the language of the provision for abolishing entails; and, as the object of the other provision dispensing with words of inheritance, was to enlarge an estate to an inheritance, which under the common law (intended to be repealed) was only a life estate, it would be to defeat its object. If this provision should be applied in such a case as that of Roe v. Jeffery in 7 T. R. by giving to the survivor an estate of inheritance instead only, which made the limitation there a good executory devise, his life estate (under the old rule) would be entirely defeated, instead of being enlarged to an inheritance, as was intended by the statute. *It cannot be said, that this construction of the statute of 1785, would render any of its provisions ineffectual: on the contrary, it may be applied to every case, in which an estate is given either without words restricting it to a life estate, or words of inheritance, and in which, by its application, the rules of construction, "as the law aforesaid was," in respect to estates tail and executory devises, applied to the words in the deed or will, will not be affected; so as that the application of this provision of the statute shall serve only to enlarge an estate for life into an estate of inheritance, without defeating the life estate, or changing an estate tail into an executory devise, or vice versa.

I concur in the opinion, that the judgment should be reversed.

TUCKER, P. The testator devised the residue of his real and personal estate, to his daughter Lydia and her husband John Bramble, during the life of the longest liver of them, and then to their offspring, if any by his daughter Lydia, as they should think best to give it; and, in default of such offspring, to Molly Baynes's and Nancy Ashley's offspring, as they think best to dispose to their offspring, if they have any; and if they have none, then to the poor of Elizabeth-River parish. This devise clearly evinces the testator's intention, that his daughter and his son in law should have but an estate for life, and that the estate should go over after their deaths to his grandchildren; for, had an estate either in tail or in fee been given to the parents, the children might have been cut off by their alienation. But, while this was obviously his object, yet this particular intent, it is admitted, must be disregarded, if the enlargement of the life estate into a fee tail, is essential to effectuate his principal design. This was, that the estate should not go out of the family of his daughter, over to the family of Molly Baynes and Nancy Ashley, as long as there should be any descendants of his daughter, however remote in the line of succession.

This subordination of the particular 102 to *the general intent, is readily admitted, and from it have sprung the numerous cases, in which estates for life, followed by a limitation over upon an indefinite failure of issue, have been enlarged into estates tail. To produce this effect, however, there must be a limitation upon an indefinite failure of issue. Such I conceive not to be the case here. The devise over to the offspring of John Bramble and wife, if any by his daughter Lydia, as they shall think best to give it, is, according to my conceptions, a designation of the persons who are to take, and not the addition of an inheritable quality to the life estate of the first takers: other words, they are words of purchase, not words of limitation. They are equivalent to the offspring of Bramble and wife living at their deaths; and if so, no estate tail is created.

That the words above referred to, are intended to designate those descendants of the testator's daughter, who might be living at the death of the survivor of herself and her husband, appears from the language and character of the bequest. For,

1st. The estate is to go to "their offspring by his daughter Lydia, as they shall think best to give it." Here then was a power of appointing in what manner and portions the offspring were to take. The language of the will conveys, with a force not to be resisted, a power to the parents to divide the estate among their children, at their discretion. In doing this, one might have more, another less; and if so, they cannot take as heirs, but must take as purchasers; for, as heirs, they would take according to the law of descents, by which equality is the rule, where the descendants are all in equal degree. The testator, therefore, could not have designed to use these words as words of limitation or inheritance; as pointing out the indefinite line of succession. He could not have contemplated their taking as heirs, when he was providing a power of appointment by which they might take unequally. And it is, in this view, unimportant whether the power was or was not executed: the conferring the power, is the important 103 matter, as pointing out distinctly *the character in which the testator looked upon the offspring to whom the devise over was made; that he viewed them as purchasers, and never contemplated that they should take as heirs. If, as seems to be supposed, any illustration of the testator's leaning in this clause, is to be drawn from the other clauses of the will, the most ample evidence is afforded, that the word offspring here, is used as a word of purchase. In a preceding clause, he limits another part of his estate over to Molly Baynes's offspring, as she chooses to give it, without devising any interest to Molly Baynes herself; and in the subsequent limitation over of this very estate devised to Bramble and wife, it is devised to the offspring of Molly Baynes and Nancy Ashley, if they have any, as they shall choose to dispose to their offspring, without giving to the mothers themselves any estate whatever. Now, nothing is more clear, than that as no estate was given to Molly Baynes and Nancy Ashley, they had no estate to enlarge, and their offspring, if they took at all, could only take as purchasers, and the word of course is a word of purchase and not a word of limitation.

2ndly. That the offspring are to take as purchasers, is not only pointed out by the circumstance, that the estate was to be divided among them according to parental discretion, but the same thing seems to me distinctly conveyed by the very power of appointment itself. What offspring are to take and how? The offspring of Bramble and wife; and they are to take according to appointment; and, as this appointment was contemplated to be made by persons in being, the testator could only have contemplated its being made to persons in being: and this altogether excludes the idea of his having designed by these words to embrace the whole line of succession.

In the construction I place upon the language of the testator in this clause, I draw no distinction between the words offspring and issue. I freely admit they mean the same thing; and are to be construed a like in this case. In that view, however, it

tions I have taken. The first is the well known case of Doe v. Laming, 2 Burr. 1100. That was a devise of gavelkind lands to A. and the heirs of her body lawfully to be begotten, as well females as males, and to their heirs &c. to be divided equally, share and share alike as tenants in common. These words shewing clearly that the devisees were to take as purchasers, since they could not take in the mode prescribed if they took as heirs, the first taker was held to take an estate for life only, although the superadded words of inheritance would not of themselves have sufficed to take the case out of the operation of the rule in Shelley's case. So in this case (to apply the language of Mr. Fearn) the word offspring does not stand independent and unqualified, but is corrected and explained by the words which are coupled with it. Those words are incompatible with and expressly break the descent, because the parties may take unequally by appointment, and not equally as heirs. Butler's Fearn, 154, 197. The other case I shall cite, is that of Hockley v. Mawbey, 3 Bro. C. C. 82, the similarity of which to the present is altogether remarkable. It was a devise "to the wife for life, remainder to the testator's son R. R. and his issue lawfully begotten, to be divided as he shall think fit, and if he should die without issue, remainder over: held, an estate for life with a power, and the remainder good. Lord Thurlow said—"I think the testator intended, and has expressed his intention, to give a contingency with a double aspect; in one event, a gift to the children of the son if he should have any, and if he should not have any child, then to be sold for the purposes of the will. He did not mean the estate to go as an estate tail, but that the children should take distributively, in which case they must take as purchasers, and the consequence is, the son took only an estate for life. He had a power to divide; but if he did not, there was an interest in the children that would entitle them to an equal division. It is observed, that if he had no children, it would go to grand-105 children; it would so,—but *only as descriptive of his power: in order to take, they must be alive at the son's death: it is not sufficient to say they are immediate descendants of Richard (the son) to make them take under the estate tail. It is sufficient the division must take place at the death of Richard, which is within the rules. Therefore two events were provided for: 1. There being children of Richard; in which case they would take: 2. There being no children; in which case the estates vested in the persons described,"—that is, in the remaindermen.

3rdly. I proceed next to consider some other expressions of this will, which ought not to be dissevered from the rest, but regarded in connexion with them. The estate is given to Bramble and wife, and the longest liver of them, and then to their offspring if any by the daughter Lydia, as they shall think best to give it. In connexion with this clause, it is important to advert to the fact, that the testator had full knowledge when he made his will (which is to be understood as speaking from its date) that his daughter Lydia had offspring at that time. He could, therefore, only have used these words if any, which irresistibly imply uncertainty, in reference to some future state of things; the persons contemplated by him to take, were not such as merey had the quality of being then in existence, but such as should be in existence at some future period; and this period was either indefinite, or fixed to the determination of his own life, or of the life of the survivor of John Bramble and wife. I think it was the latter he had in view. For, although the word then is sometimes indefinite, and does not designate a point of time, but merely a succession of events, yet, in this connexion, I think it is otherwise. The devise is to them and the longest liver of them, and then to their offspring if any. If any, when? The answer seems to be echoed by the clause, if any then; at that time. To what could he be considered as so naturally referring, as to that time of which he had just spoken, namely, the termination of the particular estate? Can he be supposed to have 106 referred rather *to the time of his own death, to which there had been no manner of allusion? Had such been his design, he would have said, if any at the time of my death, as that event had not been before mentioned. Can he be supposed to have intended no definite period,—to have meant, if any in the long succession of generations? I think not. His daughter had issue at that time; and had his mind been directed to the failure of the line of succession, he would have used language in reference to the continuance of offspring, rather than these terms which so strongly imply a reference to some definite period. Instead of the words to their offspring if any, he would have said, in reference to the known existence of children at that time, to their offspring as long as there shall be any. But this was not his design; and, as he had just provided that Bramble and wife should have the estate during the life of the longest liver of them, he added, and then to their offspring if any; not deeming it necessary to repeat at the death of the longest liver of them. This construction of the words in question is strengthened, instead of being impugned, by a reference to the subsequent part of the clause, in which the testator in default of offspring of his daughter, devises the estate to Molly Baynes's and Nancy Ashley's offspring, if they have any. Now, in this devise, unquestionably, the words if they have any, mean if they have any at the time of the death of the survivor of Bramble and wife. For, as Molly Baynes and Nancy Ashley took nothing themselves, their offspring could only take as purchasers. The word offspring did not designate the line of succession, but pointed to some particular offspring. And as they too had children at the time, the testator could only have used the terms to shew, that he did not mean those who happened then to be in existence, but those who might happen to be in existence at a particular time; that is, at the death of the surviving tenant for life. If then, the words if there be any, have this meaning in this part of the clause, the words if any, in the former part of the same sentence, may be fairly interpreted in the same manner.

107 *Having thus established, that the true interpretation of the limitation is, to J. B. and wife during the life of the longest liver of them, and then to such of their offspring as there might be at the death of the survivor, thus making the word offspring a word of purchase and not of limitation; it is sufficiently obvious, that the subsequent words in default of such offspring, can mean nothing more. If the former do not amount to an indefinite limitation to the issue, neither can the latter: for, the words such offspring, mean such as were just mentioned; that is, offspring living at the death &c.

This construction of the testator's will is, however, resisted on the ground of principle and authority. It is said, that the testator did not design the estate to go over to the offspring of Molly Baynes and Nancy Ashley, as long as there were any descendants of his daughter Lydia by John Bramble: this cannot be denied. It is then said, that if the words are not construed to give an estate tail, the descendants of Lydia, after the first generation, would be cut off, since the offspring, if they took as purchasers, would only take estates for life, there being no inheritable words in the bequest to them. This position cannot be admitted. To sustain it, a variety of cases are cited, some of which I shall examine. In Doe v. Applin, 4 T. R. 82, the devise was to A. for life, and after his decease to and amongst his issue, and in default of issue, then over: A. took a fee tail; and for this obvious reason, that as the issue could not take more than an estate for life for want of words of inheritance, the estate would go over from the grandchildren, notwithstanding the clear intent to postpone the remainder so long as there should be issue or descendants of A. In Doe v. Smith, 7 T. R. 531, the devise was to A. and the heirs of her body forever, as tenants in common and not as jointenants, and in case she died before twenty-one or [and] without leaving issue of her body, then to B.—Held, A. took an estate tail, avowedly upon the necessity to effectuate the general intent. And lord Kenyon said, “here are no words of limitation added to the estate given to the children (sup-108 posing *they took as purchasers) and yet the remainder over is not to take effect, until there was a general failure of her issue, so that there must be an estate to comprehend all her children forever.” So, in Doe v. Goldsmith, 7 Taunt. 209, the devise was to F. G. for life, and immediately after his decease to the heirs of his body lawfully to be begotten, in such parts or shares as he should by deed or will appoint, and in default of such heirs of his body, then immediately after his decease over to J. G. And it was held, that F. G. took an estate tail; chief justice Gibbs resting it upon the ground, that this was necessary to effectuate the general intent in behalf of the issue; the testator having clearly shewn his design “that the estate should never go to J. G. as long as there was issue of F. G.” which could not be the case there, without implying a fee tail, since the issue, if they took as purchasers, took only an estate for life. So too, in Doe v. Cooper, 1 East 229, the devise being to R. C. for life, and after his decease, to his issue as tenants in common, but if he die without leaving issue, then to E. H.—the first taker took an estate tail. This case was determined expressly on the authority of the former cases, and therefore rests upon the same foundation. In all these cases, then, the want of superadded words of inheritance upon the devise to the issue, so as to give them heritable estates instead of estates for life, was the obvious, and, in some of them, the avowed principle of decision. For, if we attend to the course of argument, in all of them, both of the bar and bench, it is very manifest that the power of appointment, the direction to divide the estate amongst them, and the provision that they should hold as tenants in common, would, in these cases, as in Doe v. Laming, have prevented the implication of an estate tail, if there had been superadded words of inheritance. Thus, in Doe v. Cooper, lord Kenyon, speaking of Atherton v. Pye, 4 T. R. 710, said, “in that case there were words of limitation added to the devise to the daughters, and this forms a principal ground of distinction;” and in Doe v. Smith, in speaking of Doe v. Laming, which had been cited, he said, “that case is distinguishable from this, for there were words of limitation superadded.” Indeed, even with this foundation for the cases cited, they are by no means without opposition. The case of Doe v. Applin is considered in Burnsall v. Davy, 1 Bos. & Pull. 221, as going further than any case, in giving an estate tail to the first taker, by the rejection of the word amongst; that is, by considering the word issue as a word of limitation, notwithstanding the authoritative provision, that they should take in a manner incompatible with the notion of an inheritance. Accordingly, in the case of Hockley v. Mawbey, (before cited) the implication of an estate tail did not arise, though there were no words which would give an inheritance to the issue. But, where there are such words, I imagine the decisions are uniform. Thus in Doe v. Ellvey, 4 East 313, the devise being to A. and to the issue of his body, his, her or their heirs, equally to be divided if more than one, and if A. have no issue, then over; A. took but an estate for life. In Doe v. Barnsall, 6 T. R. 30, where the devise was to A. and the issue of her body as tenants in common, but in default of such issue, or being such, if they should all die under twenty-one and without leaving issue, then over; A. took only a life estate. Lord Kenyon, who had decided several of the former cases, said—“I agree that the limitation to M. O. was for life only, and the limitation to her children [issue] was to them as purchasers; and it certainly is sufficient to carry to them some quantity of estate. If the plaintiff's counsel had succeeded in proving, that there was nothing [any thing] to be collected from the will, to shew that the children were only to take for life, then according to the case of Roe v. Grew. [2 Wils. 322,] the court would have endeavoured to convert the estate to M. O. into an estate tail, in order to effectuate the intent of the devisor."

If, then, the existence of an inheritable estate in the issue or offspring, is the point upon which those cases turn in which there is a limitation to the issue to take in 110 a manner *different from the law of descents, then I say, that that is furnished, in the case before us, by the statute of 1785, which declares, that a fee shall be construed to be conveyed where there is no restriction either by express words or by construction of law. If this statute has any operation upon the case, then the offspring of Bramble and wife, living at the death of the survivor of them, would have taken a fee simple estate in remainder; and thus, the whole generation of the testator's daughter, would in succession have come to the estate, unless it should have been aliened by those in whom it might vest. And thus, there could be no ground for implying an estate tail, by forcibly converting a designation of the persons to take, into words of limitation.

The will in this case, having been made subsequent to the statute of 1785, must be under its influence upon general principles, unless some reason can be shewn for the contrary. I confess I see none. Enacted at the same session and contained in the same statute, and immediately succeeding the section respecting estates tail, I should think it not unreasonable to suppose that it might have been intended directly to modify it. But whether this was designed or not, so it is, that here is a solemn act of the legislature, prescribing a rule for the construction of instruments. What authority have we to disregard it, even in the construction of wills according to the direction of the preceding clause? It is because that clause declares, that the construction shall be "as the law aforesaid was?" Does this lock up the case from the operation of all legislation, except the clause respecting limitations in tail? Do the terms as the law aforesaid was, require us not only to look back to the law of entails as it existed before the act of 1776, but to govern ourselves by the state of the law of that day in all other respects? Was it intended, as was very pertinently asked by judge Green, in Bells v. Gillespie, 5 Rand. 291, to refer to all the decisions in England and Virginia prior to 1776, as the rules for decision in all future time, without regard to the effect which future laws might 111 have upon the reasons *upon which these decisions were founded? I certainly should have answered these questions in the negative, with the utmost confidence, but that it is manifest there is a difference of opinion on this most important point between the members of this court. Such, at least, appears to me to be the case. In the case of Goodrich v. Harding, 3 Rand. 280, the subject seems to have presented itself to the consideration of the court, but the question was waived by all the judges. In the case of Bells v. Gillespie, the testator after devises to several sons, bequeathed "to his son Pleasants a certain tract of land to him and his heirs, after the decease of his wife; and further provided, that if either of his sons should die without lawful issue, the part allotted to him should be divided among his surviving brothers:" and judge Green, in his opinion, distinctly avows that the statute of 1785 was decisive to give the surviving brothers a fee, if they took any estate, and that Pleasants, therefore, took an estate tail, "unless," says he, "we are not at liberty to take into consideration the effect of that statute in determining whether he took an estate tail or not." This question he pronounces to be of great importance, and proper to be at once decided. He proceeds to discuss the subject at large, enforces the opinion that the statute of 1785 must be referred to, and concludes that Pleasants either had an estate tail and not a fee, by force of the will, or if he had an estate in fee, the limitation over to his brothers was void; they having a fee by operation of the statute, and the limitation over being therefore not tied down to a life in being, which would have been the case had they taken only estates for life. In Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh 405, judge Green again recurs to this subject, refers to his opinion in Bells v. Gillespie, and again invokes the aid of the statute of 1785. In the same case, judge Cabell in giving his opinion (Id. 427,) speaking of the statute of 1785 respecting entails, and of the rules of construction recognized by it, said,—"It was, surely, competent to the legislature of 1785, to make any exceptions to or 112 *thought proper, and it did make an exception as to deeds and wills to be made after the passing of that act, by declaring, in the sentence almost immediately succeeding, that every estate thereafter granted &c. should be deemed to be a fee, if a less estate be not expressly limited, or appear to have been granted &c. by construction or operation of law. It must be admitted, that this provision makes a most important change in one of the former rules of construction, and it is imperative on the courts. As to estates created since the act of 1785, the expression as the law aforesaid was, must, therefore, be understood, as controlled by the clause just referred to. But with this exception, there is no difference between the construction of deeds, and wills, made before the statute of 1785 and those made since."

Next comes the case of Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 73. Upon the point in question, I am not disposed to controvert the opinion there expressed, if indeed it were admissible to do so. There, the court having looked upon the words heirs of the body, as words of limitation, notwithstanding the provision for a division among them, it was surely not competent to apply the statute of 1785, to vest a fee in those heirs who took no estate. But where the words are clearly used as a designation personæ, as I consider them in this case, the statute may be applied to enlarge the estate, and thereby effectuate the whole of the testator's intentions. And this course is more reasonable, than to reject, in effect, the strong expressions, which shew that the offspring were designed to take as purchasers. It is more reasonable than to convert those expressions into a limitation creating an estate tail, and defeat the object of the testator.

In this opinion, I would be distinctly understood as nowise contending for the application of the statute, where the word issue is used as a word of limitation. Thus, if an estate be given to A. for life, remainder to the heirs of his body, and if he die without issue, over; the words heirs of the body, being words of limitation, cannot be converted by the statute into words of purchase, and considered as giving a 113 fee *to the issue. Such a construction would be subversive of every principle. But, where the limitation is to offspring or issue, so designated and pointed out, as to make those words, words of purchase instead of limitation,—the intention of the testator is best subserved, the statute of 1785 dispensing with words of inheritance is respected, and the clause respecting estates tail is not infringed, when we consider the statute as giving a fee to those, who, but for it, would have only an estate for life.

* Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that John Bramble took only an estate for life; and the course of my remarks has shewn that the children of Lydia by him could not have taken any vested interest. Therefore, I think the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered for the appellants.

Promissory Notes—Negotiable at Bank—Presentment—Averment of.—In debt on promissory note, by indorsee against maker, the declaration states the note as one made negotiable at the bank of V. and avers, that the note, at maturity was duly presented at the bank, and protested for non-payment; the note offered in evidence, was made negotiable at bank; and there was no proof that it was presented at bank for payment: HELD, a note made negotiable at bank, is not therefore payable there also, and so the averment of presentation at bank was wholly immaterial, and need not be proved.

Same—Payable at Particular Bank—Averment of Presentment.—Quære, whether, in the case of a note made payable at a particular bank, it is necessary, in an action on it against the maker, to aver and prove due presentation of the note for payment, at the bank?

Appellate Practice—Failure to Object to Point in Lower Court—Waiver.—In a case brought before an appellate court, on complaint of error in a particular point stated in a bill of exceptions, the appellate court will regard only that point, and will not look into objections that might have been, but were not, made in the court below.

Notes—Negotiable at Bank—Where Payable.—In Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh 475. debt claimed in the declaration, with interest &c. subject to a credit for a specified sum, paid at a specified date: this is certain enough.

Debt, in the circuit court of Amelia, by Wills the indorsee, against Barrett the maker, of a promissory note for 300 dollars, made negotiable at the bank of Virginia, and therefore, placed on the same footing as foreign bills of exchange, by the amended charter of the bank, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 194, § 10, p. 78.

The declaration stated the note, as a promissory note in writing, commonly called a negotiable note, dated the 8th June 1826, made and delivered by the defendant Barrett to one Southall, for 300 dollars, payable to Southall or order ninety days after date without set-off, negotiable at the office of the bank of Virginia at Petersburg; and, after alleging the indorsement thereof by Southall to the plaintiff Wills, averred, that, afterwards, when the note came to maturity, the same was presented for payment at the said office of the bank, and payment thereof demanded there, but the same was then and there not paid, and yet remained wholly due and unpaid. Plea, the general issue.

At the trial, the defendant filed exceptions to an opinion of the court, stating, that the plaintiff, to support the issue 115 *on his part, offered in evidence the note in the declaration mentioned, which was set out in hæc verba, and was a note made negotiable (but not payable also) at the office of the bank of Virginia at Petersburg; and that, there being no other proof, the defendant's counsel thereupon moved the court to instruct the jury, that the plaintiff could not maintain his action, without proving the averment in his declaration, that the note was presented for payment at the time and place mentioned in the note and declaration; which instruction the court refused to give the jury; and the defendant excepted to the opinion.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff "for the debt in the declaration mentioned, with interest from the 10th September 1826, subject to a credit for 53 dollars paid on the 26th September 1826;" and the court gave judgment for the plaintiff, pursuant to the verdict, for the debt and interest thereon, subject to the credit of 53 dollars. Barrett applied to this court for a superseas to the judgment which was awarded.

Allison, for the plaintiff in error, took three objections to the judgment—1. That, as the declaration averred the presentation of the note for payment at bank, Wills was bound to prove the fact of such presentation there, in order to maintain this action. And advertng to the circumstance, that the note was only made negotiable at the bank, without being expressly made payable there also, and was so described in the declaration; he insisted, that a note made negotiable at bank, is, by force of that term of the contract, payable there. 2. That it was distinctly stated in the bill of exceptions, that there was no other proof in the cause but the note; that is, no proof of the hand writing of the maker, or of the indorser; without which, certainly, the indorsee was not entitled to a verdict. 3.

That the judgment was irregular and uncertain: that the verdict, or if not the verdict, the judgment, at least, should have ascertained the exact sum due, instead of 116 being for the debt claimed with *interest, subject to a credit for the sum paid at the specified date; Grays v. Hines, 4 Munf. 437.

There was no counsel for the defendant in error.

CARR, J. As to the first objection,—it is a general rule in pleading, that the declaration must contain an averment of all such facts as are necessary to maintain the plaintiff's action; but if, in addition to the necessary averments, it contain one idle and impertinent, so that it may be struck out without affecting the action, such averment is mere surplusage, and the plaintiff will not be held to proof of it. Is the averment here of this character, or is it one necessary to be stated in the declaration, and proved on the trial, to maintain the plaintiff's action? Since the case of Row v. Young, 2 Brod. & Bing. 165, 6 Eng. C. L. R. 58, it may be considered as settled in England, that where a promissory note is made payable, or bill of exchange is accepted payable, at a particular place, it is necessary, in an action against the maker or acceptor, to aver and prove a presentment at the place. But the point has been decided differently in the courts of New York, 4 Johns. Rep. 183, 17 Id. 248. And in the case of U. S. Bank v. Smith, 11 Wheat. 171, it is strongly doubted by the supreme court whether such averment and proof be necessary, in a suit against the maker of a note, though it is decided that they are, as against the indorser. This question, however, does not arise in the case before us; for the note is not made payable at any particular place; it is only made negotiable at the office of the bank of Virginia at Petersburg. The counsel, indeed, contended that this, of course, made it payable there; but he cited no authority for this, and I can find no decision to that effect. It would seem strange to me, if it had been so decided. There is no necessary connexion between the bank where a note is made negotiable, and the place where it is made payable; they are very different operations. In Mandeville v. Union Bank, 9 Cranch 11, chief justice Marshall said—

“By making a note negotiable at a
 117 particular *bank, the maker authorizes the bank to advance, on his credit, to the owner of the note, the sum expressed on its face.” But the payment of that note by the maker is quite another matter; it may be payable at large (and is always so where no place is named for payment), or payable at the bank where it is negotiable, or at a different place. This is all matter of express stipulation. In the case just cited, of Mandeville v. Union Bank, there are two instances of notes negotiable at one bank, and payable at a different bank. The note, then, in the case before us, was payable at large, and the averment in the declaration wholly immaterial and idle, of which no proof was necessary. The circuit court, therefore, was right in refusing the instruction.

The next objection is to the form of the verdict and judgment: They are objected to for uncertainty, but I can perceive none. The counsel, in support of his objection, cited the case of Grays v. Hines. In that case, a judgment on a bond was entered for the penalty, to be discharged by the sum in the condition, “subject to a deduction for the said credits indorsed on the said bond:” here was much uncertainty; the sums to be credited were not specified; the judgment, instead of being complete in itself, referred to another document, which was liable to be changed by the clerk or others. The two cases are wholly different; and I think there is nothing in the objection.

Another objection was relied on in the argument; that the hand writing of the maker, and of the indorser, were not proved. But the record presents no such point. There is a general verdict for the plaintiff on the note; without any objection at the trial for want of such proof; without any motion to the court for instructions on the point; without any demurrer to the evidence. This is an attempt to supply the defect, by making the bill of exceptions operate as a demurrer to evidence; but that point has been too often decided here, to be now stirred.

The other judges concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.

Wills—Estates Tail—Effect of Statute—Contingent Remainder.—Testator devises real and personal estate to his natural daughter P. A. to her and her heirs forever; and if she should die leaving no child, the estate before given should return into his estate, and be divided among his legitimate children; but should she leave a living child or children, then the estate should be held by him, her or them, as the case might be: Held, P. A. took by the will, an estate tail in the lands devised to her, which the statute for abolishing entails converted into a fee simple, and barred the contingent remainder limited on the estate tail.

Ejectment by George Thomason against Ambrose, John and Tabitha Anderson, in the circuit court of Louisa, for 100 acres of land in that county. Upon the trial a special verdict was found, stating the following case:

That John Anderson died seized of the premises, in 1800, having duly made and published his will, whereby he devised and bequeathed, inter alia, as follows: “As to my estate both real and personal, I dispose of it in manner and form following”—“I give to Patsey Anderson, my natural daughter, 100 acres of land in Louisa" (describing it) "also the two following negroes" (naming them) "one feather bed and furniture, one choice horse and side saddle" (and some other chattels) "to her and her heirs forever—I also lend her, during her being in a single state, the two rooms being in the west of my dwelling house, called the hall and study"—with sundry other property real and personal particularly mentioned; and then the testator added, in the same clause—"My further will and desire is, that if she should die leaving no child, the estate before given should return into my estate, and be divided as hereafter mentioned, viz. amongst all my children, but should she leave a living child or children, then the estate shall be heired by him, her or them, as 119 "the case may be." The testator then gave some real and personal estate to two of his legitimate children, and concluded his dispositions of his property, with the following residuary clause: "As to the rest of my estate, including the lands in Louisa not yet disposed of, negroes and property of every kind, I will and dispose of it to the following of my children, viz. Sally Pulliam, Betty Richardson, Francisca Johnson, and Augusta Johnson, to them and their heirs forever, except Betty Richardson's proportion, and that proportion of my estate, my will and desire is, shall remain with her and for her use, at the discretion of my executors, and after her decease to be equally divided among all her children."

That the hundred acres of land devised to the testator's natural daughter, Patsey Anderson, was the land in controversy.

That the devisee Patsey Anderson, in her lifetime, by deed of bargain and sale, dated the 18th October 1815, conveyed the land to John Thomason, who by deed of bargain and sale dated the 20th November 1821, conveyed it to George Thomason, the lessor of the plaintiff.

And that Patsey Anderson died shortly after her sale and conveyance of the land to John Thomason, leaving three illegitimate children, Ambrose, John and Tabitha Anderson, the defendants in this cause.

And then the verdict referred the question of title to the court—without finding, that Patsey Anderson entered on the land under the testator's will, and was seized and possessed thereof at the time of her conveyance to John Thomason; or that he entered under that conveyance, and was in possession at the time of his conveyance to the lessor of the plaintiff; or that the defendants were in possession at the time the ejectment was brought—that is, the formal finding of lease, entry and ouster, was omitted.

The circuit court (apparently, without adverting to the imperfections of the verdict) held, that the law was for the defendants, and gave judgment for them; from which the lessor of the plaintiff appealed to this court.

120 "Leigh for the appellant, premised, that the devise of the 100 acres of land to the testator's natural daughter, was an express devise of a fee simple, in the first instance. And then he contended, 1st, that, even supposing the limitation over in the event of her death leaving no child, was an executory devise, and good in its creation, yet, as she in fact left children, though they were illegitimate, the event had not happened upon which her fee was to determine; for though the word children generally meant legitimate children; yet here, he said, it meant any children capable to inherit from their mother; and by the statute of Virginia, bastards were heirs of their mother in like manner as lawfully begotten children, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 96, § 218, p. 357. It was, indeed, upon the strength of this proposition, that the appellees themselves were claiming title; they were illegitimate children, and yet they claimed under the limitation to the children of their mother. But, 2ndly, he insisted, that the devisee Patsey Anderson, took by the will an estate tail, which the statute for abolishing entails converted into an absolute fee simple. The devise was to her in fee, in the first instance; and if she should die leaving no child, then over to the testator's children; but if she should die leaving a living child or children, then the estate should be heired by him or them; that is, inherited from the mother. An estate of inheritance, so limited to a mother that her children shall take it from her by inheritance, could be nothing else but an estate tail in the mother.

Johnson argued, for the appellees, 1st, that the word children used in deeds or wills as a description of persons, always meant lawful children only, unless illegitimate children were particularly pointed out by the donor, and manifestly and incontrovertibly intended. Cartwright v. Vawdry, 5 Ves. 530; Godfrey v. Davis, 6 Ves. 43. It would be of immoral and pernicious tendency to permit bastards to take under a donation to children, generally; and it was most unreasonable to suppose, that the testator, in making provision for his daughter and her offspring, though she herself was illegitimate, looked to the case of her

121 offspring being "bastards"; especially, seeing that he anticipated her marriage, and made some special provision for her while she should remain single. As to the ground on which the appellees claim title, it was immaterial here, whether they had title or no; the only question was, whether the appellant had title. 2ndly. He endeavoured to maintain, that, upon the just construction of this will, the testator's natural daughter Patsey took only an estate for life, with contingent remainders over upon alternative events,—a contingency with a double aspect; if she should die leaving no child (meaning, as afterwards appeared, child living at her death) then the estate was to go to the testator's lawful children, who could, of course, take only as purchasers; if she should die leaving a living child or children (that is, living at her death) then the estate was to go to him or them, in like manner, as purchasers. The word children, he said, generally, in its legal signification, was a word of purchase; and though the will said, that the estate should be heired by the children of the daughter, the meaning was that they should take it, not that they should inherit it from their mother; for the phrase was applied not only to real but to personal estate, of which, properly, there could be no heirs.

Johnson pointed out the imperfections of the special verdict, and remarked, that, on that account, no judgment could be given, for the appellant, and that the court must order a venire de novo; and this Leigh admitted; but both counsel requested the court to decide the question of title now, so as to put an end to the controversy.

CARR, J. The decision of the circuit court is right, if the devisee Patsey Anderson took under the will of her father, a life estate only, and her children the remainder as purchasers; but it is wrong, if she took an estate tail; or even if she took a fee, with an executory devise over to the other children of the testator, provided it shall be considered, that the leaving natural children at her death, was an event, which, under the will, defeated the executory 122 devise. Upon *that point, however, I give no opinion. It is not necessary in the view I take of the case: for, in my opinion, under the well settled doctrines both in England and Virginia, this was an estate tail, enlarged by our statute into a fee.

The general questions involved have been so often and so thoroughly discussed both by the bar and the bench, that I shall not go into them at large. Did the testator mean to provide for his daughter and her issue indefinitely? If so, this is an estate tail, no matter how he may have expressed himself, or with what conditions or limitations he may have attempted to clog it. "I give to my daughter 100 acres of land—to her and her heirs forever—my further will is, that if she should die leaving no child, the estate shall be divided among all my children—but should she leave any living child, or children, the estate shall be heir by him, her or them as the case may be." Can any one look upon this clause, and not perceive, that the intention was to provide for the daughter and her whole line of descendants? When this intent is clear, the words child or children are taken to mean issue. The children are to heir the estate; how? surely, through the mother; they cannot heir it, as purchasers. Again—it is apparent from the will itself, that the children were not in esse, when the will was made. In Wild's case, 6 Co. 17, there was a devise over in remainder, to Rowland Wild and his wife, and after their decease, to their children, Rowland and his wife then having issue a son and a daughter: it was resolved, by all the judges of England, that Rowland and wife had but an estate for life, with remainder to their children for life, and no estate tail: but this difference was resolved for good law, that if A. devises his lands to B. and his children or issues, and he hath not any issue at the time of the devise, that the same is an estate tail; for the intent of the deviser is manifest and certain, that his children or issues should take, and as immediate devisees they cannot take, because they are not in rerum natura, and by way of remainder they cannot take, for that was not his intent, for the gift is im-

123 mediate; therefore, there, *such words shall be taken as words of limitation, to wit, as much as children, or issues of his body. Now, though the case put here is not exactly like ours. I consider the principle applicable; for it being equally clear in both cases, that the children were intended to take, and that they could not in either take as purchasers, it follows alike in both, that the word children is used as a word of limitation, in the sense of issue.

If I considered it doubtful, upon the face of the will, whether this were a fee tail, or a fee with an executory devise over, I should feel inclined, on several grounds, to lean against the executory devise. In Reeve v. Long, 4 Mod. 259, it is said, "that the only ground on which executory devises were originally admitted, was an indulgence to a man's last will and testament, when otherwise the words of the will would be void." In Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Wms. Saund. 388, note 9, lord Hale laid it down as a rule, "that where a contingency is limited to depend on an estate of freehold which is capable of supporting a remainder, it shall never be construed to be an executory devise, but a contingent remainder only, and not otherwise;" upon which sergeant Williams remarks, that "this rule so laid down by lord Hale, has been uniformly adhered to ever since." And in Doe v. Morgan, 3 T. R. 763, lord Kenyon said, "if ever there existed a rule respecting executory devises, which had uniformly prevailed without any exception to the contrary, it was that laid down by lord Hale in Purefoy v. Rogers." Again—an executory devise establishes a perpetuity to its extent—putting fetters upon the estate which may often last for a century: a restriction directly opposed to the policy of our statute docking entails, to the whole spirit of our subsequent legislation, and to the genius of our government. Judge Lyons in Hill v. Burrow, 3 Call 297, speaking with reference to the attempt then making, to break down the established course of decision, and turn what had been considered estates tail into executory devises, very sensibly remarks, "An infringement of the rule, then, instead of supporting 124 *the legislative intention, would go directly to defeat it, and would tend, under the notion of executory devises, to introduce that very clog to alienation, which the statute meant to abolish." I refer also to the excellent remarks of my brother Green on this point, in Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh 403, 4.

Upon these grounds, then, I should feel disinclined to consider this an executory devise, if the question were doubtful; but I do not think it at all so. The testator was making provision for his daughter and her issue; would he make such a disposition of the property as, in certain events not at all improbable, would carry it over to others, though there were descendants of his daughter in being, or just coming into life? Yet such might be the case, if this were taken as an executory devise; which, we know, is a limitation of a future interest, not to take effect at the testator's death, but limited to arise and vest upon some future contingency. The contingency here would be, the death of the daughter without a child living. The moment this happened the executory devise would take effect, and the estate vest in the legitimate children of the testator, and no subsequent event could divest it. Suppose the daughter had had six children, who had all died in her lifetime, each leaving five children, and then the daughter died; she would die, without leaving any child living, and the estate would be taken from her family, though she left thirty grandchildren. It may be said, the word children sometimes comprehends grandchildren, and under that meaning these would be taken in. I admit, that grandchildren, are sometimes comprehended by the word children, but not, I think, in such a case as this, if you take it to be an executory devise; for, then, the whole fee is in the daughter, and her dying without leaving a child living, is not mentioned for the benefit of such child, but merely to mark the contingencies upon which the estate passes over. Sir W. Grant, in Radcliffe v. Buckley, 10 Ves. 201, states the only cases in which children may mean grandchildren; and this is surely not one of them. But if grandchildren

125 were comprehended, no one would contend, that great grandchildren were; and it might well happen that the daughter might die leaving only such. But suppose another case: suppose she had one son who married and died leaving his wife enseat, and then, before the birth, his mother died; she would die leaving no child or other descendant living; and yet from the after born child of her son there might be numerous descendants, who, assuredly, were never meant to be disinherited by this testator.

Upon the whole I am of opinion, that Patsey Anderson took an estate tail, enlarged by our statute into a fee; and, consequently, that the circuit court erred.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred. TUCKER, P. Upon the first reading of the clauses of this will, which have been so earnestly discussed, it struck me that it was the case of an executory devise, in which the only question was, whether it was with a single or a double aspect. The more I have reflected upon the case, the more has my first impression been confirmed.

The first part of the clause in question, contains a distinct devise to the testator's natural daughter, of an estate to her and her heirs forever. Standing alone, it cannot be questioned that this would have passed to her a fee simple. The words have that legal effect, and a subsequent part of the will clearly proves that the testator was aware of their legal operation. But, as the devisee was a natural daughter, upon whose death without children, the estate would either pass from his family to her collateral kindred, on the part of her mother, or escheat to the commonwealth for want of heirs, the testator desired to provide for such a state of things. Therefore, he proceeded to declare, that if she died without leaving a child, the estate before given her should return into his estate, and be divided amongst his children. Had the clause ended here, it would be a clear case of the devise of the fee to Patsey, with an 126 executory devise over to his children, upon her dying without children living at her death. And his children, had the estate ever vested in them, would have taken a fee, as I think, by the operation of the statute of 1785 dispensing with words of inheritance in the creation of estates in fee simple; Smith v. Chapman, 1 Hen. & Munf. 298.

But it is contended, that the will, by the next clause, gives a double aspect to this executory limitation. It proceeds thus, "but should she leave any living child or children the estate shall be heir by him, her or them, as the case may be." And it is said, that any child she might leave at her death, would take as purchaser, and that thus also the fee simple limitation to her would be defeated, or converted into a mere life estate. I shall not contest the proposition, that the limitation over is within the time prescribed in the case of executory devises: I shall concede that this is no case if an indefinite failure of issue, 1. because if the strong expression shall leave a living child, and 2. because the term used is child, not issue; a term which, in its natural sense, implies a descendant in the first degree, and not an indefinite succession of posterity. I shall admit, what I think is a concession to the appellees, that children, in this will, would comprehend grandchildren of Patsey, living at her death, provided she had no child then living to take the estate. That this is a concession, important to the removal of a great difficulty in the case, is sufficiently apparent: for, if grandchildren cannot be comprehended under the term children, then, in case of Patsey's death leaving grandchildren, but no children, the grandchildren could not take, unless she herself should be held to take an estate of inheritance. The counsel felt this difficulty, and endeavoured to repel it, by contending, that the testator naturally would prefer his own children to the grandchildren of his natural daughter. But as to this portion of his estate, set apart for that branch of his family, this cannot be admitted: the very bequest shews that in reference to it, he preferred her children to his own legitimate children; and it is natural, that 127 *he should have designed what he bequeathed to his daughter to go to her posterity, instead of coming back to the posterity of his other children, who had their shares of his bounty provided by other parts of the will. This is clear from the bequest to her and her heirs; terms which abundantly shew, that he designed that portion of his property for that portion of his generation. I am, indeed, decidedly of opinion, that if Patsey had died leaving no child, but leaving grandchildren, they would have been embraced by "the terms child or children in this will. For, although where there are children, as well as grandchildren, the latter are not usually considered as comprehended under the term children, yet where there are only grandchildren it is held otherwise; Crook v. Brookeing, 2 Vern. 106; Gale v. Bennett, Amb. 681. And although the natural sense of the word children will be adopted unless there is something to control it, yet where by the context it appears, that the testator has used the word in a more extended sense, it will be construed to embrace in its description more remote descendants. Royle v. Hamilton, 4 Ves. 437; Reeves v. Brymer, Id. 692, 8; Earl of Orford v. Churchill, 3 Ves. & Beam. 59, 69. Thus, in Royle v. Hamilton, where the devise was to the children of W. H., that is to say, to J. H. and his issue, to his sisters and their issue &c. and J. H. died before the testator, leaving a child who was thus a grandchild of W. H. this grandchild took, and took as purchaser; for the word issue shewed an intention to embrace the descendants of J. H. So here; the devise to Patsey and her heirs, clearly shews a design to embrace all her descendants in the limitation, and not to confine it to descendants in the first degree only.

The particular clause in question may, therefore, be considered as reading thus: should she leave any descendant living at the time of her death, the estate shall be heir by him, her or them. Understanding it even thus, it is, in effect, but a reiteration of that which in the first part of the clause had been already declared, 128 and cannot be considered as a new, substantive, independent limitation.

For, should it be so considered, and thus converted into a contingent limitation, then it would be an executory devise with a double aspect, not merely defeating the fee upon the happening of the event in one way only, but defeating it let the event happen which way it might. Such a construction is never made without an absolute necessity; Ives v. Legge, 3 T. R. 488, in notes. Thus, if she die without descendants, her fee simple is to be defeated, and the estate is to go over to her father's children; and if she die leaving descendants, her estate in fee is to be defeated, and is to go over to her own descendants: so that let the event happen in which way it may, the fee simple so explicitly given is to be overthrown. Why then was it given? Why did not the testator at once give her an estate for life, if under every state of things she was to have no more? It was not ignorance; for, in a subsequent provision of the will, he displays some little knowledge of the matter. Designing to give a fee simple to his other children in the lands bequeathed to them, with the exception of his daughter Betty Richardson, for whom he intended a life estate with remainder over to her children, he expressly excepts her proportion from the operation of the words of inheritance, and gives her only a life estate, with remainder to her children.

I am therefore of opinion, that the clause in question is not a limitation to the children of Patsey, as purchasers; since if so, the inheritable words in the devise to her must be rejected intirely; whereas it is a rule of construction, that every word, if possible, should be retained, and receive its due weight and consideration. Nor do we, in this view of the case, reject the last clause. It is but a repetition of what had before been declared and provided by the inheritable clause; that if there were children they should heir the estate. If this be understood literally, he designed them to inherit, and not to take by purchase; and though I shall not insist upon this, yet we should strain not less, in attributing to him the design to revoke an explicit 129 devise of an estate of inheritance to his daughter, for the purpose of vesting it in unborn children or grandchildren, as purchasers.

There are, indeed, a variety of cases in the books of limitations upon a contingency with a double aspect. But I have been unable to find a single case, in which a fee simple given in the most explicit terms by the first clause of a will, has been held to be defeated, whichever way the contingent event might happen. Where, indeed, the first estate is for life, then there may well be a contingency with a double aspect; as in Plunket v. Holmes, 1 Lev. 11, and Luddington v. Kime, 1 Ld. Raym. 203. Thus, in this last case, the devise was to A. for life, and if he have issue male, then to such issue male in fee; but if he have none, then to B. and his heirs. This was a contingency with a double aspect; but it did not defeat, or trench upon, a previously limited estate, for that estate was expressly but for life: it provided for the disposition of the remainder whether the contingency should happen one way or the other; which was absolutely necessary to prevent intestacy, for if it had not done so, but had provided only for the contingency in one way, then, if it had happened in the other, there would have been no disposition of the fee, as A. had but an estate for life.

Nothing, indeed, is more common, than a previous estate in fee being defeated upon the happening of a certain event; for this is the very essence of a whole class of executory devises and shifting limitations. But I know of no case, in which an express estate in fee is given, and yet is to be considered as defeated, whether a certain event does or does not happen. According to such a construction, although the testator expressly gives a fee, yet in no event can the devisee take a fee. The case of Heath v. Heath, 1 Bro. C. C. 147, is more like the case at bar, than any I have met with; and the construction corresponded with my construction of this will. That was a devise to E. H. forever, that is, if he have a son or sons, who shall at-130 tain twenty-one; but "if he should chance to die without son or sons to inherit, my will is, that the son of W. H. shall inherit: this was adjudged a fee simple to E. H. with an executory devise to the son of W. H. In that case, as in the case at bar, the first words imported a fee: there, if E. H. died without son, the estate was to go over, as here, if Patsey should die without child: there, it is implied, that if E. H. left a son, that son should inherit, and here it is provided, if Patsey left a child, that child should heir: in that case, E. H. was adjudged to take a fee, and in this, we must, I think, accordingly adjudge that Patsey took a fee. The case of Heath v. Heath settles also the question as to the supposed estate tail. I do not think we can by any fair construction make an estate tail here. The word child or children is indeed construed to mean issue or heirs of the body, when such a construction is absolutely necessary, but not otherwise: as, in Wild's case, it is said, an estate to a man and his children, he having at that time no children, creates an estate tail: but the reason is, that the present gift to children not in esse, being incapable of vesting in them as purchasers in presenti, they would take nothing by purchase or inheritance, if the father were to take only an estate for life; and, therefore, to effectuate the obvious intention, the word children was converted from its natural sense, in order to give an inheritable quality to the estate. But I know of no case in which the words child or children living at the death &c. have been construed to mean issue or heirs of the body, where the parent himself has an express estate in fee limited to him by a prior clause of the will. It is obvious, however, that if the natural daughter took an estate tail, it would have been converted into a fee; and thus her conveyance would have been good and effectual. In either view, therefore, the appellant's title would prevail.

But the special verdict is too defective to enable the court to pronounce a judgment between the parties. This is understood to have been admitted, so that it is unnecessary to enter into a detail of its imperfections.

131 *The judgment of the court was entered in the following words:

"The court is of opinion, that the said judgment is erroneous in this, that the court ought not to have proceeded to render judgment upon the verdict of the jury upon the issue joined between the parties, the same being imperfect in omitting to find as to the entry and seizin of the parties under the successive deeds in the special verdict set forth, and being otherwise uncertain and void; therefore, it is considered that the said judgment be reversed and annulled, and that the appellant recover against the appellee his costs &c. And it is ordered, that the verdict of the jury be set aside, and a venire de novo awarded, and that the cause be remanded to the circuit superior court of Louisa, to be proceeded in accordingly. And it is further certified, at the request of the parties by their counsel here, that this court is of opinion, that by the operation of the will of the testator John Anderson, the devisee Patsey Anderson took an estate tail in the lands in controversy, which was converted into a fee simple by virtue of the statute in such case made and provided, and so had good right and title to sell and convey the said lands to her vendee John Thomason.

132 *Tabb's Adm'r v. Binford.

January, 1833.

[26 Am. Dec. 317.]

Deed of Bargain and Sale—Covenant—Personal—Case at Bar.—In a deed of bargain and sale of lands, the bargainor covenants as follows—"And the said T.

*Conveyances—Covenant of Warranty—Effect.—In Burners v. Keran, 24 Gratt. 68, it is said: "Warranty is now considered a personal covenant, sounding merely in damages. Under our statutes and decisions it is treated as a covenant to warrant and defend, while it has also all the effect of a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Tabb's Adm'r v. Bin- ford hereby covenant, for himself and his heirs, to and with the said B. that he the said T. will warrant and forever defend to the said B. his heirs and assigns, the title to the said parcels of land against all persons whatever"—Held, this covenant was not a mere warranty real, but was a personal covenant, upon which an action of covenant lay for the bargainee, on being evicted, against the administrator of the bargainor.

In an action of covenant, brought by Binford against Bolling administrator of Tabb, in the circuit court of Dinwiddie, the plaintiff declared, That Tabb, in his lifetime, by indenture dated the 1st March 1815, in consideration of 2285 dollars, granted, bargained and sold, to Binford and his heirs, two parcels of land in the county of Dinwiddie; and that "the said Tabb then and thereby did covenant, for himself and his heirs, to and with the said Binford, that he the said Tabb would warrant and forever defend to the said Binford, his heirs and assigns, the title to the said parcels of land against all persons whatever"—And the breach alleged was, that Tabb, in his lifetime, and the defendant, his administrator, since his death, had not defended the title of the two parcels of land against all persons whatever; but that, on the contrary, a certain A. B., who, at the time of making the said indenture, and continually until the eviction after mentioned, had and still had lawful title to the said lands,—on &c. at &c. entered into the same, and by process of law ejected and removed the plaintiff against his will from his possession and occupancy, and still held him out of possession thereof, contrary to the form and effect of Tabb's covenant aforesaid—By reason of which premises, the plaintiff had not only lost the lands, and divers sums of money, amounting to 1000 dollars, by him expended in improving them, but also the costs sustained by the lessee of the said A. B. in prosecuting his action of ejectment against the plaintiff in the circuit court of Dinwiddie, for the recovery of the lands, and the plaintiff's own costs in defending the action of ejectment against him. The defendant pleaded covenants performed; upon which an issue ford, 4 Leigh 133; 2 Rob. Prac. 86. It creates personal rights, wholly independent of the estate, and which may survive long after it is extinguished, for the benefit of the covenantee."

Also in Rex v. Creel, 22 W. Va. 376, it is said: "But a more serious objection to the declaration and each count is, that the action will not lie against him for breach of ancestor's covenant of general warranty. That such a covenant as is sued on here: 'that said Creel by said indenture of bargain and sale did then and there covenant to and with the said plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, that he would warrant generally and defend all the land thereby sold, etc.'," which by our Code is declared to 'have the same effect, as if the grantor had covenanted, that he, his heirs, and personal representatives will forever warrant and defend the said property unto the grantee, his heirs, personal representatives and assigns against the claims and demands of all persons whomsoever.' (Code, W. Va. chapter 72, section 13, page 466.) is a personal covenant, there is no doubt. Tabb's Adm'r v. Binford, 4 Leigh 132; Chapman v. Holmes, 10 N. J. Law 24; Townsend v. Van Courtlandt's Ex'ors, 6 Cow. 123."

A covenant of warranty of title is a personal covenant, upon which an action of covenant lies on eviction against the personal representative. Knotts v. McGregor, 47 W. Va. 566, 35 S. E. Rep. 901, citing Tabb v. Binford, 4 Leigh 132. The principal case is reported in 26 Am. Dec. 317, with note.

was made up. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for 3206 dollars, with interest thereon &c. to which judgment, this court, on the application of Tabb's administrator, awarded a supersedeas.

And now Johnson argued, for the plaintiff in error, that the covenant set out in the declaration, was a mere general warranty of the land, which bound the warrantor and his heirs, to render to the grantee, in case of eviction, an equivalent in land; which, therefore, entitled the warrantee to recover an equivalent in land only, and that by voucher or warrantia chartæ, against the warrantor and his heirs, but not to any personal action of covenant against the warrantor, or to any remedy whatever against his personal representative. He cited Harg. Co. Litt. 365 a, note 1, 2 Tho. Co. Litt. 245, note A.; Shep. Touchs. 181, note 1, and the opinions of the judges of this court, in Stout v. Jackson, 2 Rand. 132, and Threlkelds v. Fitzhugh, 2 Leigh 451.

Leigh, for the defendant in error, contended, 1st, That this was not a mere warranty, that is, the real covenant of warranty and nothing more; that it contained terms which made it a personal covenant. He referred to the form of a mere warranty real, and compared it with the covenant in this case. The form of a warranty, properly so called, was thus: "And I the said W. and my heirs and assigns, all the said parcel of land with all its appurtenances, to the said J. and his heirs and assigns, against all mankind will warrant forever." 2 Black. Comm. Append. No. 1. But here, the bargainor and his heirs did not warrant, but covenanted for himself and his heirs, that he would warrant; he did not covenant to warrant only, but to warrant and defend; and he covenanted to warrant and defend the title of the land, not the land itself: in all which particulars, it was obvious, the covenantor departed from the 134 terms of a mere warranty *real: therefore, he contracted for more than such a warranty would have bound him to perform. For, he said, a covenant to warrant was no more a warranty, than a covenant to sell and convey was a sale and conveyance; and the very use of the word covenant imported an intent to incur a personal obligation. The warranty proper, the mere real covenant of warranty, was created by the word warrantizare alone, without more; a covenant to defend, as well as to warrant, was a stipulation different from, and additional to, the warranty, as was clearly pointed out in Co. Litt. § 773, 383b, 384a. "Where a man is bound upon condition to warrant and defend land to W. S. the warranty is where he is impleaded, but the defending is to save the party so that no stranger enters upon him;" 22 Vin. Abr. Voucher, B. pl. 6, p. 27. And lord Hardwicke, in Williamson v. Codrington, 1 Ves. sen. 516, adverted to the effect of a covenant for assurance of title not being penned as real warranty, and to the difference between a covenant or agreement to warrant, and a warranty; and plainly intimated the opinion, that a covenant to warrant and defend is larger than a covenant to warrant only. Upon these authorities, it was justly remarked by Green, J., in Stout v. Jackson, 2 Rand. 148, that, if a covenant of warranty stipulates not only to warrant but also to defend—"the word warrant would be construed technically, so as to bind the warrantor to compensate in lands of equal value, upon voucher or warrantia chartæ; the word defend would be considered as making a personal covenant equivalent to a covenant for quiet enjoyment." Further, the court would find, that the real covenant of warranty always stipulated to warrant the land conveyed itself; but this was a covenant to warrant the title conveyed by the deed, that is, the fee simple in the land; and so was tantamount to a covenant that the grantor had good title in fee. Therefore, he concluded, that either this was a personal covenant, or it contained both a real and a personal covenant. And, without doubt, in every

135 case of an express personal covenant, the *covenantor was bound to make compensation in damages for a breach, and his personal representatives were bound, without being named, unless the covenant be such as determined by his death. 2 Bac. Abr. Covenant, E. 1, p. 69, Shep. Touchs. 178. 2ndly, He admitted, that (as is said in 2 Bac. Abr. Covenant, C. p. 67,) it seemed by the better opinion, that upon the eviction of a freehold, no action would lie upon a warranty either in deed or in law; for the party might have had his warrantia chartæ or voucher. But it had been adjudged, in an action of covenant upon a warranty real of a freehold estate, of which the breach was that the warrantee had been impleaded and evicted for a term of years, that "the action of covenant would lie; because, though the warranty was annexed to the freehold, yet the breach and impeaching was not of a freehold but of a chattel, for which there could neither be voucher, rebutter, nor warrantia chartæ, so that though there had been a judgment in warrantia chartæ in such case, yet either upon entry or upon recovery in ejectione firmæ upon the lease, there could be neither voucher nor rebutter, nor value upon warrantia chartæ; and therefore, a real warranty is a covenant real when the freehold is brought in question, but when a lease is in question, or any other loss that doth not draw away the freehold, it may be used as a personal covenant whereupon damages may be recovered; so it is both a real and a personal covenant to several ends and respects;" Pincombe v. Rudge, Hob. 3, 28. Now, in the case before the court, the warrantee was impleaded in an ejectment, which being, in form, an action to recover only a term of years, though in effect it involved the whole question of title, the warrantee could have had neither voucher nor warrantia chartæ against the warrantor; and being evicted, of course, but for a term of years, which did not draw away the freehold, he had a right to use this as a personal covenant; to bring his action of covenant for the breach, and to recover compensation in damages; for, otherwise, he would have had no remedy. 3rdly, He referred to 136 the doubt expressed by *Coalter, J., arguendo, in Stout v. Jackson, 2

Rand. 156, whether upon a pure warranty, warrantia chartæ would lie in Virginia, at this day, when voucher was done away by our statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 34, p. 496, and to the opinion intimated by that judge, that,—since the statute,—considering the obsolescence of the ancient remedy, its incompatibility with the situation of this country, and the probable intent of parties in all contracts of warranty,—“the general sense of the country and sound principles of justice, therefore, require, that all covenants of this kind, however worded, should be considered, as to the remedy in case of eviction as personal covenants of the vendor, that is, that a personal action of covenant will lie on such a warranty.” And the counsel argued that these opinions were just though extrajudicial, and ought at once to be declared the law of the land. To shew the effect of the statute taking away the voucher, upon the remedy by warrantia chartæ, how intimately the two remedies were connected, and how essential the voucher was, in many cases, to the efficiency of the warrantia chartæ, he cited F. N. B. 134, K. 4thly. He said, all difficulties were obviated by the statute of jeofails, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 103, p. 512, providing, that no judgment after verdict shall be stayed or reversed—“for any mistake or misconception of the form of action, or for any other defect whatsoever in the declaration or pleadings, whether of form or substance, of which might have been taken advantage of, by demurrer, and which shall not have been so taken advantage of.”

Johnson replied, 1st, That though the covenant in question varied from the ancient technical form of a warranty real, in some particulars, yet the variances were wholly immaterial; they were variances in words, not in sense: and it could hardly be maintained, that the real covenant of warranty could only be expressed in one set form of words, and no other could be devised to convey the same meaning and intent. The first variance from the ancient form, was, that the bargainor did not say that he and his heirs would 137 *warrant; he only covenanted for himself and his heirs that he would warrant. Now, the definition of a warranty real, was, “a covenant real annexed to lands and tenements, whereby a man and his heirs are bound to warrant the same;” Co. Litt. 365a: so that here, the warrantor, without exactly copying the usual form of warranty real, had expressed his contract in the terms of the definition of such a warranty. In truth, a warranty real, expressed in the strict ancient form, was nothing but a covenant to warrant; a real covenant, of peculiar character and effect, but still only a covenant: for every agreement or consent by two or more, by deed, whereby either promises to the other, that something is done already, or shall be done afterwards, is a covenant; Shep. Touchs. 160, 1. As to the next variance from the ancient form of the warranty real, which had been mentioned, namely, that the warrantor here, stipulated not only to warrant, but to warrant and defend; he said, that was a variance from the form of the warranty real given by Blackstone; but the form given in Sheppard's Touchstone, 181, was thus—“I and my heirs will warrant and forever defend to W. S. and his heirs, the said tenements against all men forever.” And he insisted, that when those two phrases are used in one covenant annexed to a conveyance of land only, they made only one covenant, and that a real covenant of warranty, not two distinct covenants, one real and one personal. The opinion of Green, J., in Stout v. Jackson, 2 Rand. 148, was, he thought, extrajudicial in this respect, and, certainly, was not supported by lord Hardwicke's reasoning in Williamson v. Codrington, 1 Ves. sen. 516, for that was the case of a covenant in a conveyance of both real and personal estate, whereby the warrantor obliged himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, to warrant and forever defend both the real and personal estate conveyed; and the decision was, that this was, in respect to the personal estate, a personal covenant, not (as had been contended) a covenant of warranty real applicable only to the real estate conveyed. In the passage from Bracton, quoted *in Co. Litt. 383b, it was said—“by this phrase we warrant, the warrantor took upon himself an obligation to defend his tenant and his assigns, and their heirs, in possession of the thing granted;” and 2 Tho. Co. Litt. 245, note A. was to the same effect: so that, here again, the warrantor, in the present case, had only expressed his contract to warrant, according to the legal effect of the warranty real, which bound him to defend the land granted to the warrantee. Then, as to the peculiarity in this covenant, last relied on, to shew that it was not a mere warranty real,—that it was a covenant to defend the title, not the land itself; he said, it was enough to remark, that the warrantor could nowise defend the land but by defending the title; and had the warrantor been vouched on this warranty, he would only have been called to defend the title. The true test, by which to determine whether the covenant in question was a warranty real or no, was, to ascertain whether voucher or warrantia chartæ would have lain upon it, at common law? for if either of those remedies might have been resorted to, this was a mere warranty real. And he contended that voucher or warrantia chartæ might have been maintained; to which point he cited Doe v. Prestwidge, 4 Mau. & Selw. 178, 182. 2ndly, Taking this to be a mere warranty real, which bound the warrantor and his heirs to render an equivalent in land only; he said, it resulted from the very nature of the contract, and the authorities were quite clear, that no personal action lay against the warrantor himself, much less against his personal representatives. And to the argument of the counsel of the appellee, that though this might have been true in case the warrantee had been evicted of the whole fee simple warranted, yet it was not true in the actual case, in which he had been impleaded in ejectment, and evicted of only a term of years, and that this was a breach for which a personal action of covenant lay, even though this were a warranty real; he answered, 1. that it had been admitted, that the judgment in ejectment was, in effect, though not in form, an eviction of the whole estate; *and 2. that the breach laid in the declaration was, that the warrantor had not defended the title—namely, the title conveyed,—the fee simple; and it was necessary to prove that he was evicted of that, in order to establish the breach. 3rdly, He argued, that our statute taking away the remedy by voucher, nowise affected the other remedy that lay at common law on a warranty real,—the remedy by warrantia chartæ; for this lay wherever the warrantee was impleaded in an action in which he could not vouch. F. N. B. 134, D. 4thly, As to the provision in the statute of jeofails, he said, that, if he was right on the main points in debate; if the appellee had, by his own shewing in his declaration, stated a case in which the defendant was clearly exempted from all liability; surely, the statute could not be strained so far as to entitle him, notwithstanding, to a judgment.

CARR, J. It was contended for the plaintiff in error, that the covenant declared upon, is a pure warranty which descended upon the heirs of the covenantor, and upon which this action of covenant did not lie against the administrator. In discussing this point, the counsel on both sides went into the ancient and obsolete doctrines of the pure common law warranty, embracing the warrantia chartæ, voucher, and other points of learning connected with the subject. The view which I have taken of the covenant in this case, will render it unnecessary to explore this unfrequented path. Whether the writ of warrantia chartæ be an existing remedy with us at this day, I shall not undertake to decide: but this I may say,—so entirely have the personal covenants in conveyances superseded the old common law warranty, that there is not one man in ten thousand, who, when he stipulates for a deed with warranty, means to take that common law assurance, which binds the lands only of his vendor, and gives him no remedy but the warrantia chartæ. In truth, this is never the intention of the contracting parties; and therefore, in the construction of their covenants, I would hold those only to constitute a pure technical warranty, 140 *which come strictly up to the definition of it by the ancient writers.

Ego et heredes mei warrantizabimus in perpetuum: these are the technical words; the alienor for himself and his heir warrants the lands forever. It is no covenant or agreement to warrant; it is an actual warranty: it is no covenant to warrant the title to the land; it is a warranty of the land itself. In these particulars the covenant before us differs from the warranty real; and the counsel for the defendant in error shewed, that these are by no means mere verbal differences; but if they were, I would, in this case, hold them important. There is another difference, held by lord Hardwicke to be important; which is that here, the word defend is added to the word warrant. Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that this is a personal covenant; that the action well lay against the administrator; and therefore that the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

CABELL, J. I am clearly of opinion, that the judgment should be affirmed.

BROOKE, J. I think the terms of the covenant in this case, make it a personal covenant, and not a pure warranty real at common law. In the first place, this is an executory contract, not a contract executed, as I understand the technical warranty real at common law to have been; it is a covenant to warrant; and it also differs from the terms of the pure warranty real, in being a covenant to warrant the title, not the land conveyed. A covenant to warrant and defend the title, is a different agreement from a pure warranty, and admits of a different plea; for though it was argued, that a pure warranty is only a covenant, though it be a real one, and that on voucher by the warrantee, the warrantor must insist on his title, and that a covenant to warrant and defend the title, imports no more,—yet I think there is a wide difference between the two things. In warrantia chartæ brought on the pure warranty real, 141 upon the supposition *that the warrantee had been impleaded though in fact he had not yet been impleaded (a proceeding that might be had on the pure warranty); if the defendant by plea denied that the plaintiff was impleaded, he would thereby admit the warranty, and that it was broken, and judgment would be given for the warrantee; N. B. 134, K. Now this shews the difference between the covenant in the case before us, and the pure warranty: for I take it for granted, such a defence, on such a covenant as this, would not be an admission on the part of the defendant, that he had broken his covenant: on the contrary, such a defence would be held good; it would be equivalent to a denial, on the part of the defendant, that the title which he covenanted to warrant, had been disturbed or legally questioned; a denial, that any claim or demand against which he covenanted to warrant and defend, had been made by any person by suit. Or, suppose the plaintiff had been impleaded in a proper action, and he had vouched the defendant, the vouchee, in order to defend the premises warranted, must have shewn, that he was seized in fee at the time he made the warranty: he could not have shewn, that, though he had no title at that time, he then had the title,—as he might in this action of covenant, if I understand the import of the covenant to warrant,—because by shewing that the title was then in him, his covenant to warrant would not be broken. This illustration may be said to beg the question,—to take for granted, that the covenant in question does not amount to a pure common law warranty. But its object is, to shew that the covenant here was not intended by the parties for a pure common law warranty and nothing more, since the obsolete remedy by a writ of warrantia chartæ, could not have been in the contemplation of the parties. As the law makes a part of every contract, and the parties are presumed to know the law; a departure from the terms which constitute a pure warranty real, is conclusive that the pure warranty real was not in their con-temptation; especially, as it hardly can be imagined, that the grantee meant to 142 rely on the ancient *common law remedies upon a breach of the warranty real, one of which (the voucher) is taken away by statute, and the other obsolete, if not also abolished. In the case of Williamson v. Codrington, where the covenantor "oblige himself, his heirs, executors and administrators to warrant and defend the plantation, negroes, cattle &c." lord Hardwicke after remarking on the subject of the covenant, said, "this clause is not penned as a real warranty; which is, I do for myself and my heirs warrant such land: here, the words are, I do oblige &c. which amount to the same as I covenant &c., for many words in a deed will amount to a covenant besides the word covenant, as I oblige, agree. This then is barely a covenant, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, to warrant; which word must be construed in a larger sense than warranty in a strict legal sense; as large as defend." Such, essentially, is the covenant before us. The grantor covenanted to warrant and defend the title in fee simple, as it was the fee simple in the land which he sold and conveyed. In substance, it was a covenant of seizin in himself; that is, that he was clothed with the title in fee conveyed to the grantee. A covenant and agreement to warrant the title, is, I think, no more a warranty than a covenant to sell is a sale. Had the previous words in the covenant been the appropriate words to constitute a real warranty, with the words and defend superadded, I should doubt whether these last words would change the character of the contract, and make it a personal covenant (though lord Hardwicke has laid some stress on them, in the case just mentioned): for, in the case of Pincombe v. Rudge, Hob. 3, 28, the words and defend were added to the word warrant, and yet the judges treated it as a real warranty, though it was decided, that, as the warranty was broken by a claim to a term of years only, covenant well lay.

I think the fair conclusion from the authorities, is, that whenever there is a departure from the form of the real warranty we find in the books, from which to 143 infer a change *of the contract, it must be considered a personal covenant, whether executors are named or not, and though the heirs are named, as in the case before us.

Although I do not think it belonged to this case, to investigate the remedies on the real warranty at the common law; yet, as much was said by the bar on that subject, I have again consulted the books, and find that I was entirely correct in what I said concerning it, in Stout v. Jackson and Threlkelds v. Fitzhugh.

The judgment should be affirmed.

TUCKER, P. Waiving the inference that this is a personal covenant, drawn from the expression I covenant to warrant, instead of the simpler form I do for myself and my heirs warrant, which lord Hardwicke thought a proper inference,—it is sufficient to rest this case upon the use of the word defend. This is a covenant not only to warrant but to defend. Now, the same great judge distinctly intimates, that the sense of the word defend, is larger than that of warrant. Therefore, where a party covenants to warrant and defend, the obligation to defend, cannot be identical with the obligation to warrant, because it means something more. Not being identical, it is therefore distinct; so that if, as I concede, the covenant to warrant, has here the operation of the common law warranty, yet the covenant to defend, has a separate and distinct operation. It is a distinct covenant, though contained in the same clause. And it is clearly not the technical warranty; for defendemus does not make a warranty, nor indeed any other word than warrantizabimus. Co. Litt. 384, a. If then it be not the technical warranty, it is a personal covenant, as much as a covenant of seizin or for good title. It is, in effect, much the same as a covenant for quiet enjoyment: for "where a man is bound to warrant and defend, the warranty is" [that is, applies] "when he is impleaded: but the defending, is to save the party that no stranger enters upon him." 22 Vin. Abr. Voucher, B. pl. 6, citing Br. 60, who cites 2 E., 4, 15.

 144 And judge Green, *accordingly, in Stout v. Jackson, remarks, that if a covenant of warranty binds the party not only to warrant, but to defend, the word defend, would be considered as making a personal covenant, equivalent to a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Indeed, it seemed to be admitted by the counsel in the argument, that if by one clause I covenant to defend, and by another clause I covenant to warrant, the first would make a personal, and the last a real covenant. I cannot perceive, that the union of them in the same clause, will neutralize the operation of the covenant to defend. If in the same clause, I covenant to deliver a horse, and to pay a sum of money, or to pay money, and make a title to land, or that I have good title and right to convey; yet, in each of these cases, the covenants are distinct though the clause is the same. In like manner, a covenant of seizin, and for quiet enjoyment, would be distinct covenants, though united in the same clause; and so, a covenant to warrant and defend; since it is established by concurrent authorities, that they are not convertible terms.

Upon these reasons, and sustained by the opinion of lord Hardwicke, and the uncontradicted authority of a decision more than 400 years old, as to the effect of a covenant to defend, I am of opinion, that the covenant to defend in this case constituted a personal covenant; and so bound the personal representatives of the covenantor, whether named or not named. I am also of opinion that that covenant was broken by the entry of a stranger (having better title) under a judgment in ejectment.

Judgment affirmed.

†Same—Appeal—Effect.—In Jeter v. Langhorne, 5

ings on a judgment at law be enjoined by a court of chancery, and the injunction be afterwards dissolved; and on appeal taken to the court of appeals, the order of dissolution is affirmed in omnibus; an execution may be sued out on the judgment at law, before the decree of affirmance is entered up in the court of chancery.

Dudley recovered a judgment against Epes's administrators, in the circuit court of Prince George. The superior court of chancery of Richmond, upon a bill exhibited by Epes's administrators, enjoined him from further proceedings at law upon it; and, afterwards perpetuated the injunction as to part of the sum recovered, and dissolved it as to the residue. From that decree Epes's administrators appealed to the court of appeals; which affirmed the decree, and ordered its decree of affirmance to be certified to the court of chancery; but, before the decree of affirmance was entered in the court of chancery, Dudley sued out from the circuit court of Prince George, an execution upon his judgment, for the residue of the sum thereby recovered as to which the injunction had been dissolved. Thereupon, Epes's administrators moved the circuit court to quash the execution; insisting, that Dudley had no right to sue out execution on his judgment at law for the sum as to which the injunction had been dissolved, before the decree of the court of appeals affirming that of the court of chancery, had been entered up in the latter court; in other words, that until the decree of the court of appeals should be entered in the court of chancery, the injunction originally awarded as to the whole judgment, remained in force as to the whole. The circuit court held, that Dudley's execution was regularly sued out, and overruled the motion; to which judgment, on the application of Epes's administrators, a superseas was awarded by a judge, of this court.

146 Allison, for the plaintiffs in error; Spooner, for the defendant. The argument turned chiefly upon the construction and effect of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 64, § 21, p. 195.

CARR, J. This motion is not rested on any rule of english practice, which seems admitted to be against it: nor is it rested on that general power which courts have to Gratt. 199. It is said an appeal would be utterly idle, if it did not have the effect of suspending the order of dissolution, and thereby continuing or reviving the injunction. As a necessary consequence, and for no other reason, the plaintiff at law cannot sue out execution pending the appeal: and so it was held by this court, and upon that ground only, in Turner v. Scott, etc., 5 Rand. 332. The principle of this decision was afterwards recognized by the court in Epes's Adm'rs v. Dudley, 4 Leigh 145, in which it was held that upon the affirmance in the court of appeals of a dissolution order, there was no longer any injunction, and the plaintiff at law was then at liberty to sue out his execution, without waiting till the decree of affirmance should be entered up in the chancery court.

The reasoning of the judges very properly treats the dissolution of the injunction as derived from the order of dissolution in the court below, but as rendered effectual by the decree of affirmance in the appellate court. The principal case is also cited at page 208.

See monographic notes on "Injunctions" appended to Clayton v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518, and "Appeal and Error" appended to Hill v. Salem, etc., Turnpike Co., 1 Rob. 263.

*The statute, speaking of causes brought before the court of appeals, by appeal &c. provides, that this court "may hear and determine the matter, and give such decree or judgment, if it be not affirmed watch over their process, and prevent it from being used as an engine of fraud or oppression; for the execution issued for the sum really remaining due. The justice of the case, therefore, does not require the quashing of the execution. The general purpose of an injunction is to inhibit a party possessing some legal advantage, from using it in an unconscientious manner. In reason, it would seem that so soon as this inhibition is removed, the party is reinstated, and may go on. Here, Dudley recovered a judgment at law. The defendants obtained an injunction to the whole, which the chancellor, afterwards, perpetuated for part, and dissolved for the balance. If there had been no appeal from that decree, the plaintiff at law could at once have sued out execution for that balance. The appeal suspended that right: the affirmance removed the suspension. It would seem, then, that, on general principles, as well as the justice of the case, the clerk of the court of law might well issue the execution, when a copy of the decree of affirmance was before him.

But the counsel for the appellant rests his case upon strict, positive law. He insists, that, under the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 64, p. 195, the clerk of the court of law, could not issue an execution, until the decree of the court of appeals affirming that of the court of chancery, was entered up in the court of chancery, as its decree. In the first place, I question whether this provision applies at all to bills of injunction to stay judgments at law. It directs that the court below shall enter the judgment or decree of the court of appeals as its own, and award execution thereupon. Now, we know, when a court of equity perpetuates an injunction in part, and dissolves for the balance, no execution for such balance can issue from the court of chancery. The decree of that court merely lets loose the judgment at law. But, 2ndly, what kind of judgments of this court, are, under this provision, to be certified to the court below, and there registered as their own? Not those where the judgment or decree is wholly affirmed or reversed; for, says the statute, the court may give such judgment or decree, if it be not affirmed or reversed in the whole, as the inferior court ought to have given, to be certified to such court, and entered as their own. What is to be certified? that judgment which the court below ought to have given, in cases where the judgment or decree is not wholly affirmed or reversed; for where the judgment or decree is wholly affirmed, it is still the judgment or decree of the court below, unaltered and untouched; and where it is wholly reversed, the bill is dismissed in this court. In the case before us the decree was wholly affirmed, and therefore not within the provision of the statute. I think the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

CABELL, J. The courts of law are ceror reversed in whole, as the court whose error is sought to be corrected ought to have given—with an allowance of the costs of appeal: to be certified to the court from which the matter was removed, which shall enter it as their own, and award execution thereupon accordingly."—Note in Original Edition.

tainly bound to respect orders and decrees of the courts of chancery, enjoining the parties, in suits at law, from proceeding farther in those suits, or from executing judgments which may have been recovered therein. But, in this case, there was no injunction existing at the time when the execution issued, or when the application was made to quash it. The injunction having been dissolved by the chancellor, and that dissolution affirmed by this court, the parties were, so far as related to the injunction, restored to the situation which they occupied before the injunction was awarded. The party who had recovered the judgment, might therefore proceed with his execution, unless restrained by some statute. The provision of the statute, relied upon by the appellant's counsel, as preventing the issuing of the execution till the decree of this court had been certified to the court of chancery, and there entered up, applies only to cases where an execution is to issue on the decree or judgment which has been certified by the court of appeals to the inferior court, and which has been entered as the judgment or decree of the inferior court. Now the judgment on which the party in this case took out the execution, was not the judgment of the court of appeals, nor of the court from which the appeal had been taken: it was the judgment of the circuit court of Prince George, from which no appeal had been taken. The judgment had been only enjoined; and so soon as the injunction was dissolved, the party was left free to execute it. The judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

BROOKE, J. I concur in affirming the judgment.

TUCKER, P. It seems, that, at different times, very different opinions have prevailed, as to the notice which a court of law should take of an injunction from a court of chancery. That the injunction operates upon the party only, and not upon the court, would seem to be a truism requiring no argument to support it. Accordingly, we find the doctrine distinctly stated in some cases, Ashey v. Kiger, Gilm. 158, Hill v. Turner, 1 Atk. 515, and acted upon in others, Sheffield v. Duchess of Buckinghamshire, Id. 628; Barnesley v. Powell, 1 Ves. sen. 119, 284. It is, indeed, I conceive, one of the axioms of the court. In the earlier cases, it was also held, that the court was not only not bound by the chancery order, but that it would take no notice of it. 3 Bac. Abr. Injunction B. p. 656, Tidd's Prac. 1156. In our own courts too, it was generally held that if the party enjoined chose to incur the hazard of a contempt, he might proceed at law to the trial of his case, or to take judgment on a forthcoming bond, and the like. It would seem, however, upon due reflection, to be a strange state of things, that courts forming parts of the same judicial system, should not take notice of what is legally done by each other, respectively; as, in this instance, that although the chancellor has, in the rightful exercise of his authority, enjoined a judgment, yet the court of law would permit the plaintiff in that judgment, to go on to issue his execution at his pleasure. Accordingly, it would seem to be admitted in more recent decisions, that a court of law will take notice of the injunction of a court of equity, and mould its proceedings and decisions accordingly. Thus in a case where judgment was enjoined, and execution stayed for more than a year, no scire facias to revive the judgment was held necessary, Mitchell v. Cue, 2 Burr. 660, Tidd 1156, though formerly it was held otherwise; and, I think it clear from Tidd's Book of Practice, that in Westminster hall, the proceedings in suits at law are now always stayed during the pendency of an injunction, upon certain principles established by the court. It is right that they should be so. But still it would seem to be a matter in the sound discretion of the court, since it is very clear, that a party could not plead his injunction as a matter of abatement, and still less in bar. Thus we find, that, notwithstanding an injunction, the party may, in many cases, proceed to trial and judgment, being only restrained from taking out execution; Tidd 4700. And even courts of equity themselves admit, that the plaintiff at law may proceed so far, as that he may be at liberty, eo instante that the injunction is dissolved, to take out execution. 3 Bac. Abr. Ubi supra; Morrice v. Hankey, 3 P. Wms. 146.

In the present case, the injunction had been dissolved by the court of chancery.

The evidence of dissolution was before the circuit court of Prince George. And though the appeal from the dissolution revived the injunction (Turner v. Scott, 5 Rand. 322,) and rendered it improper that the plaintiff should take out execution pending the appeal, yet the chancellor's decree having been affirmed, and the decree of affirmance produced, it was manifest there could no longer be any injunction; and therefore nothing illegal or irregular in the issue of the execution. So far from it, the plaintiff would certainly not have been liable to be proceeded against for a contempt of the injunction order in the court of appeals, and I should think, not in the court of chancery. The cause was clearly out of the court of appeals; and I incline to think, it must be considered that the injunction at least had no longer continuance in the court of chancery. That court had dissolved it; and a decree of affirmance had ratified that dissolution, and abrogated the revival by the appeal. If the appeal revived the injunction, yet the instant the appeal was at an end, its effect to revive was at an end also and the injunction of course was dissolved. In reference to this view of the subject, however, some considerations must be weighed. A doubt has been expressed, whether the party may not have procured the certificate of the affirmance prematurely. This, I think, cannot be presumed. He produced the certificate to the court of law. It must be presumed to have issued regularly. It was, moreover, strenuously argued, that the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 64, § 21, requires, in all cases, the decree of the court of appeals to be returned to the court of chancery, and there entered as its own, before it can be considered as consummate to any purpose. I doubt, whether this is a true construction of the statute. If the decree be not affirmed or reversed in whole, this court makes such decree as ought to have been given; and that decree must be entered as the decree of the court of chancery. But where there is a total affirmance, although the party cannot sue execution for his costs in chancery, or in the court of appeals, I do not perceive any reason 151 for considering *an injunction which was dissolved, and only revived by the appeal, as continuing in force until the court of chancery meets, although the appeal has been determined and the order of dissolution affirmed. If it be so, it would lead to great inconveniences and mischiefs. The plaintiff at law would not only be delayed in his recovery after the ultimate tribunal had finally passed upon the case, and pronounced a dissolution of the injunction, which it is no longer even in their power to set aside, but the defendant being protected by the operation of this principle from execution, and finding no farther chance of escape, may avail himself of the interval, to eloin his effects to the certain prejudice either of the creditor, or of innocent sureties.

Judgment affirmed.

152 *Thornton v. Winston.

January, 1833.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Executors—Renunciation in Pals.—There may be a valid renunciation of the executorship of a will, by matter in pals.

Same—Renunciation—Effect.—An executrix declines to qualify as such, and agrees that administration with the will annexed shall be granted to her daughter, reserving her right to qualify after her daughter's death: Held, this renunciation of the executorship is absolute and perpetual, and cannot be retracted after the death of the administratrix, nor does the nomination of the executrix in the will give her any preferable right to the administration de bonis non with the will annexed.

Estate of Decedent—Who Entitled to Administer.*—The person entitled to the estate of a decedent, is entitled to the administration.

Willst—Provision of Personality for Wife—Right to Residuum—Statute.—A testator by his will gives personal property to his wife, and she takes the provision made for her by the will: Held, she is entitled to no part of an undisposed of residuum, as distributee of her husband, being excluded from distribution by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 26, and in a contest between the widow and a distributee, for administration with the will annexed, the distributee is entitled to it.

John Thornton, late of Culpeper, died in 1822, having first duly made and published his last will and testament, whereby, inter alia, he devised and bequeathed sundry real and personal estate to his wife Jane Thornton (it seemed a very large provision for her) and named her and his son George Thornton executrix and executor. The will was proved in the county court of Culpeper, at April term 1822. George Thornton died in 1824, without having qualified as executor of the will; neither did Mrs. Thornton ever qualify as executrix. The testator's estate remained wholly unrepresented until the March term of the county court 1826, when the court granted administration with the will annexed to Frances Thornton, a daughter of the testator, with the express assent of the executrix Mrs. Thornton, who declared her agreement that the administration should be granted to her daughter, but said, at the same time, that she reserved her right to qualify after her daughter's death: but this assent and agreement of Mrs. Thornton, to the grant of administration with the 153 will annexed to her daughter, *and reservation of her own right to qualify after the daughter's death, were not entered of record, and, indeed, were mere parol declarations, upon which, however, the court proceeded to grant the administration. Frances Thornton, the administratrix, died in 1828.

The testator, John Thornton, had been an officer of the army during the war of the revolution, and, as such, had a claim against the U. States for half pay for life from the termination of his service, or commutation of five years full pay: this claim was nowise disposed of, or even mentioned, in his will, so that, as to it, he died intestate. The testator, besides his son George and daughter Frances, left several descendants living at his death; namely, several grandchildren, the children of a daughter then deceased, and a grandson, James Winston, the only child of another daughter then also deceased, who had been the wife of Isaac Winston: these grandchildren, of course, were distributees of the testator, and entitled to shares of the personal subject undisposed of by his will. The grandson James Winston died in 1831, leaving a will, by which he devised and bequeathed his whole estate real and personal, and especially his share of his grandfather's recently discovered claim against the U. States, to his father Isaac Winston, the appellee.

It being necessary that the testator's estate should be represented, in order to prosecute the claim against the U. States, Isaac Winston applied to the county court of Culpeper, at February term 1832, for administration de bonis non, with the will annexed; and his application was opposed by the appellant, Mrs. Thornton, the widow of the testator and executrix named in his will, who at the same time applied for a grant of the administration to her. The county court, at April term 1832, by one sentence, denied the administration to Winston, and by another, granted it to Mrs. Thornton. Winston appealed to the circuit court of Culpeper, which reversed both the sentences, of the county court, and granted the administration to Winston. And 154 *then, upon the application of Mrs.

Thornton, this court allowed her an appeal from the sentence of the circuit court. Harrison argued for the appellant, 1. That she had, in effect, never renounced the executorship of her husband's will: that it was necessary to constitute a valid renunciation

*Executors and Administrators—Right to Appointment—Persons Preferred.—On this question the principal case is cited in foot-note to Cutchin v. Wilkinson, 1 Call 1; Bridgeman v. Bridgeman, 30 W. Va. 218, 3 S. E. Rep. 584. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

*Wills—Provision for Wife—Failure to Renounce—Right to Residuum.—In Dupree v. Cary, 6 Leigh 37, it is held that, where a provision is made for the wife by the will of her husband, which she does not renounce, she has no right to any more of her husband's estate than that which was bequeathed to her by the will. The statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 26, p. 381, is express: so are all the cases on this point, the last of which is Thornton v. Winston, 4 Leigh 152. See monographic note on "Wills."

of such a right, that the executrix should have been cited to appear before the court of probat, and should thereupon have renounced the executorship, and such renunciation entered and recorded; that a refusal by any act in pais, as by a mere verbal declaration to that effect, is not sufficient, but to give it validity it must be thus solemnly entered and recorded. Toller's Law of ex'ors, 41, 2, 93.* He said the cases of Geddy v. Butler, 3 Munf. 345, Nelson v. Carrington, 4 Id. 332, and Burnley v. Duke, 1 Rand. 108, in which it had been held that the renunciation of an executorship may be by act in pais, were distinguishable from the present case: in those cases, the right to the administration was not, as it was here, the point in contest. And here, as the executrix did not, by any act valid in law, renounce the executorship, so neither did she, in fact, renounce or intend to renounce it; for she expressly reserved her right to qualify after the death of her daughter, to whom she agreed, that administration with the will annexed should be granted. 2. He contended, that if the executrix had, in the most solemn and binding manner, renounced the executorship, and thereupon administration with the will annexed had been granted to another,—though she could not have retracted her refusal during the lifetime of the administrator, yet she had a right to do so after the grant of administration had ceased by the administrator's death, and then would have been entitled to the executorship or to the administration de bonis non with the will annexed; to which point he cited Toll. Law of ex'ors, 45, 92. But, 3. Supposing this a general question which of the 155 parties was entitled "to administration of the decedent's estate, the statute gave the preference to the widow over all other persons. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 20, 32, pp. 379, 382.

W. Green and Leigh, for the appellee, maintained, that a valid and binding renunciation of the right of executorship may be made by act in pais, and that the cases of Geddy v. Butler, Nelson v. Carrington, and Burnley v. Duke, were in point to that purpose. And they cited the case of Broker v. Charter, Cro. Eliz. 92, to shew, not only that an executor's renunciation of executorship may as well be by matter in fact as by judicial act, but that such a renunciation once made by an executor, however qualified, in favor of a particular person, is absolute, peremptory and perpetual. The reason was, that though an executor may renounce, he cannot assign, his right of executorship. The executrix, in this case, having duly renounced the executorship, and the other executor named in the will having previously died without ever qualifying, the testator was dead intestate (that is, in the technical sense, without having constituted any executor) as much as if he had made a testamentary disposition of his property without naming any executor, in which case the paper (technically speaking) would have been a codicil. 3 Bac. Abr. Ex'ors and Adm'rs, C. p. 27; Shep. Touchs. 406. It was, indeed, only because the decedent, in such case, was thus intestate in law, that an administration could be granted: and when,

by the refusal of a sole executor, if only one, or of all the executors, if more than one named in the will, or of the survivors after the death of the others, a decedent was become intestate in law, there could never afterwards be an executor, but only an administrator with the will annexed; and the refusing executor could neither qualify as executor, nor derive, from the nomination of him as executor in the will, any preferable claim to the administration: he stood, now, on the same ground as if he had not been named executor in the will. Broker v. Charter, ubi supra; Hensloe's case, 9 Co. 37, 38, 40; 156 Shep. Touchs. 461, 2, 6, 7; Plowd. *281, 2; Wangford v. Wangford, 1 Salk. 308; House v. Lord Petre, Id. 311. As to the passages cited by the appellant's counsel from Toller's Law of ex'ors, 42, 3, 92, that, after administration granted in consequence of an executor's renunciation of the executorship, the executor cannot retract his refusal during the lifetime of the administrator, but he may do so after the grant has ceased by the administrator's death; they said, it would be found, that the proposition was not sustained by any authority; on the contrary, the authorities were the other way. Then, if the appellant had no preferable claim to the administration by reason of the testator's nomination of her to the office of executrix, which she had renounced, she had certainly no preferable claim to administration as the widow of the testator, or rather, no claim to it at all on that ground, because she had no manner of interest in the estate undisposed of by the testator's will, and as to which he was intestate. The will made a provision for her (and apparently a most ample one) in real and personal property; she never renounced the provision made for her by the will; and, therefore, she could never claim any thing from the testator's personal estate besides that which his will gave her. The statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 26, p. 381, provides, that a widow dissatisfied with the provision made for her by her husband's will, may renounce such provision within the year after his death,—but that every widow, not making such renunciation, "shall have no more of her husband's slaves and personal estate than is given her by his will." The appellant, then, had no interest in the estate to be administered; and the appellee was entitled to a distributive share of it. Therefore, she had no claim to the administration, and the appellee had a claim to it as a distributee. Cutchin v. Wilkinson, 1 Call 1; Hendren v. Colgin, 4 Munf. 237; Bray v. Dudgeon, 6 Munf. 132.

CARR, J. The first point made for the appellant, was, that her assent to her daughter's taking administration being *in pais, was not such a renunciation of the executorship, as bound her. But it has been expressly decided by this court, in Geddy v. Butler, Nelson v. Carrington, and Burnley v. Duke, that such renunciation may be effectually made by declarations in pais, or may be presumed from circumstances.

It was next insisted, that this renunciation, though it might for the time authorize the grant of administration to the daughter, was no peremptory renunciation, but that on the death of her daughter, the widow still had a right to qualify as executrix. The passage cited from Toller's Law of ex'ors, 42, certainly supports the proposition; but that passage itself is not only wholly unsupported, but seems directly in opposition to the books there referred to. Toller says, "After refusal by the executor and administration granted, the party is incapable of assuming the executorship during the lifetime of such administrator, but after the death of the administrator, he may retract his renunciation:" and Wentw. Off. Ex'or, Swinburne, and 3 Bac. Abr. are cited in the margin. Now, in Wentw. Off. Ex'or, 38, I find this passage—"After refusal, and administration committed, the executor cannot go back, to prove the will, and assume the executorship"—almost the words used by Toller in the first part of the sentence, but unqualified by his assertion that the executor may retract after the death of the administrator. And (p. 41,) Wentworth gives the reason why there can be no such power of retraction: "It is clear, he says, that if there be but one executor, and he refuse, or being many, if they do all refuse, then is the party dead intestate, and administration is to be committed with the will annexed. Nor can any after meddle as executors." Certainly, the party could never be said to be dead intestate, if there were a person living who might, under any circumstances, still claim to qualify as executor. So, in Swinburne, part 6, § 12, it is said—"But after refusal, and administration committed to another, the executor cannot recede from it, and go back to prove the will, and assume the executorship." *And in 3 Bac. Abr. 42, it is said, still more strongly—"If an executor refuse before the ordinary, to take upon him the executorship, the ordinary may grant administration cum testamento annexo to another person, and he can never afterwards be permitted to prove the will." In Rolle's Abr. 907, it is said, "if all the executors refuse to administer, administration shall be granted, for then the testator is dead intestate;" and he cites several of the year books. In Graysbrook v. Fox, Plowd. 281, it is said, "where a man makes his executors, who refuse, the ordinary may commit administration to others, because, upon the matter he died intestate." And in Hensloe's case, 9 Co. 40, the court lay it down, that "the reason why the ordinary may, upon the refusal of all the executors, or their death intestate, grant administration, is, because now the testator dies intestate, and then the statute 31 Ed. 3, gives him power to grant it, which he cannot do, when one refuses, and the other proves." Upon all these authorities as well as the clear reason of the case, I am well satisfied, that the passage in Toller is erroneous, and that when an executor has once renounced, and administration has been committed, he can never retract his renunciation.

It was contended, in the last place, that the wife has the best right to administration under our statute; and this, though it be clear (as in the case before us it is) that she has no interest in the residuum; nothing to do with the personality beyond the provision made for her by the will. But this is a question concluded, as I conceive, by our own decisions, and these decisions founded on the law and reason of the case. In Cutchin v. Wilkinson, Hendren v. Colgin, and Bray v. Dudgeon (cited at the bar), this court has decided, that the person entitled to the estate, is entitled to the administration, and, in the last case, this was so adjudged against a husband seeking administration on his wife's estate,—a case in point. I am of opinion, on the whole, that the sentence must be affirmed.

159 *CABELL, J. I am also of opinion, that the sentence should be affirmed.

TUCKER, P. The attempt to sustain the claim of the appellant, in this case, to the administration of the estate of her husband, rests upon three grounds—1. that she was the executrix named in the will, and has never refused the executorship; 2. that if her verbal declaration could be considered a refusal, she had a right to retract it after the death of the first administratrix; and 3. that if that be not so, she had as widow the preferable right to the administration.

As to the first proposition, it rests upon the assumption that a verbal declaration in pais does not amount to a refusal, but that a valid renunciation can only be by act done before the court of probat. Whatever may have been the former doctrines of the ecclesiastical courts, it seems to have been admitted in the case of Broker v. Charter, Cro. Eliz. 92, that a letter written by the executors declaring their inability to attend to the duties of executor, was held a valid renunciation; and upon that occasion, Dr. Ford declared before the justices, that by the civil law, a renouncing may be by a matter in fact as well as by judicial act, and that a refusal might even be by parol. This case seems to have been not only unquestioned, but it is also set forth by the various elementary writers as containing the law of the subject. In our courts too, it has been repeatedly adjudged, that the renunciation of an executorship may be by act in pais; and, in like manner, our statute makes the refusal or failure of all the executors to give security, equivalent to a refusal of the executorship. In the present case, it appears that when Frances Thornton, the first person who administered on the estate, was appointed, Mrs. Thornton declared her agreement that Frances should qualify, but at the same time reserved her right to qualify after her death. Now this agreement by an executor, that another shall qualify as administrator, amounts of course to a refusal of the executorship; because the executor thereby consents, that his *testator shall be considered as having died technically intestate, that is without executor. It is a consent that the interest in the estate, which the testator had cast upon him, should be withdrawn from him and cast upon another, and of course inevitably implies a renunciation of that interest himself. Here, it is true, the widow reserved her right to qualify after Frances Thornton's death; and this leads to the 2nd Inquiry; whether she had a right to retract her renunciation after Frances Thornton's death? This rests upon a mere question of law: for the reservation of her subsequent right to qualify, can only have effect if it should appear she had such subsequent right. The passages which have been cited from Toller's treatise, go fully to the point, that if an executor renounces, and an administrator is appointed, though the executor cannot retract in his lifetime, he may after his death, however formally the renunciation may have been made. Upon examination, however, this particular proposition seems wholly unfounded in authority. The editor of the new edition of the Office of Executors, seems to have considered it as sustained by Bacon's abridgement and by Swinburne, part 6, § 12, but in neither of those is there the slightest intimation of any such opinion. The case of Broker v. Charter moreover contains the declaration of Dr. Ford, very explicitly, that the renunciation of the executor cannot be partial, or only for a time, but is absolute and perpetual; and though the case itself is not in point here, since in that case the administrator was yet living when the act occurred retracting the renunciation, yet this declaration of a doctor of the civil law (who was, I presume, of the prerogative court) cannot be of less authority than the unsupported dictum of Toller. The proposition, indeed, seems at variance with fundamental principles. By the common law, he who made a will without naming an executor, was technically considered as dying intestate; and if an executor was appointed, and he refused, the testator was then considered intestate. By the common law, also, the 161 appointment of an executor gave him a right to the residuum *after the payment of debts and legacies, unless that right was expressly or impliedly excluded by the will. On the other hand, where the decedent died intestate, the ordinary, in early times, took the one-third of the estate in pios usus; and then, when administrators came to be appointed, they were at first deemed to be entitled to the residuum after payment of debts; and, afterwards, were compelled to make distribution. Hence it is obvious, that the residuum went, in right of property, to the executor, if he qualified; but if he did not, it went to the administrator in his own right, or as fiduciary. The effect, then, of a renunciation by the executor, was to part with this right of property; to consent that his testator should be deemed to have died intestate as to it, and to agree that it should pass into the hands of such person as the ordinary should make administrator, for the benefit of those by law entitled. This is of the nature of a transfer of a right or title in personal property; and hence it may be truly said, in the language of Dr. Ford, that, after the renunciation, the executor shall never retract, quia transit in contractum. The right of property has passed, and cannot be arbitrarily reclaimed: the testator has been admitted to be intestate, and the rights which thereby vested cannot be revoked and annulled by again considering him testate. The affairs of estates would be eternally unsettled, if such irregularities were permitted; and though it is true the executor is not now entitled to the residuum, and that the principles out of which the rule has grown, have been in part repudiated by our law, yet the practice to which they gave rise must still be adhered to. I am, therefore, of opinion, that after a refusal by an executor, and the appointment of an administrator, there is no right on the part of an executor to retract his refusal upon the death of the administrator.

Then, 3rdly, upon the death of Frances Thornton, when it became necessary to appoint an administrator de bonis non, had Mrs. Thornton a preferable right to the appointment? Admitting, that, in the appointment of an administrator 162 *de bonis non, the same preferences are to be observed as in the original grant of administration, and admitting that Mrs. Thornton's permission to Frances Thornton to administer, was no waiver of her preferable right, still that right would or would not exist, according as she had or had not an interest in the testator's estate. For, notwithstanding the strong language of the statute, it cannot at this day be contested, that the right of administration mainly follows the title to the personal estate. This has been repeatedly decided in Virginia; and it is the settled law of England, Toll. 116. So far, indeed, is the doctrine carried, which gives the administration to the person entitled to the property, that although the statute directs the husband or wife to be preferred, yet their claims will yield when the estate is to go to other persons; as, where by settlement upon the death of the feme, her property is to pass to her representatives to the exclusion of her husband, her relations shall have the administration in preference to the husband or his representatives; Toll. 85, 116; Bray v. Dudgeon, 6 Munf. 132. Now, in this case, I take it the widow is entitled to no portion of the residuum. She has had an ample provision made for her by her husband's will; and if not, yet she has not renounced the will: and the law emphatically declares, as to the personality, that if she does not declare her refusal of the provision made for her by the will, within a limited time, she shall have no more of her husband's slaves and personal estate than is given her by his will. It is not correct to suppose, that such provision must be declared, or averred to be, in lieu of her distributable share: there is no such language in this statute. In the statute concerning dower, indeed, it is made necessary to bar dower, that the estate conveyed must be, expressly or by averment, in lieu of the dower of the wife; but that provision is confined to the real estate, and to that alone do all the cases refer, in which it has been held, that a wife may take the provision made for her by her husband's will, and her dower also.

Sentence affirmed.

Wills—Manumission of Slaves—Decree—Case at Bar.
—Testator by his will desires, that, when his affairs are settled and all his debts paid, his slaves be emancipated according to law, and those under age and over forty to be equally in the care of his wife, son and daughter, and that the above may be done by his executors: upon bill in chancery by slaves (suing in forma pauperis) against the executor, charging that ample fund has been raised out of their profits to pay debts, and praying an account of administration, and of their profits, and decree for their manumission and for excess of profits above the debts, the chancellor, in 1809, finding that ample fund to pay the debts has been raised out of the profits, though debts not yet finally liquidated and paid, decrees, that the executor shall manumit them, reserving liberty to them to resort to the court, for a distribution of any surplus of profits which might remain after liquidation and payment of debts, or for other arrangement in respect to such surplus: the debts are not finally liquidated and paid till 1827, when there appears a surplus of profits: and now, the freedmen claim this surplus, the testator's next of kin claim it, and the executor claims it—HELD,

1. Same—Same—Same—Final.—The decree of 1809 is a final decree as to the manumission, but makes no disposition of the surplus of profits.
2. Same—Same—Right to Profits Accruing during Bondage.—The freedmen are not entitled to the surplus of profits accruing while they were actually held in bondage; negroes recovering freedom by suit in forma pauperis, cannot, in any case, recover profits or damages.
3. Same—Right of Executor to Surplus of Profits.—The executor is not entitled to the surplus of profits, but the same is part of his testator's estate undisposed of by his will, which belongs to his next of kin.
4. Same—Same—Statute.—It seems, that since the statute of distributions of 1785, the executor is not, in any case, entitled to the residuum of his testator's personal estate not actually bequeathed away by the will.

William Walker, late of Brunswick, who died in 1789, by his last will and testament, devised and bequeathed as follows: "After my debts are paid and all accounts together with merchants' accounts are settled and discharged by my executors hereafter named, I give my beloved wife Sarah the land I now live on during her life, and all the stock of each kind, and the household furniture, until my daughter Sarah and my son Leonard come of age or marry; then they shall have as much of either of these articles, together with stock of each kind, as she can spare—And the above land, after my wife's death, to my daughter Sarah and her 164 *heirs forever—And the land on James river to my son Leonard, to him and his heirs forever. I also desire, when my affairs are settled and all my debts paid, that my negroes be emancipated according to law, excepting one known by the name of Lud, whose services of two years I reserve longer than the rest; then he also shall be liberated: and those under age or over forty, to be equally in the care of my beloved wife, daughter and son. I desire, that the above may be done by Benjamin Jones and my brother David Walker, whom I appointed executors &c." Jones alone qualified as executor; he died in 1801; and Peter Robinson was his executor, and so became executor of Walker also.

In 1805, the slaves of Walker's estate (suing in forma pauperis, by leave of chancellor Wythe, under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 124,) exhibited their bill in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, against Robinson the executor of Jones and of Walker, and Leonard Walker, the son, and John Paup husband of Sarah the daughter, of the testator Walker; Wherein after setting forth Walker's will, they alleged, that a fund had already been raised out of the profits of their labor, more than sufficient to pay all the debts of that testator, and that therefore they were then entitled to demand deeds of emancipation, but that they were still held in bondage, some by Robinson the executor, and others by Leonard Walker and Paup; and they prayed accounts of Jones's and Robinson's administrations of the testator's estate, and of the profits of the slaves held by them, as well as of those held by the other two defendants, respectively; and a decree for the immediate manumission of the plaintiffs, and for the surplus of their profits over and above the testator's debts.

Robinson in his answer, shewed, that he was informed, after the death of his immediate testator Jones, of the existence of large claims against the estate of the first testator Walker, chiefly for debts contracted by him to british merchants before the revolution, for which suits were soon afterwards brought 165 against him, and these suits were still pending,*and the results very uncertain; that, therefore, he had hired out such of the slaves whereof Jones died in possession, from year to year, and should continue to do so, until he should raise a fund sufficient to pay the amount of the debts claimed, and no longer; intending, if the amount of debts which should be recovered of him, should fall short of the fund so raised, to pay the surplus to the plaintiffs when they should be manumitted; and that the other defendants, who were in possession of part of the slaves at Jones's death, and had since withheld them from him, were bound to account to him for the profits thereof, to be added to the profits he should himself receive, and thus the sooner to accomplish a sufficient fund for payment of the debts, and hasten the period of the plaintiffs' liberation.

The other defendants answered, that the first executor Jones, from the death of the testator Walker till 1795, left the old and young slaves in the care of the testator's widow on the plantation devised to her, with as many able bodied slaves as sufficed to maintain those who were chargeable, and hired out the other able bodied slaves: that, in 1795, the widow being dead, he divided the young and old slaves under twenty-one and over forty years of age, equally between Leonard the son, and Paup the husband

*Decrees—Cause Retained on Docket—Effect upon Finality of Decree.—In Nelson v. Jennings, 2 Pat. & H. 381, it is said, in Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh 108 (see also, foot-note to same case), a decree was rendered disposing of the whole subject, deciding all questions in controversy, ascertaining the rights of the parties and awarding costs, and a commissioner appointed to sell the property, to account for and pay the proceeds to the parties, with liberty to them to apply to the court to add other commissioners, and substitute new commissioners, or have a decree for a partition of the property directed to be sold. By the unanimous opinion of all the judges who sat in the cause it was held that the decree was final. The principle of this case was affirmed in the cases of Paup v. Mingo, 4 Leigh 163, and Thorn-ton v. Fitzhugh, 4 Leigh 206, in each of which cases the causes were retained on the docket, for further proceedings to be had therein showing clearly that the mere fact that the cause being retained in court and on the docket does not divest a decree of its finality.

of Sarah the daughter, of the testator, retaining the slaves between twenty-one and forty, and hiring them out from year to year: that these defendants had ever since held the young and old slaves so put into their possession by Jones, and claimed to hold them; for, they insisted, that the testator, in providing that the slaves under age and over forty should be equally in the care of his wife, son and daughter, intended to give them the young as well as the old, in order that by the labor of such as were profitable they might maintain those who were chargeable.

It appeared that Jones, and after him Robinson, acted with perfect good faith towards the slaves whom their testator Walker intended to manumit, as well as to the creditors of his estate: That Jones's object was, to leave in the care of his 166 *testator's family, the young and old slaves, of whom the profits would not be more than equal to the charges, until he should complete his administration, and to raise a fund out of the profits of the middle aged and able bodied, to pay the debts he knew to be due, and such as he was apprised might be claimed; and for some two or three years before his death, it seemed, he suffered the slaves he had retained in his possession, to take and enjoy the profits they earned, and only withheld deeds of emancipation from them, because he had reason to apprehend, that there might be other debts, particularly british debts, for which the slaves, as well as their profits, might be liable as assets in his hands: And that as to Robinson, suits were brought against him, by british creditors of Walker, for large debts, very shortly after he took upon him the executorship; that he was wholly ignorant whether these claims were just, or to what extent they were so; that the suits were still pending and the results uncertain, and he was very diligently defending them; and that in retaining the slaves, as he did, and hiring them out from year to year, he was discharging his duty judiciously as well as faithfully, without the least design to reap any advantage to himself.

The accounts prayed for in the bill, were ordered. And the accounts taken and reported by the commissioner, brought the account of profits of the slaves down to the year 1809, inclusive; at the end of which year, it appeared, that Leonard Walker would have received profits of the slaves held by him, to the amount of 2335 dollars, and Paup, for profits of the slaves held by him, 2059 dollars; that the balance of the profits received by Jones in his lifetime, was 4256 dollars; and that the balance of the profits received by Robinson, at the end of the year 1809, would be 3628 dollars.

Upon this report coming in, chancellor Taylor, at June term 1809,—finding that a fund amply sufficient to meet all claims against the testator Walker's estate, had been raised out of the profits of his slaves, the plaintiffs in this suit,—decreed, that they should all (except Lud) be free to all 167 *intentions and purposes on the 1st January 1810, and that Lud should be free on the 1st January 1812; and that Robinson should execute proper deeds of emancipation to each and all of the plaintiffs, and should execute bonds to the justices of the county courts of the counties wherein the plaintiffs resided, respectively, for the maintenance of the young and the aged and such as were unsound in mind or body, out of the estate of Walker in his hands—liberty being reserved to the plaintiffs, or any of them, to resort to the court for a distribution of any surplus of the fund raised from their profits, which might remain after the debts due from Walker's estate should be liquidated and fully discharged, or for any other arrangement in respect to such surplus.

In this decree all parties acquiesced. Robinson in pursuance of it, executed the deeds of emancipation, and gave bonds for the maintenance of such of the freedmen as might become chargeable; and shortly afterwards died. Meantime, the suits of the creditors of Walker's estate were still pending; they were all strenuously contested by Robinson's executors, and some of them with success. These suits were not finally determined till 1827. Such of the creditors as recovered judgments, were paid out of that part of the fund arising from the profits of the slaves, which had been reported to be in Robinson's hands, and the interest thereon accrued; and after paying all the debts, there was a surplus remaining.

Whereupon, Mingo and others, the freedmen manumitted by the decree of June 1809, presented their petition to the chancellor, shewing that there was a surplus in the hands of Robinson's executors; claiming this surplus; and praying, that accounts might be directed to ascertain the amount thereof, and the proportions in which it ought to be distributed among the petitioners. Robinson's executors made no objection; and the accounts were ordered accordingly.

In the accounts taken and reported in pursuance of this order, Robinson's executors were charged with 3628 dollars, the balance 168 of profits in his hands in 1809, and with *all interest thereon accrued, and credited for the debts adjudged against Walker's estate; and the uncontested balance in their hands, in December 1827, was 4815 dollars, principal and interest. And a scheme was reported for the distribution of this balance of profits among the freedmen who had earned them; those, namely, who had been retained by Jones in 1795, and coming after Jones's death to Robinson's possession, had been hired out by him.

But, before any other order had been taken upon the petition, the representatives of Leonard Walker the son, and of Paup the husband of Sarah the daughter, of the testator Walker (the original parties being now dead), exhibited a bill against Mingo and others, the freedmen, and Robinson's executors; wherein they claimed the whole balance in the hands of the executors; insisting, that the freedmen were not entitled to any part of their profits which accrued before their actual emancipation; and that whatever balance might be now in the hands of Robinson's executors on this account, and the balance likewise which had been ascertained to be due from the estate of Jones upon the account taken in 1809, appertained to the testator Walker's estate, and not having been disposed of by his will, devolved to his distributees.

The freedmen Mingo and others answered this bill, asserting their right to the money in question.

And then Robinson's executors (at the express instance of his distributees) insisted, that the money belonged neither to the freedmen nor to Walker's distributees, but to Robinson's own estate.

The chancellor declared that the freedmen were entitled to the surplus of profits accrued before their actual manumission; and, therefore, directed distribution among them, according to the scheme reported by the commissioner, of the balance of 4815 dollars in the hands of Robinson's executors; and dismissed the bill recently filed by the representatives of Paup and of L. Walker: but no order was taken as to the balances of 169 profits reported in 1809 to be due *from the estate of Jones, from Paup, and from L. Walker, respectively. From this decree, Paup's and Walker's administrators, by petition to a judge of this court, prayed an appeal; which was allowed.

The cause was argued here, by Johnson for the appellants, Spooner for the appellees Mingo and others, the freedmen, and Leigh for Robinson's executors.*

I. Johnson argued, that the decree of June 1809, was erroneous in directing the manumission of the slaves of the testator Walker's estate. The direction contained in his will, that his slaves should be emancipated by his executors after his affairs were settled and all his debts paid, was not an effectual instrument of emancipation, within the meaning of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 53, p. 433. For, though prospective emancipations of slaves had been upheld, those were emancipations, so appointed to take effect at a certain time or on a certain event, as that when the right to freedom accrued, the slaves were emancipated by force of the will alone. Here, the period at which the manumission was designed, was altogether uncertain; and the actual manumission also depended on the discretion of the executors. It was only a delegation to them of the power to manumit. At any rate, the slaves were not entitled to emancipation until the affairs of the testator were settled and all his debts paid; which (without the least suspicion of fraudulent procrastination) was not accomplished till 1827. Till then, the testator designed they should be held as slaves by his executor; till then, they might justly, and ought to have been held as slaves by them: and so long as the executors held them as slaves, they could not maintain any suit whatever against their owners; for only such persons unjustly held in 170 *bondage, as are actually entitled to freedom, can be allowed to sue their masters in forma pauperis, under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 124, § 4, p. 481.

Spooner and Leigh said, they thought there could be no serious doubt, that the suit in forma pauperis brought by the slaves in 1805, with leave of the chancellor, was authorized by the statute concerning pauper suits; and that the decree of June 1809, directing that these people should be manumitted, was entirely correct. But, supposing those proceedings were wrong, they maintained, that this court could not now examine and correct them. For the decree, so far, certainly, as it directed the manumission of the slaves, was final; and not the less so because it reserved liberty to them, to resort to the court for a distribution of any surplus of their profits; Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh 108. From this final decree, no appeal had ever been taken; the decree had been acquiesced in, and executed; and to any appeal from the decree now, the statute of limitation of appeals was a conclusive bar. Besides, in the bill exhibited by the appellants, they nowise contested that decree in respect to the manumission of the slaves; they only claimed the surplus of profits, which, as they contended, were not thereby disposed of.

II. Spooner argued, very strenuously, that the slaves were entitled to the surplus of their own profits. He said, that the effect of the testator Walker's will, was to give freedom to his slaves, subject only to the just claims of his creditors; in which respect, this emancipation was nowise different from every other emancipation of slaves; for, in every such case, the manumitted slaves were by law liable for debts. The first executor Jones, in fact, assented to the bequest of freedom to the slaves which after 1795 he retained in his own hands, some two or three years before his death, by permitting them to enjoy their own earnings; and he was right in doing so; for it was now certain, that the fund he had raised from the profits of the slaves retained by himself (independ-

171 *put into the possession of Paup and L. Walker), was much more than sufficient to pay all his testator's debts. The fund which Jones had raised was 4206 dollars; and a less sum, namely 3628 dollars, raised by Robinson afterwards, out of the profits of the same slaves to whom Jones before his death had given the rights of freemen, had proved not only sufficient to pay all the debts, but had left a large surplus; and it was only this surplus, which the chancellor had distributed among the freedmen who had earned it. The slave retained by Jones in 1795, should be considered as having been actually emancipated from the time that he permitted them to enjoy their own earnings: it was not necessary to complete the manumission of them, that he should have given them deeds of emancipation; the testator's will was the instrument of emancipation; the executor had nothing to do but to liberate them; Dunn v. Amey, 1 Leigh 465. When Robinson, after Jones's death, took possession of these people, he took possession of persons who were, and of right ought to have been, freemen. He, indeed, did not intend any injustice: he was informed of large claims against Walker's estate, which (if they were just), he knew these persons might have been sold to pay; and being ignorant whether those claims were just, or to what amount they were so, he resumed the rights of owner, only for the purpose of raising a fund out of the profits to pay the debts, with intent, as he declared in his answer, to give them the benefit of the surplus; so that, in truth, he constituted himself their trustee, and acted throughout with a view to their benefit; in other words, he treated them as freedmen. In this point of view, he said, this case was altogether different from the common case of persons illegally held in bondage, recovering their freedom from the person holding them, and claiming to hold them, as slaves. In such case, it had been held, that profits accrued during the actual state of bondage, were not recoverable; which, to be sure, was hard enough. But Robinson took a very peculiar position; that of trustee both for the creditors of

*They had put in no answer to the bill filed by the representatives of Paup and of L. Walker: but, by consent of counsel for all parties, it was agreed, that their claim to the subject should be now considered by this court, and determined, as if they had put in their answer to that bill, asserting such claim.—Note in Original Edition.

Walker's estate and for Walker's
172 *freedmen; trustee for the creditors to raise a fund equal to the satisfaction of their claims; and trustee for the freedmen (who were liable to be taken and sold for the debts) to raise the fund for the debts, out of their earnings, and to preserve the surplus of their profits, if any, for their own use. It would be most unreasonable to interdict, or to exempt, Robinson's executors from doing what he intended, and what was in itself at once benevolent and just. But he insisted, that this point also was determined and concluded by the decree of June 1809, in which the court, in effect, declared that the surplus of the profits belonged to the freedmen, by reserving liberty to them to apply to the court for distribution of it. The decree was as final and irreversible in respect to this point, as in respect to the emancipation.

Johnson answered, that if the decree of June 1809 was final as to the emancipation (indeed, he could not help wishing that it might be so regarded), it certainly was not final as to the surplus of profits; for the decree made no disposition of it; it did not adjudge it to the freedmen; it only reserved liberty to them to ask it. Then, as to the right to the profits, he shewed, that, in fact, Jones never liberated the slaves of Walker's estate, nor intended to do so; that he intended, as his duty required him, to hold them as slaves till the debts of his testator should be ascertained, and the affairs of his estate settled; that, if he gave them their own earnings, or any other money, or any other indulgence, he yet retained all his right of property in them, and it had been folly in him to relinquish it: that Robinson succeeded to the rights of Jones, as well as his duties, and acted on the same principles, he too holding these people as slaves, and taking the profits of them as property, till the chancellor directed him to manumit them: in short, that the actual manumission of the slaves was accomplished by the decree of June 1809, and the execution of the deeds of emancipation in pursuance of it. Such being the state of facts, the claim of the freedmen to the surplus of profits could not be sustained. The 173 course of adjudication, long *before as well as since the case of Pleasants v. Pleasants, 2 Call 319, 342, 3, had been quite uniform on this point; and it must be regarded as the settled law, that persons illegally held in bondage recovering their freedom, are in no case entitled to recover profits: a rule which might, at the first view, seem hard and unjust, but if it was necessary, it were easy to shew, the considerations of justice and policy, and even humanity, on which it was founded. Much less were the freedmen, in this case, entitled to profits; for they had been legally held in bondage, until the chancellor directed them to be liberated. Robinson's intention to give these people the surplus of profits, is immaterial: the surplus of profits was not his own to dispose of; or, if it was, his executors were not bound to fulfil such his mere intention to give away this money, conceived, probably, under a mistake of law on the subject.

III. Supposing the chancellor's decree wrong in giving the surplus of profits to the freedmen, a question arose, between the representatives of Paup and of L. Walker and Robinson's executors, whether the former were entitled to this money as distributees of the testator Walker, or the latter entitled to hold it as part of Robinson's own estate?

On this point, Leigh argued, for Robinson's executors, 1st, That as the subject in question was certainly nowise disposed of by Walker's will, it devolved to his executors. The common law, without doubt, would have given it to them: the question was, whether the statute of distributions of 1785,* had repealed the common law in this particular, and given the residuum of a testator's 174 estate, not otherwise disposed of *by his will, to his next of kin? In Shelton's ex'ors v. Shelton, 1 Wash. 64, president Pendleton suggested (for he did not intimate an opinion) that the statute of 1785 might have that effect; that the words in the statute, or any part thereof, referred to, and directed distribution of, every thing that was not actually bequeathed in a will. But Green, J., in Wernick v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. 78, controverted that suggestion, and shewed, that the right of an executor to the surplus stands on the same footing in Virginia as in England. But however this might be, he contended, 2ndly, That Walker's distributees were not entitled to the money in question: that Robinson, in holding Walker's freedmen as slaves, after having raised out of their profits a fund sufficient to pay the debts of that testator, must be regarded as a wrong-doer towards the freedmen, and towards them only—an unintentional wrong-doer, certainly, if there ever was one, for in the actual situation of the estate when he succeeded to the executorship, to have liberated them might have rendered him personally liable to the creditors, for a devastavit to the full amount of their value—but still he was a wrong-doer towards the freedmen only. He said, there was no principle on which Walker's distributees could found a claim for money received by Robinson, in consequence of a tort committed by him toward the freedmen. The freedmen, but for the peculiar rule of law applicable to such cases, would be entitled to the profits accruing from themselves while they were illegally held in bondage,—profits which accrued after they were entitled to freedom, but before it was adjudged to them: but the rule which exempted Robinson from accountability for the profits to them, did not give the profits to the distributees of Walker, the purpose of whose will was the emancipation of his slaves, subject only to the payment of his debts. The claim of Walker's distributees was, in effect, a claim to make the fruits of Robinson's injustice towards his freedmen, a part of Walker's estate.

*The statute of distributions of 1785, ch. 61, § 25, 12 Hen. Stat. at large, p. 146, provided, that "when any person shall die intestate as to his goods and chattels, or any part thereof, after funeral debts and just expenses paid," the estate shall be distributed among the next of kin, as therein directed. The words or any part thereof, were first introduced into the statute of distributions by the act of 1785, as may be seen by comparing it with the former statute on the subject: 1706, ch. 23, § 2, 3, 8 Hen. Stat. at large, p. 371. The provision of the statute of 1785, has been ever since retained: 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 29, p. 382.—Note in Original Edition.

175 *Johnson for the appellants, maintained, 1st, That president Pendleton's suggestion as to the effect of the statute of distributions of 1785, was founded on the just construction of the statute; that the legislature, in providing that when a person should die intestate as to his goods and chattels or any part thereof, the estate should be distributed, intended to provide for the cases of entire and of partial intestacy, in the common acceptation of the phrase; cases, namely, in which a decedent should leave no will, or should leave a will in which no disposition was made of part of his personalty; not for cases of intestacy, in the technical sense in which a decedent was said to be intestate, only because, though he left a will, he had omitted to appoint an executor. 2ndly, He adverted again to the will of the testator Walker, which directed that his slaves should be emancipated by his executors, "when his affairs were settled and all his debts were paid:" and, he said, the testator could not have intended, that the executors should raise out of the profits of the slaves, a fund barely sufficient to pay his debts, and then emancipate them; for he must have known, that the amount of his debts was uncertain, and that his executors could form no estimate of them. He intended, then, that his executors should hold his slaves as slaves, until his affairs were settled, since, until then, it could not be known what would be the amount of debts to be paid. If upon the final settlement of his affairs, it should appear, that the profits of the slaves exceeded the amount of debts, that was a consequence arising from the uncertainty as to the debts, which he might naturally have anticipated; and yet he did not direct his slaves to be emancipated, when a sufficient fund should be raised out of their profits to pay his debts,—but, when his affairs should be actually settled and all his debts actually paid. Robinson committed no wrong. It was his duty, undoubtedly, to retain the slaves, as he did; and it was as certainly his duty to contest claims against Walker's estate, which he believed to be unjust; but he acted in both respects, not in his own right, 176 but in his fiduciary character, *as executor of Walker. So long as he held the slaves, he held them as the property of his testator, and for his estate. Therefore, the surplus of profits eventually found in his hands, belonged to his testator's distributees.

CARR, J. A question was made in the argument, whether the will of the testator Walker was an effectual instrument of emancipation of his slaves; but that question is not open for inquiry, unless the decree of June 1809, by which they were directed to be manumitted, can be examined by the court. It certainly cannot: it was a final decree, from which no appeal was ever taken, and none can now be taken: and if the decree were examinable as to the question of emancipation, the appellants have not raised it in their bill recently exhibited; they there ask only the surplus of the profits. On the other hand, it was contended, that the right of the freedmen to this surplus, as well as their right to freedom, was adjudicated by the decree of 1809; but neither is there any foundation for this position. The question comes before us, on the appeal from the last decree; and we are now to decide to whom the surplus of profits belongs—shall the freedmen have it? shall the executor retain it? or shall we decree it to the testator's next of kin?

It was strongly contended for the freedmen, that this fund having been raised from their labours, after they were entitled to their freedom, ought of right to go to them. There is much in this argument, which addresses itself to our sense of justice, and to our feelings; but unfortunately for them, the point has been irrevocably settled against them. Suits of this kind have been very frequent in Virginia, for more than a century past. There have been numerous cases of recovery of freedom by persons illegally held in bondage; and in many of them, the violation of freedom has been gross and palpable, and the public feeling strongly on their side; yet, in not one single case, have damages for the detention been given. In Pleasants v. Pleasants, the 177 chancellor *had allowed profits, contrary to the established rule; but this court reversed his decree in that particular; and the rule which denies profits in such cases, has been invariably followed ever since. Hard as the case may seem upon the freedmen, I for one, can never think, at this day, of breaking through this settled course and policy of the country.

Let us next inquire, whether the executor shall retain this surplus, as a residuum undisposed of. With respect to the influence of our statute of distributions on this question, my impression is, that the suggestion of president Pendleton, in Shelton v. Shelton, is correct. I believe too, it has from that time been taken as the law: I see that judge Roane, in delivering the opinion of the court in Hendren v. Colgin, 4 Munf. 235, takes it as a settled point. Yet, as it has been questioned by a brother judge in Wernick v. M'Murdo, as the point is very important, and there is now a bare court, and as the question before us may (as I think) without the aid of the statute, be easily settled by the long established doctrines of the law, I have thought it best to give no opinion on the construction of the statute.

By the common law, the whole personal estate devolved on the executor; and if after payment of debts, legacies, and other charges, a surplus remained, it vested in him beneficially. But this rule was considered to operate hardly upon the next of kin; and, therefore, wherever it appeared, on the face of the will, either expressly or by sufficient implication, that the testator meant to confer on the executor, merely the office, and not the beneficial interest, equity interposed, and converted him into a trustee for the next of kin. President Pendleton, in Shelton v. Shelton, has shewn, with his usual ability, how, in the progress of this doctrine, variant and irreconcilable decisions took place, as different chancellors favored the legal, or the equitable, rule. Thus lord Thurlow laid it down, that the rule that the executor shall take the residue, must prevail, unless there be an irresistible inference to the contrary; while lord Macclesfield *had held, that the next of kin have the apparent right, and there must be a devise of the surplus to the executors, either expressly, or by unavoidable implication, to exclude the next of kin: "An executor, he said, from his name, is but a trustee, he being to execute the testator's will, and therefore called an executor." I confess, I think the reason and justice of the case wholly with lord Macclesfield; and though he has been thought to carry the doctrine a little too far, I think he is in the main supported by the cases, especially the later ones. Thus, if there be a residuary clause, though the name of the legatee be left blank, and thus rendered ineffectual; or, if there be a residuary legatee, and he die in the life of the testator; or, if there be a particular legacy given to the executor; in all these cases, he is held to be a trustee for the residue. See the cases collected by Cox, in a note on Farrington v. Knightly, 1 P. Wms. 550, and Nourse v. Finch, 1 Ves. jun. 344; 2 Id. 78. It has also been decided, in numerous cases, that if one of several executors is made a trustee, for any particular purpose connected with his office, all shall be held trustees of the residue for the next of kin. In Urquhart v. King, 7 Ves. 225, a testatrix commenced her will by saying she intended to dispose of part of her personal estate: she then gave several legacies to relations of her deceased husband, residing in the U. States, and, after very particular directions as to those legacies &c. she concluded thus—"I constitute and appoint the honorable Rufus King, minister plenipotentiary from the U. States, or such other person who at the time of my death shall be minister plenipotentiary from the U. States, to this kingdom, and Francis Gregor &c. executors of this my will." She then by a codicil gave other legacies, specific and pecuniary, and made no disposition of the residue. The executors claimed it, beneficially, and the next of kin filed the bill against them: the only question was, whether the executors were trustees of the residue for the next of kin? Sir W. Grant said, "It is true, at law, the appointment of an executor is a gift of every thing not otherwise disposed 179 *of. But, in equity, it is always a question of intention, whether he is entitled beneficially, or as a trustee; and the question always arises upon the sufficiency of the evidence, by which the intention is made out." He proceeds to state it as settled law, that the leaving a legacy to an executor, raises a presumption, which, unless he can rebut it by evidence, makes him a trustee; and adds—"In this case, the circumstances much more strongly indicate the real intention that the executors should not take beneficially, than a legacy would have done." He then points out those circumstances; among others, that the appointment of Mr. King was not in his individual capacity as a friend, but as minister—or such other person who at her death should be minister; and concludes, "It is evident, therefore, she meant to confer an office only; and the intention is much more clear than it would be from the single circumstance of a trifling legacy to each:" and he decreed for the next of kin.

Let us look now at the will before us, and see whether it is not most clear, that the testator intended to confer on his executors an office merely; to constitute them trustees for the purposes of his will, and more especially, for the emancipation of his slaves. His property consisted of two parcels of land, stocks, furniture and slaves; and, after giving his lands, stocks and furniture to his wife, son and daughter, follows the clause desiring that after his debts are paid, his slaves may be emancipated according to law: Adding, "I desire this may be done by Benjamin Jones and my brother David, whom I appoint executors" &c. Can any one fail to perceive, that this testator meant to dispose of, and in fact disposed of, every atom of property he had in the world; thereby evincing, as clearly as any residuary clause could do, that he meant to leave nothing to be taken by his executors? Is it not most apparent, that, with respect to the emancipation of his slaves, and every measure necessary to effectuate that end, he constituted them trustees, without dreaming that they were to draw one 180 cent of profit from *the execution of the trust? Could he have used any words of inhibition, however strong, that would have made this more clear? Suppose he had left these two executors 100 dollars apiece; would that have made it more manifest than it is now, that he did not intend to have his slaves hired out beyond the period when a sufficient sum was raised to pay his debts, for the purpose of creating a fund to go into the pockets of his executors? Assuredly, not. If it be said he had as little intention of creating a fund in this way for his next of kin, I agree to it fully; but the same consequence does not follow to them as to the executors. Here is the money; it is part of his estate undisposed of, raised by the error of the executors; to them we cannot give it: but it is different with the next of kin; for (as lord Hardwicke says in Southcot v. Watson, 3 Atk. 231,) they "take by a kind of succession ab intestato, without the assistance of this court; and it is the law throws it upon them."

CABELL, J. I am of opinion that the decree of June 1809, declaring the pauper plaintiffs free, was clearly final, and that, not having been appealed from, it is no longer examinable. If it were otherwise, and it were now regularly before us, I should think that it ought to be affirmed. But, I do not think that the subject of the surplus profits of the freedmen, accrued before the date of the decree, was, in any manner, disposed of by it. It may, probably, be inferred, that the chancellor entertained an opinion that the freedmen were entitled to this surplus; but he did not give to that opinion the form or character of a judicial decision. The right to them, therefore, is now properly before us, on the present appeal.

I consider it the settled law of this country, that a person held in slavery, no matter how long and unjustly, cannot recover damages in the form of profits, or otherwise, for his illegal detention in slavery. This being the settled law, I deem it unnecessary to inquire into its policy or abstract justice. I am not disposed to disturb it. The decree is erroneous in this particular.

181 *Nor do I think, that the executors are entitled to this surplus of profits. They cannot claim to hold it merely on the ground of having received it, provided any other person can shew a better title to it. While they held the slaves of Walker's estate, they held them as fiduciaries. for the benefit of the estate; and their reception of the profits followed the character of their ownership of the slaves themselves, and, consequently, was fiduciary also.

But it was contended, that the executors will be entitled to the hires, as a part of the surplus of the estate, after the payment of debts and legacies. And this brings on the question, whether executors, in this country, are entitled to such surplus, in any case whatever, since the statute of distributions of 1785. Before the passing of that statute, the law as to the surplus of an estate, after the payment of debts and legacies, was certainly the same here, as in England. President Pendleton, in Shelton v. Shelton, speaking of the principles which should govern the decisions on this subject, said—"There are two, which seem the ground work, and are fixed: 1st, a legal one—That the naming of an executor, is a disposition to him of all the personal estate; and after payment of debts and legacies, the surplus belongs to him as a recompense for his labour and trouble. And if the spiritual court at this day, are about to compel the executors to distribute the surplus to the next of kin, the king's bench will grant a prohibition. 2ndly, A contending principle of equity, that where there is fraud in obtaining the executorship, or where it manifestly appears to have been the testator's intention, that the executor should not have the surplus, a court of equity will consider the executor as a trustee only as to the surplus for the next of kin." But, although these principles were fixed, much difficulty had been experienced in applying them to particular cases. What is to be regarded as proof of the testator's intention that the executor should not have the surplus? This question perplexed the judges in almost every case. At first, they confined themselves to a few circumstances only, as affording this proof. But, afterwards, 182 *they branched (as president Pendleton expressed it) into other considerations, which produced determinations, not to be reconciled, in principle, to each other, and which must be resolved into the different inclinations of the chancellors to favor, some the legal, others the equitable rule; and to make the favored rule apply to the case before them." And, I believe, it may be confidently affirmed, that no subject in the whole law, has given rise to more contradictory decisions, and that, consequently, none has been more fruitful of litigation. It was in this state of things, that our legislature passed the statute of 1785. Did it mean only to provide thereby, for those very few and rarely occurring cases of partial intestacy, mentioned by judge Green, in Wernick v. M'Murdo? or, to put an end to the perpetual controversies between executors and the next of kin, as to the surplus after the payment of debts and legacies? It seems to me absolutely certain, that the legislature, in using the terms, "intestate as to his goods and chattels, or any part thereof," did not mean to apply them to a case of mere technical intestacy; to a case where a man, although he actually leave a will disposing of his whole estate, is, nevertheless, held to be intestate in law, because he has appointed no executor, or because the executor appointed, has refused to act. If the statute of 1785, were to apply to such a case, the consequence would be, that a man's estate would be distributed among his next of kin, in opposition to his declared and written will to the contrary, if he failed to appoint an executor, or the executor named died before him, or refused to qualify. Such a consequence was never contemplated, and would not be tolerated by the legislature. The statute can be applied only to cases, where a person has failed to declare by his will, expressly or by necessary implication, his intentions as to the disposition of his property; to cases, where he has failed to make an actual bequest. But, then, it extends to every such failure, whether that failure be partial or total; for the language of the statute is, when a person dies intestate as to his goods and chattels, or any part 183 *thereof. When we advert to the numerous and contradictory decisions of the courts, and the evils consequent on such an unsettled state of the law, prior to the statute of 1785, and to its peculiar phraseology, (the words, or any part thereof, having then, for the first time, been introduced into our statute of distributions) I am constrained to believe, that the legislature had in view, this very case of the surplus after payment of debts and legacies, and intended to put an end, forever, to all controversies concerning it, by giving it, in all cases, to the next of kin. This was the opinion of this court (extrajudicially expressed, it is admitted) in Shelton v. Shelton, and of judge Coalter, in Wernick v. M'Murdo; and, indeed, I have never heard a different opinion expressed, by any person whatever, except by judge Green, in the last mentioned case.

TUCKER, P. I consider the decree of June 1809 as concluding the right of the pauper plaintiffs to freedom. If that decree is erroneous (which I am not disposed to think it is) this court cannot, at this day, correct its errors, or even question its accuracy. It was the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction upon the matter in lilation, from which there was no appeal taken, and which cannot now be reversed: the matter has passed completely in rem adjudicatam. It is not only binding, but we must take it to be a correct decision, in proceeding to adjust the ulterior pretensions of the parties growing out of it. I take it, therefore, as a postulate, that the freedmen, in this case, were justly entitled to their freedom in 1809, under the will of Walker; and that it was properly decreed to them by the court of chancery.

But though, by that decree, the right to freedom was placed beyond question, the right to the profits was not so definitively settled, as seems to have been supposed by counsel. That the opinion of the chancellor may have been at that time made up, is very possible. But that opinion can have no influence, unless it has passed into the form of a *decree determining the rights of the parties. From such a mere opinion, there could have been no appeal for the purpose of correcting its errors; and it would be strange, that the party should be bound by it, without having power to have it corrected, if erroneous. In interlocutory decrees, indeed, where the principles of a case are settled by the court, and ulterior measures resting upon those principles are directed, an appeal will lie, because it may be necessary to arrest an expensive or dilatory course of proceeding, by striking at the principles of the decree out of which it is to grow. But here, the chancellor settled nothing as to this point. He merely reserved to the plaintiffs, liberty to resort to the court, for distribution of any surplus remaining after the debts should be paid, or for any other arrangement in relation to such surplus. Surely, this is any thing but a decree for the surplus. Whether the whole profits might not be absorbed by debts, did not appear; and therefore, whether Walker's freedmen would ever get any thing, or his distributees lose any thing, it was impossible to say. Had Robinson, the executor, appealed from that order, and the whole amount been absorbed by debts, so as to have left no subject of controversy, the absurdity of such an appeal would have been manifested. Therefore, I think, we must consider the reservation, not as settling the rights of the parties definitively, but as merely providing for the mode of bringing them before the court for final adjudication, when the affairs of the estate should have been completely wound up.

Considering the question of the profits as being open to inquiry, I think there is little difficulty in denying the correctness of the decree which has given them to the freedmen. No instance has ever occurred, I believe, in the history of our adjudications in these anomalous cases, in which profits or damages have been allowed to the claimants, as a compensation for detaining them in slavery. In Pleasants v. Pleasants, the demand was refused; and for thirty years, this decision seems to have been so far acquiesced in, that *no such pre-185 tence is believed to have been since set up. It is too late, now, to make a precedent; and if it were not, there are many grave considerations which ought to be weighed, before we should undertake to do so. It is, perhaps, difficult to say whence the opinion first arose, though it very probably originated in the nature of the suit or demand. Though its form was that of an action of assault and battery and false imprisonment, yet, in substance, it was always considered but as a fictitious action moulded by the courts for the purpose of trying the mere question of freedom. "Actions like the present" (said president Pendleton in Coleman v. Dick, 1 Wash. 233), "are merely fictitious, and are very properly in this respect (as to number of parties joining) likened to actions of ejectment." They are, in effect, to try the right, not to try the injury; as the writ of right, at common law, settled the mere right, but never gave damages. The issue made up between the parties is upon the right to freedom only, not upon the quantum damnificatus, and still less upon any idea of contract, express or implied. There is no room for such an implication where one party is held by another in slavery. There is little reason for it, when we consider that the slave, in his birth and his infancy, has been a burden, and that if the master could have foreseen his emancipation and his demand for profits, he might have been altogether averse from incurring such a charge. Moreover, having held and enjoyed the slave as his own, and acted entirely on that supposition; having spent the profits made by him during a long course of years, in the confidence they were his own; there is much reason for the application of the principles laid down by the court in Skyring v. Greenwood, 4 Barn. & Cres. 272, 10 Eng. C. L. R. 335. In that case, the paymaster of a corps had credited an officer with increased pay, which he was informed by the board of ordnance would not be allowed, but which information he did not communicate to the officer. The court refused to permit the paymaster to rectify the credit, by setting 186 it off against *the officer's demand: chief justice Abbott said,—"they suffered him to suppose, that he was entitled to the increased allowances. It is of great importance to any man, not to be led to suppose his income is greater than it really is. Every prudent man accommodates his mode of living to what he supposes to be his income; it therefore works a great prejudice to any man, if after having credit given to him in account for certain sums, he may be called upon to pay them back." The principle here avowed lies at the root of many of the doctrines of the law. Upon this ground, in part, no damages were given in droiturel actions; upon this ground, even now, rents and profits can only be recovered for five years anterior to the demand. Why? Not because they are presumed to have been paid, but because there ought to be some reasonable limit to a reclamation which might beggar a party, who, in good faith, had only spent and enjoyed what he believed to be his own. These principles apply a fortiori to the demand of a pauper who has recovered his freedom. Held by his master as his own property, brought up at his expense in infancy, sustained at his charges in sickness and in health; treated, perhaps, with an indulgence, which would not have been extended to one whom he knew to be a hireling; it would be ruinous, indeed, to many a master if these unexpected demands for profits were permitted or countenanced by the courts. While, therefore, it cannot be denied to be a hardship on the person illegally held in bondage, it is not improbable that the difficulty of doing complete justice, together with the policy of protecting the master from a demand he could not have expected, lay at the foundation of the practice now firmly established. From that practice, I shall not deviate, nor admit a single exception. The legislature by the statute concerning pauper suits, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 124, § 4, has prescribed the course to be pursued in suits for freedom. The statute gives the courts authority to permit the petitioner to sue in forma pauperis for the recovery of his freedom; but it provides nothing as to damages or profits, 187 *though the courts had uniformly denied them. I argued from hence, a legislative assent to the principles established by the general practice of the country; and until a new law shall otherwise provide, I hold myself bound to adhere to that practice. I do not think it necessary, in addition to what I have said, to rely at all upon the proposition, that as no contract for profits can be implied, as they could only be recovered as damages for unlawful detention, there could be no such demand in equity. Yet this would of itself, perhaps, be a sufficient answer to such a demand in that court. Nor is it necessary to dilate on the particular character of the will, in this case, which does not direct the slaves to be hired out, and that when the debts should be paid out of their profits, they should be emancipated. It merely fixes upon the time when the affairs of the estate should be settled up and the debts paid, as the time for their emancipation. This has been settled by the former decree in the year 1809, at which time their title to freedom was consummate. The profits were, accordingly, received for the estate, and cannot be paid over to the freedmen, since they were not free, when the profits accrued. They derived their freedom, indeed, from the will; but it was not perfected until the execution of the power under the will by the executor.

The question as between the distributees and the executors of Walker next presents itself. Without again adverting to the language of the will, in this particular case, as decisive of the point that all the profits of these slaves until their actual emancipation, belonged to the estate, I will remark, that, as the executors came to the reception of these profits in their fiduciary character, they can have no title to retain them. The argument indeed, was most ingeniously and imposingly put—that the distributees had no pretence of right to the profits of these persons, who ought to have been in the enjoyment of their freedom; that, as profits are not recoverable by the plaintiffs in a pauper suit for freedom, the person who may chance to be the holder, will be entitled

188 *to the benefit, and that Robinson, the executor, being the holder, and a wrongdoer, he was entitled to retain the profits remaining in his hands, because there is no other person who has a right to demand them. The defect of this argument consists, I think, in the omission to consider Robinson as holder, not for himself, but for the estate. Whatever incidental advantage might be derived from the possession of these people while held as slaves, belonged to the estate of his testator, since he had that possession only in a fiduciary character as representing that estate. An agent or overseer could not claim to retain the profits of a slave who recovered his freedom, though he may have actually received them, since his possession and his receipt of the profits, were not in his own right, but in right of another.

With respect to the question of the right of the executor to the residuum, I have always considered president Pendleton's suggestion in Shelton v. Shelton, as perfectly correct. For more than forty years, it has been deemed the law in Virginia; and thousands of wills have been probably drawn with a conviction, that it was no longer necessary to give the executor a legacy, or in any other manner to provide for his exclusion from a right to the residuum. A law of property has thus grown up, which I think it would be unwise to disturb, even if there were sound reasons for questioning the interpretation given to the statute by president Pendleton, and acquiesced in ever since by the legislature and the courts of justice.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that Walker's distributees are entitled to the fund which had arisen from the profits of the slaves, so far as the same has been unexhausted by debts, and that the decree must be reversed.

Decree reversed.

Covenant—Judgment—Payments—To What Applied.

—In covenant by M. against B. judgment is recovered by M. in 1792, for £2500. damages: s. fa. is sued out by M. and returned nulla bona; then both parties die; and afterwards, the executor of B. makes sundry payments, at sundry times, to M.'s administrator: HELD, all such payments shall be applied to the principal of the debt due on the judgment; and M. is only entitled to the balance of principal with interest from the date of the judgment, and shall not be allowed to compute interest on the whole debt from date of the judgment, and apply the partial payments, first to the satisfaction of interest so computed, and then to the principal.

Judgment against Decedent—Statute—Effect.

—Quære, whether the provisions of the statute of 1792, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 17, apply to any case of a judgment recovered before the date of the enactment thereof? or whether it does not apply to every case of a judgment recovered against a decedent, whether before or after the enactment, in which his executor or administrator has qualified after the enactment? And per TUCKER, P., it applies to every case in which the qualification of the representative of the deceased debtor has been subsequent to the enactment, though the judgment against the decedent may have been recovered before.

In an action of covenant, brought by James Mercer against Samuel Beale in the general court, Mercer recovered judgment

Judgments—Interest.—On this question the principal case is cited in Laidley v. Merrifield, 7 Leigh 357, 359, and note; foot-note to Michaux v. Brown, 10 Gratt. 612; Tazewell v. against Beale, at June term 1792, for £2500. damages assessed by the verdict of the jury, and costs of suit; the verdict and judgment according to the law and practice at that day, being simply for the amount of damages, without giving interest thereon. And upon this judgment, Mercer sued out a writ of fieri facias, dated the 26th June 1792, returnable to the first day of November term following; upon which the sheriff made return,—“no property to be found but what is under a deed of trust to 190 *Nathaniel Burwell, Robert Andrews, Basil Holmes and John Pierce, for the payment of debts therein expressed.”

The deed of trust referred to in the sheriff's return, had been executed by Beale to Burwell, Andrews, Pierce and Upton Beale [not B. Holmes] before Mercer recovered his judgment, namely, on the 10th March 1792.—And by this deed, Beale,—reciting that he was in an infirm state of health, and unable to attend to the adjustment of his private affairs, and therefore, had determined to relinquish to the friendly management of respectable men, all the debts, dues and demands, of every kind, that were or should become due to him from any person in Virginia,—assigned to Burwell, Andrews, Pierce and U. Beale, all the said debts &c. upon trust, 1. to collect the same, employing B. Holmes as an agent in making the collections; 2. to apply so much of the moneys when collected as should be necessary for the purpose, to the completion of a purchase he had made of one fourth part of an estate in New Kent, called Providence Forge, and then to sell the same, and apply the proceeds of sales to the general purposes of the trust; which were, 3. to apply the trust fund, first, to the payment of all debts due by him to certain specified creditors, and then of such other debts, due before the date of the deed to creditors not named therein, as he should acknowledge under his hand and seal in his lifetime, or as B. Holmes, after his death, should certify under his hand and seal, to be justly due, but (expressly) no other debts.

The debt due to Mercer was not one of those mentioned and provided for in this deed of trust.

About the time Mercer recovered his judgment, Beale removed from Virginia, and never returned: he died shortly afterwards, having by will devised and bequeathed one half of his estate to his son Norborne Beale, and the other half to his daughters Matilda and Harriet, and appointed his trustees, above named, his executors. Mercer also died not long after the recovery of his judgment against Beale; and James M. Garnett and John T. Brooke were his administrators *with his will annexed. Brooke died pending this suit.

Robert Andrews alone first qualified as executor of Beale; and, acting as trustee or as executor of Beale, or in both capacities, he made sundry payments to Mercer's administrators, in 1802 and 1803, in part satisfaction of the debt due by the judgment. These were general payments. Andrews died in 1803; and sometime after his death, Pierce qualified as executor of Beale; and he, likewise, as trustee or executor, or in both capacities, made sundry general payments, to Mercer's administrators, in 1804 and 1809, in part satisfaction of the judgment; after which Pierce died; and thenceforth, there was no representative of Beale's estate.

After the death of Andrews, his accounts as trustee and executor of Beale (for his accounts in the two characters were blended together) were settled by commissioners appointed by the county court of James City; and shewed a balance due from him, of £441. which Andrews's executor paid to Beale's son Norborne, and at the same time transferred to him bonds belonging to Beale's estate, to the amount of between £3000. and £4000. And then Norborne Beale, and his two sisters and co-legatees, Matilda and Harriet, removed to Kentucky, where they have ever since resided.

In January 1816, Mercer's administrators exhibited their bill in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, against Norborne Beale, and his two sisters, as devisees, and legatees of their father,—the executor and the devisees and legatees of Andrews, trustee and first executor of Beale,—the executor and devisees and legatees of Pierce, trustee and second executor of Beale,—the heirs and distributees of Robert Munford deceased,—and George Divers,—setting forth the facts above stated: claiming the balance which would be due on Mercer's judgment, by computing interest on the judgment from its date: charging, that by the judicious management of the trustee and executor Andrews, there was a large real and 192 personal estate of Beale left, *after paying all his other debts, more than enough to pay the balance due on Mercer's judgment, of which estate, including a large portion of the trust subject comprised in the deed of trust of the 10th March 1792, the defendants Norborne Beale and his co-devisees and legatees had possessed themselves, and these defendants were residents of the state of Kentucky; that Andrews's executor had improperly paid and transferred the trust subject (which in equity was liable for all Beale's debts) and the residue of Beale's personal estate, to Norborne Beale; and that the estate of Munford (of which there was now no personal representative living) and the defendant Divers, were largely indebted to the estate of Beale: and therefore praying, that the debt due from the estate of Munford, and from the defendant Divers, to Beale's estate, might be attached in the hands of Divers, and in the hands of the heirs and distributees of Munford, respectively, as garnishees, to satisfy the balance due on Mercer's judgment; a decree for that balance; and general relief.

The representatives of Andrews and of Pierce, as well as Divers, and the represen-

*The statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 80, p. 508, provides, that “in all actions founded on contract, and tried before a jury, the jury shall ascertain the principal sum due, and fix the period at which interest shall commence. If interest be allowed by them: and judgment shall be rendered accordingly, carrying on the interest till the judgment shall be satisfied.” But this statute, which regulates the present practice, was not passed till January 1806. Sess. Acts 1804-5, ch. 8, § 2.—Note in Original Edition.

tatives of Munford, charged as garnishees, having answered the bill, a long controversy ensued, as to the liability of the estates of the two trustees and executors, and as to the debts alleged to be due from the garnishees to Beale's estate; and the cause had been pending many years, when the absent defendants appeared, and were allowed to put in their answers.

And Norborne Beale, in his answer, admitted, that he had ample funds of his father's estate to pay the balance due on Mercer's judgment, whatever it might be; but he insisted, 1. that the claim was barred by the provision in the statute of wills of 1792, (1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 92, § 57,) and 2. that at any rate, as Mercer's judgment did not give interest on the damages thereby adjudged to him, no interest could properly be allowed upon the same, and the payments made by Andrews and Pierce should be applied to the principal.

193 *An account was taken of the debt due on Mercer's judgment, and of the payments made by Andrews and Pierce; from which it appeared, that the payments, if applied to the principal, reduced the debt to 614 dollars: but, if interest were computed on the debt from the date of the judgment, and the payments applied first to the discharge of the interest, and the overplus to the principal, the balance of the debt, due in January 1809, was 7510 dollars, principal; and this was the balance which Mercer's administrator claimed, with interest from January 1809.

The chancellor decreed, that the defendant Norborne Beale should pay the plaintiffs only the balance of 614 dollars, with interest thereon from the 25th June 1792, the date of the judgment. And from this decree Mercer's administrator appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here by Johnson for the appellant, and Stanard for the appellees; and many interesting topics were discussed, which arose incidentally in the argument of the two principal questions presented by the answer of Norborne Beale; namely, 1. the question as to interest on the judgment; and 2. the question as to the effect of the 57th section of the statute of wills of 1792, relied on by Beale as a bar to the claim;* whether that provision

*The provision on which the question arose, was first enacted in December 1792, and was in these words: "No action of debt shall be brought against any executor or administrator upon a judgment obtained against his testator or intestate, nor shall any scire facias be issued against any executor or administrator to revive such judgment, after the expiration of five years from the qualification of his executor or administrator: and all such judgments after the expiration of five years, upon which no proceedings shall have been had, shall be deemed to have been paid and discharged;" with a saving in favor of persons non compos mentis, femes covert, infants, imprisoned, or out of the commonwealth. In the revision of 1792, this provision was made part of the statute of wills; 1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 92, § 57; Pleasants's ed. 167. But in the revision of 1819, it was detached from the statute of wills, and with some amendment inserted in the statute of limitations: 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 128, § 17, p. 492.

In the statute of limitations of 1792, there was another provision then first introduced, in these words: "Judgments in any court of record, where execution hath not issued, may be revived by scire facias or an action of debt brought thereon, within ten years next after the date of such judgment, and not after; or where execution hath issued and no return is made thereon, the party in 194 was applicable *to the case of a judgment recovered before the enactment? whether it was applicable to a case like the present, in which the funds out of which the claim of the judgment creditor was to be satisfied, came to the hands of the executors not as executors but as trustees, or, at least, not merely as executors, but in the two characters of executors and trustees blended together? and whether the statutory presumption of satisfaction of a judgment against a decedent, from five years non-claim after the qualification of his executor or administrator, was an absolute bar, or might, like other presumptions, be rebutted?

CARR, J. I shall not examine the point discussed with great earnestness and ability at the bar, whether Mercer's judgment against Beale, under all the circumstances of the case, be within the influence of the statute declaring that after five years from the qualification of an executor or administrator, no action of debt shall be brought, or scire facias issued, on any judgment obtained against the testator or intestate? It is unnecessary to consider the point, because the judgment of the chancellor upon it, was against the appellee, and he took no appeal from it, but was satisfied with the decree.

The only question which I think it material to consider, is that respecting the interest: did the chancellor err in refusing to give interest on the whole judgment from its date until final payment? It was a judgment for damages, and did not give interest. It was recovered in June

195 1792; and *an execution was sued out upon it in the same year, which proved ineffectual. From that time till 1816, when this bill was filed, no step was taken; the judgment remained a judgment in damages, carrying no interest as a part of the judgment. The defendant at any time during that period, by paying up the amount of the judgment, £2500. with the costs, would have extinguished the judgment: the plaintiff, by issuing his execution, could never have coerced more than the £2500. and costs. This, then, was the existing demand; and if during the time that it stood upon the judgment and execution thereon, the payment of the sum demanded would have extinguished the whole, it would seem to follow, that a payment of any sum less than the whole, would extinguish the debt to the extent of the sum paid. It appears, that between 1802 and 1809, various payments were made; leaving, of the principal judgment and costs, only a balance of 614 dollars. This sum the chancellor has decreed to Mercer's administrator with interest from the date of the judgment. It is contended that, on this bill, filed in 1816, long after the pay-whose favor the same was issued, shall) may obtain other executions, or move against any sheriff &c. for not returning the same, for the term of ten years from the date of such judgment, and not after;" with a saving in favor of persons non compos mentis &c. 1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 76, § 5, p. 108; 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 128, § 5, p. 489. This provision has been held to be prospective: i. e. not to apply to judgments existing before it took effect. Lyons v. Gregory, 3 Hen. & Munf. 337; Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104.—Note in Original Edition.

ments, a court of equity ought to have treated this judgment exactly as if it had carried running interest upon its face; computing interest on the judgment to the time of the payments, and applying the payments first to the discharge of the interest. I cannot think so. Suppose the payments had equalled the amount of the judgment and costs; could this bill have been sustained claiming to have a re-settlement, and the payments so applied as to give interest on the whole judgment from its date? This, I suppose, would hardly be contended for. It is the unquestionable right of a debtor owing two debts, to direct to which of them any payment he may make shall be applied; but here such direction would have been absurd; there was but one debt; every payment must have been just as clearly and necessarily applicable to that, as if the debtor had said, "this money is paid towards your judgment against me;" and as that judgment was one principal 196 sum bearing no interest, *every hundred pounds paid towards it lessened that principal by so much. True, if the creditor at any time should choose to bring an action or (in a proper case) file a bill to enforce this judgment, he might in his second judgment or decree recover interest; but this could only be on such portion of the judgment, as had not been extinguished by prior payments; it could not unsettle those payments, or alter, in the least, their application. I think, therefore, that the chancellor was right, and that his decree should be affirmed.

TUCKER, P. The appellant complains, that by the decree of the court of chancery, his claim has been reduced from 7510 dollars due in January 1809, to 614 dollars, by the refusal of interest upon his judgment; while the appellee, claiming the protection of a provision of the statute of limitations, objects that a decree for any portion of the demand should have been rendered against him. These present the points on which the decision of this court is called for. I shall take them up in the order in which they have been just stated.

1. As to the appellant's title to interest upon his judgment. That a court of equity will under circumstances give interest on a judgment sounding only in damages and not carrying interest in terms, cannot be denied. The cases of Beall v. Silver and Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 401, 384, cited at the bar, are decisive authorities upon that point. Nor does the allowance of interest depend merely on the fact, in those cases, that there were fraudulent conveyances thrown in the way of the creditor, which proved a barrier to the collection of his debt. I think it may be more broadly stated, that where a creditor would be entitled, in debt upon his judgment, to recover interest, but is forced for any cause, to resort to equity for his redress, he ought to have the same measure of redress there, unless there be special reasons rendering such redress unreasonable or unjust. In this case the complainant has been compelled *to come into 197 equity, instead of suing at law upon his judgment; and we must, therefore, inquire what he would have been entitled to recover at law, in an action of debt upon the judgment.

That in an action of debt upon a judgment, the plaintiff may, in the shape of damages, recover interest upon his demand, is a proposition too plain to have required proof. It is one of the functions of such an action,—one of its main designs; and in England, where even on contracts bearing interest in terms, the judgment of the court carries it down only to its own date, it is a most important remedy for a creditor, who, for years after his judgment, has been baffled in his attempts to render it available. Formerly, indeed, it would seem that interest was only computed to the time of the action brought; a practice condemned by lord Mansfield in Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burr. 1085, where he said, that, in justice, interest should be carried down to actual payment, but as that could not be, it should come as near it as possible, that is, to the judgment, when the demand is completely liquidated. But as by the english practice, even as corrected, the interest stopped short of justice, it was permitted to be recovered in an action of debt upon the judgment, where the creditor had been unreasonably delayed in the recovery of his money. Yet these actions have nevertheless been looked upon with a very watchful eye, being considered as vexatious and oppressive; per Grose, J., in Entwistle v. Shepherd, 2 T. R. 79. The resorting to a new suit, instead of pursuing the various executions given by the law for enforcing the first judgment, would indeed merit the reprobation of the courts; and the holding up a judgment for years, with a view to the recovery of accumulated interest in a new action, would certainly give the creditor no claim to the exercise of the discretionary powers of a court and jury in his favor. To modify the expression of the lord chancellor, in reference to carrying down interest beyond the report of the master, "if it was once understood to be of course, 198 that after liquidation *of the debt, the accumulated sum would carry interest, those who ought to be most active in prosecuting the [demand] would then become negligent," in the expectation of interest; and would lie by until by the accumulation the defendant would be ruined. It may be said, indeed, that he can at all times absolve himself by payment; but where the judgment does not carry interest in terms, he very naturally looks to the delay as the forbearance of his creditor, and waits until the issue of an execution calls upon him to make payment. In the practice of this country, it may be safely affirmed, that no defendant who delays the voluntary discharge of a judgment, and awaits the visit of the officer, conceives that he is thereby subjecting himself to a new demand for accumulated interest, upon a judgment which carried no interest. Be this as it may, while it is readily conceded, that interest on a judgment not carrying interest may be given, it is as confidently affirmed, that it is not matter of course. The authorities and the reason of the thing concur in sustaining this proposition. If interest is not allowable upon rent, where there is sufficient distress upon the premises, because the landlord always has his remedy in his own hands, (Dow v. Adams, 5 Munf. 51,) there would seem to be equal reason for refusing it to a creditor, who, instead of enforcing his judgment by execution, when his debtor is full handed and his property easily reached, proceeds to harass him by a new action upon a judgment. So, if a judgment be rendered of assets quando acciderint, the supposition at the time of the judgment, is, that there is nothing to pay, and therefore no one to make payment; and thus, there being no default, no damages can be given; for damages always imply a previous wrong. Hence, in a case like this, interest was refused in a court of equity; Deschamps v. Vanneck, 2 Ves. jr. 716.

The authorities concur in considering interest, in an action of debt upon a judgment, as matter of discretion, not as matter of right in all cases. Nay more, it 199 is matter for the *jury, under the direction of the court, not matter for the decision of the court, independent of the jury. For the demand is for damages by occasion of the detention of the debt, and damages are always matter of assessment by the jury. And though the interest is the measure of those damages, and usually determines the amount of them, yet interest is one thing and damages another. Interest is matter of contract: damages are assessed for a tort or wrong done in withholding the debt; they are given for breach of contract, not in pursuance of it. Hence, the court will not undertake to assess those damages, or to compute the interest without the intervention of that tribunal whose peculiar province it is to assess damages for a tort of whatever description. Hence, too, though it is the practice, in actions upon bills and notes where there is judgment by default, instead of executing writs of inquiry, for the court to refer it to a master to see what is due for principal and interest; yet, in an action of debt on a judgment, this will not be done; for, as lord Kenyon said, in Nelson v. Sheridan, 8 T. R. 395, "it should be left to a jury to consider whether any and what damages should be given. Perhaps they may think that in this case no damages at all ought to be given." The case of Roe v. Apsley, 1 Sid. 442, had indeed been decided otherwise (against the opinion of the chief justice, 2 Wms. Saund. 108, in notes) but that case must now be considered as overruled. In the case of Deschamps v. Vanneck, the lord chancellor, moreover, speaking of the practice in equity as to this matter, declares, that upon inquiry he found that the master [in chancery] never taxed interest upon a judgment; and further, that he had found upon inquiry, that no interest is computed upon a judgment, in an action upon such judgment at law.

Nor is it merely not a matter of course that interest shall be allowed upon a judgment; it is often matter of serious speculation, whether it will be allowed in the shape of damages or not. I am certainly not aware of any case, in which interest has been allowed in the shape of damages, 200 *upon a judgment for damages in tort; as for slander, battery or trespass. Such a case, it would be difficult, I imagine, to find in the english books. So far from such allowance, it was, to say the least, at this time exceedingly doubtful, whether interest in damages can even be allowed in an action upon a judgment on matter of contract, where the original cause of action did not carry interest. In the exchequer chamber, such interest is refused on an affirmance on a writ of error; 3 Price, 250; 6 Taunt. 244. And in an action of debt upon a judgment on a contract not carrying interest, a judge at his chambers, in the case of Butler v. Stoveld, 1 Bing. 368, 8 Moore, 412, made an order to stay proceedings in the action, on payment of the amount recovered, with costs, but without interest.

It may not be amiss to observe, moreover, that, in England, it is now established as a general principle, that interest is allowed by law only upon commercial securities, or in those cases where there has been an express promise to pay interest, or where such promise is to be implied from the usage of trade or other circumstances; Higgins v. Sargent, 2 Barn. & Cres. 348; 9 Eng. C. L. R. 101. Like opinions have been expressed by lord Ellenborough in 1 Camp. 50, 12 East, 410, and 15 East, 223. And in Higgins v. Sargent, Holroyd, J., says, "Independently of these authorities, I am of opinion, upon the principles of the common law, that interest is not payable upon a sum certain payable at a given day" [interest not being contracted for]. "The action of debt was the specific remedy appropriated by the common law for the recovery of a sum certain. Now, in that action, the defendant was summoned to render the debt, or shew cause why he should not do so. The payment of the debt satisfied the summons, and was an answer to the action. If this, therefore, had been an action of debt" [it was covenant for a sum certain] "the payment of the principal sum would have been a good defence, because the interest is no part of the debt, but is claimed only as damages, resulting from the non-201 payment of the debt. *Where, indeed, the interest becomes payable by virtue of a contract, express or implied, then it becomes part of the debt, and it would be no answer to the action of debt, for the defendant to shew, that he had paid the principal sum only." So in the action of debt upon this judgment: the original writ (I speak of the matter according to the original common law forms of proceeding) would have commanded the payment of the exact sum due by the judgment, and the payment of that sum, without interest, would have been an answer to the action and satisfaction of the writ; for in the original writ and process in debt, there are no damages laid. 3 Black. Comm. Append. III. The damages are for the first time set forth in the declaration.

From what I have said, and from the authorities adduced, I think it will clearly appear, 1. that interest may be given, in the form of damages, upon many demands not carrying interest in terms, and among others upon a judgment in a matter of contract; but, 2. that this is not matter of course, but of discretion, to be exercised by the jury, under the superintendence of the court. And if these propositions are true, then it is obvious, that until an action of debt is brought upon a judgment not carrying interest, the plaintiff's demand against the defendant is for the amount of that judgment alone; or, at most, that there is a possible, contingent, potential demand for interest, to be recovered in the shape of damages, if in a future action upon the judgment, such damages should be allowed.

Let us now recur, for a moment, to the character of the demand in this case. It is not a demand of interest upon so much of the said debt as has been unpaid, which a jury might allow and the court of chancery has properly allowed; but it is a demand, that all the payments which have been made towards satisfaction of the judgment, should be now converted, by the decree of the court, into payments not in part of an actual, subsisting, ascertained and recognized demand, but in part of this potential, uncertain, and contested demand of interest; a demand which was not 202 admitted, *was not ascertained, would certainly be contested, and might be adjudicated against the creditor, whenever he should assert it. Such an use of the doctrine of the application of payments, it is believed, can neither find a precedent in the past, nor would it be likely to be followed as a precedent for the future. The difficulties also to which such a construction would lead, are too formidable to be overlooked. If the doctrine be true, then although every cent of a judgment has been paid, the creditor may nevertheless sue for the amount, convert the payments to the interest and resuscitate the exanimate judgment. The consequence is, that the real estate of a decedent, which was only bound for the specific sum, and could never be responsible for damages, is, by this magical operation, still held bound for the original amount, provided the accumulation of interest has absorbed all the payments. The executor, too, after he has paid off the amount of the original judgment, finds he was paying interest while he thought he was paying principal. He finds the debt of record undiminished, because his payments are withdrawn from the principal, which is a debt of record, to be applied to these speculative, potential damages, which certainly are not a debt of record; and, having been thus, by construction, made to pay a less than simple contract debt (for it is a debt merely in posse), when he really supposed he was paying a record debt (the principal in the judgment), he is charged with a devastavit, and made to answer to other creditors for the misapplication of the funds.

Nor is this all. It cannot be affirmed, that interest can be included in an execution on a barren judgment. If then the execution is paid off through the officer, the debt is discharged; but, according to the doctrine now advanced, if paid off voluntarily, the payments must first be considered as payments of interest. If this be so, then the result will be, that no prudent man,—certainly no prudent executor, will ever pay off a judgment, except through the officers of the law; and thus, the decedent's estate will be wasted in costs, commissions and sales under execution.

203 *Upon the whole, I am clearly of opinion, that interest was properly refused, except upon the unsatisfied portion of the judgment.

I shall only add that our statutes can have no influence upon the question; 1. because it is probable, that the case of debt upon a judgment was not in the contemplation of the legislature, or designed to be comprehended by the word contract in the statute of 1804-5, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 80, p. 508, and 2. even if it had been, the subject of interest is still left discretionary with the jury; and the foregoing reasoning is as applicable as ever.

We come next to consider the defence under that clause of our statute which was first introduced at the revival of 1792, being then the 57th section of the statute of wills, but inserted in the statute of limitations at the revival of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 17.

The application of this clause to the present case was first denied, upon the ground that the judgment at law was anterior to the enactment of the provision, and was not therefore affected by it. Had the defendant relied upon the 5th section of the statute of limitations, the objection would indeed have been conclusive, for it has been decided, and no doubt very properly, that this provision had not a retroactive operation, and did not embrace judgments previously obtained. Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104. Had it been construed otherwise, a judgment ten years old at the date of the statute, would have been absolutely barred by it, and the right would have been annihilated, by an utter privation, not by a mere limitation, of the remedy. But in the construction of the provision in question, no infraction of the right will necessarily ensue, though the judgment be anterior to it, provided we construe it to require the qualification of the executor to be posterior. In the 5th section, the judgment is made the terminus, or point of time, from which the limitation shall be reckoned. In this clause, the qualification of the executor is made the terminus. Now it is manifest, that, if we fix the terminus 204 *posterior to the statute, whether that terminus be the judgment or the qualification of the executor, the creditor will always have the full time allowed by the statute for enforcing his right. Thus, in this case; as the qualification was after the statute, the creditor had more than five years after the passing of it, within which to assert his remedy. On the other hand, if the terminus be anterior to the statute (which might have been the case under the 5th section, had it been considered as retroacting upon anterior judgments) the right itself would have been infringed, in every case where the limitation had expired before the passing of the act. Construing the 17th section, then, (as I do) as retroacting on the judgment, only in case of the qualification of executors subsequent to the act, it seems to me, that the legislative intention is effeuctuated, while an invasion of private right is sedulously avoided.

The object and intention of this statute, having been made a subject of much commentary, I will offer very succinctly my views upon the subject. The 5th section of the statute, though certainly designed originally, to meet the cases of judgments running out of date, and perhaps those cases only, yet is broad enough in its terms to reach the case of judgments abated by death, and which were sought to be revived by or against the representatives of decedents. But the legislature, I presume, thought that clause insufficient for the protection of executors and administrators, on whom the law imposes the duty of taking notice of judgments, wherever rendered in our numerous courts. The time of ten years was too long, and moreover there was a class of cases not within the 5th section: I mean judgments on which executions had issued, but were returned no effects; such cases were not within that provision; Gee v. Hamilton, 6 Munf. 32. To remedy these two evils, the other provision was introduced,—shortening the time to five years, in the case of executors, and moreover extending the bar to all judgments whatever, even to those in which the presumption of payment was rebutted 205 by the return of no *effects on an execution. Since this act, no judgment can be revived, or be the foundation of an action of debt, against the executor, after the expiration of five years, unless the persons entitled were non compos &c. No promise of payment, no assumpsit or acknowledgment, could have the effect of removing the bar. Such assumpsits may serve as the foundation of a new action, or may take a debt out of other clauses of the statute, but not out of those which limit the right of reviving judgments by debt or scire facias. Day v. Pickett, before cited.

But how then is the law as to the heir? It is contended, that this clause applies only to the executor, and does not reach the case of the heir, who can only protect himself under the 5th section, after ten years have elapsed. It struck me as singular, that where a judgment against a defendant abated by his death, it could not be enforced against his executor after five years, but might be enforced against the heir, by scire facias and elegit, at any time within ten years. For it is obvious, that the statute which gave the elegit, subjected, by that writ, the personality as well as the realty to the creditor's demand: and the cases upon it have decided, that if, upon an elegit, it appears to the sheriff that there are goods and chattels sufficient to satisfy the debt, the sheriff ought not to proceed to extend the lands. 2 Bac. Abr. Execution, C. 2, p. 711; 2 Inst. 395. Hence it would seem to have been the design of the statute, to charge the realty by the elegit, only in aid of the personality, or in the event of the personality proving deficient. Yet by the provision of the statute in question, the personality would seem to be protected, while the realty is left to be proceeded against without its aid. Upon looking into the books upon this subject, however, I think the difficulty vanishes; for it has been expressly decided, in Panton v. Hall, Carth. 107, that no scire facias to revive a judgment will lie against the heir, until a nihil has been returned against the executor; and this opinion of lord Holt is recognized as the law of the subject, 2 Wms. Saund. 72, o. p. If it be 206 so, then the *clause in question, in protecting the executor from the scire facias after five years, is a shield also to the heir, as it ought to be.

I think, therefore, that, if this were the case of an ordinary demand against the executor and heir of a decedent, the plea of this statute would avail either of them; and I am moreover of opinion, that if the demand against Norborne Beale in reference to the personalty, could be considered as a demand against him in the character of distributee, to compel him to refund, he would in that character be entitled to resort for the defence of the portion of the estate in his hands, to the plea of this statute; since the claim would in effect be against him through the executor. But, I apprehend, such is not the character of this suit. A cursory view of a few facts in the case, will prove this. In June 1792, the judgment, which is the foundation of the present suit, was rendered. Immediately after the judgment, a fieri facias issued upon it, which was returned, "no property to be found, but what is under a deed of trust to N. Burwell and others for the payment of debts therein expressed." This deed of trust was executed in March 1792, during the pendency of the suit for Mercer's demand, and about the time of the judgment, Beale left the country. By this deed of trust, Beale conveyed to trustees, all the debts, dues and demands, due or to become due to him; and his one fourth part of Providence Forge, to be secured by them, and afterwards sold, in trust to pay certain specified debts; and then such other debts, due before the date of the deed, as Beale should acknowledge under his hand and seal, or as B. Holmes, after Beale's death, should certify under his hand and seal, to be justly due, excluding, in express terms, all other debts. The terms of this trust, however it may have been designed, would render the conveyance void as to creditors, if the nature of the property conveyed was such that it could have been reached by an execution. The retaining a full power over the fund, the excluding from participation any 207 creditor unless the debtor *should acknowledge the sum due, and the express exclusion of all other debts from the benefit of the trust, while, on the one hand, it utterly negated the idea that Mercer was one of the cestui que trust, was calculated to hinder and delay, if not to defraud, those creditors who had not found favor with the debtor. It is not unlike the case in 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 565, where the conveyance was set aside in favor of creditors, whose demands were not secured. If such be the character of the deed upon its face, then this court I conceive must pronounce it void, even though fraud is not alleged in the pleadings: in Bayard v. Hoffman, 4 Johns. Ch. Rep. 450, there was no such allegation.

In this case, however, the conveyance is of debts due &c. and an interest in a landed estate which is not very distinctly described, and the ascertainment of which seems to have been rendered useless by Norborne Beale's declaration, that the funds in his hands were ample to pay whatever the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Now, it is true that according to the English law, bonds, bank bills and the like evidences of debt, cannot be taken by execution, because they are said to be choses in action and are not assignable; Ca. Temp. Hardw. 53. But in Virginia bonds are assignable, and even if transferred without assignment and by mere delivery, the right to them passes to the transferee. I am, therefore, by no means prepared to deny or affirm, that the bonds of a defendant can be taken in execution. Still less am I prepared to say, that a debtor may transfer an immense estate to trustees, in money, bonds, bills, stock and other such intangible funds, and that they cannot be reached by bill in equity. The opinion of chancellor Kent, in the case before cited of Bayard v. Hoffman, is decidedly in favor of the aid of a court of equity to a creditor so situated; and, sustained by his opinion, and by the three cases on which he relies, though they have been certainly questioned by various dicta of English judges, I incline to think, that where a creditor is in pursuit of his demand, and the debtor transfers his choses in action, money, stock or 208 *other funds, which cannot be reached by execution, to trustees for his own benefit, leaving no property out of which the debt can be made, the creditor is entitled to demand the assistance of equity in getting at the property. This opinion is further sustained, I think, by the provision of our statute, which subjects every estate held in trust, to the demands of the creditors of the cestui que trust.

In this case, then, immediately on the return of the execution, no effects, except what are covered by a deed of trust, Mercer had a right to file his bill in equity against the trustees, demanding payment of his demand, after satisfying the demands secured by the deed. The death of Beale did not affect this right. The issue of his execution had given Mercer a lien on the equitable interest, which could not be affected by that event; and though, upon general principles, in such a suit, the executors were necessarily parties, yet the demand would not have been against them but against the trustees. And such, in fact, I conceive to be the actual state of this case. To the trustees, the plea of the 57th section of the statute of 1792 would have been of no avail, and in relation to this matter Norborne Beale stands in their shoes, as he has received the trust property. The plea of that statute, therefore, did not avail him.

On the whole I am of opinion that the decree is altogether right, and must be affirmed.

CABELL, J., said, he dissented from his brothers, as to the question respecting interest: that he thought, interest ought to be computed and allowed on the judgment from its date, and the payments applied, as the appellant claimed they ought to be. But he did not enter into the discussion of the point.

Decree affirmed.

Thorntons v. Fitzhugh*.

January, 1838.

(Absent CABELL, J.)

Decrees—Final—Right to Appeal after Three Years.—Testator bequeaths, that his executor shall pay his daughter $25. per annum so long as she shall remain single; and devises and bequeaths to his son, all his estate, real and personal, which shall remain after payment of debts and legacies; the son is the executor; he takes under the will large real and personal estate, either of which is amply sufficient to satisfy all legacies; he sells the real, wastes the personal, and dies insolvent: upon a bill by the daughter against the purchaser of the real estate, and two sons of a deceased surety of the executor in his executorial bond, holding estate of the surety, the chancellor decrees, that the sons should each pay one half of the annuities in arrear, and the costs of suit, reserving liberty to the plaintiff, if the decree should prove unavailing against either, to resort to the court for a further decree against the other, and ordering the cause to be retained in court for the purpose of taking further accounts as to the annuities to accrue in future: Held, notwithstanding the reservation, this is a final decree, from which no appeal can be taken after the lapse of three years from its date.

Legacies—Personalty Primarily Liable to Payment.—It seems, though the legacy was charged both on the real and personal estate, in the hands of the devisee and legatee of the residue, yet the personalty was primarily applicable to the legacy, and the decree was right in subjecting the surety of the executor, before the purchaser of the real estate.

Annuity—Arrears—Interest.—It seems, that on the bequest of an annuity by will in 1791, while the legal rate of interest was only five per cent. though the annuity fall in arrear after interest was raised to six per cent., yet only five per cent. ought to be allowed on such arrears.

William Fitzhugh of Marmion, who died in 1791, by his last will and testament devised and bequeathed, inter alia, as follows—"I leave my son Philip Fitzhugh all my estate, real and personal, which shall remain after payment of my legal debts, the support of my wife, and the legacies herein bequeathed"—and, in the sequel, he bequeathed, that his executors should pay his daughters Elizabeth and Anna Fitzhugh, the sum of £25. per annum, each, while they should remain single. The testator's son Philip was the executor; and Presley Thornton and John Thornton were his sureties in his executorial bond. He received under his father's will a large real and personal estate, either of which was much more than sufficient for the payment of all 210 *the legacies, and among the rest the annuities of £25. to his two sisters: but he sold all the real, and wasted all the personal estate, and died in 1807, utterly insolvent, so that he never had any personal representative. At his death, the annuity to Anna, who still remained single, had been several years in arrear and unpaid. And, in 1810, she exhibited her bill in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, against the purchasers of the real estate; in which, after setting forth her rights, and alleging that her brother Philip died insolvent, that his sureties in his executorial bond, Presley and John Thornton, were also both dead insolvent, and that there was no personal representative either of the executor or of his sureties, she claimed to charge the annuities then in arrear and due to her, and those to become due afterwards, on the lands devised to Philip, in the hands of the purchasers thereof. The purchasers, in their answer, insisted, that the personal estate of the testator, which came to the hands of Philip Fitzhugh, the executor, as well as devisee and legatee, of the testator, was liable, in the first instance, to the annuities, and ought to have been applied to the satisfaction of them by him as the executor, and that his sureties in his executorial bond ought to be charged with the annuities, by reason of his waste of the personal estate, in exoneration of the real estate in the hands of the purchasers; and they alleged, that the sureties left estate sufficient to satisfy the annuities due to the plaintiff.

In 1815, she filed a supplemental bill, in which she shewed, that the surety Presley Thornton left no estate whatever, and never had any personal representative; but that the surety John Thornton left estate sufficient to pay all the annuities due or to become due to her; that this surety died intestate, and his widow Susan Thornton was his administratrix, and that she was now dead, and John T. Lomax was her administrator; and that the estate of the surety John Thornton was now in the hands of his two sons, heirs and distributees, Philip Thornton and John Thornton the younger: and she made Lomax administrator 211 of Susan *Thornton the administratrix of John Thornton the surety, and his two sons, heirs and distributees, parties defendants; and prayed a decree against them for her annuities. The defendants Philip Thornton and John Thornton the younger answered, and admitted that they had received of the estate of their father John Thornton the surety, property amply sufficient to pay the annuities due or to become due to the plaintiff, if the estate of this surety was liable to make good the annuities, in exoneration of the real estate of the testator in the hands of the purchasers from Philip Fitzhugh the devisee thereof; but they insisted that the real estate in the hands of the purchasers ought to be charged with the annuities; or that, if the court should give the plaintiff relief against them, it ought to give them indemnity out of the real estate in the hands of the purchasers, in like manner as if the real estate were still in the hands of Philip Fitzhugh, the devisee, or his heirs.

The cause was long pending in the court of chancery. At length, it was ascertained by the report of a commissioner, that there was due the plaintiff for the arrears of her annuities from 1808 to 1825 (both inclusive) the sum of £450. principal, and £229. 10. 0. interest computed on the annuities after the rate of six per cent. per annum, making a total of principal and interest, £679. 10. 0.

Whereupon, the chancellor, in May 1826, decreed, that the defendant Philip Thornton should pay the plaintiff, one moiety of the sum appearing by the report to be due to her, namely, the sum of £339. 15. 0. with interest after the rate of six per cent. per annum on £225. part thereof, being principal, from December 1825, till paid; and that the defendant John Thornton the younger should pay her the other moiety, £339. 15. 0. with like interest on £225. the principal, till paid; and that each of these defendants should pay her one half of her costs of suit. And if the decree should prove unavailing, in whole or in part, either against Philip or John Thornton, liberty was reserved to the plaintiff, to apply to the court for a further decree 212 against *either of those defendants; and the cause was ordered to be retained in court, for the purpose of taking further accounts as to the annuities that might in future accrue to the plaintiff.

And on the 8th May 1827, the chancellor, on the motion of the plaintiff, ordered the same defendants, each, to pay her the sum of £12. 10. 0. with six per cent. interest from December 1826 (being a moiety of the annuity for the year 1826) and a moiety of the costs of her motion.

In March 1830, more than three years after the date of the decree of May 1826, but within three years from the date of the order of May 1827, the defendants Philip and John Thornton presented a petition to this court, praying an appeal from those decrees; which was allowed.

And now the cause was argued by John-son and Leigh for the appellants, and by Harrison and Stanard for the appellee, and for the purchasers of the real estate, upon three points—1. Whether the court of chancery ought not to have charged the annuities on the real estate of the testator in the hands of the purchasers from Philip Fitzhugh the devisee thereof, instead of subjecting the estate of the surety of Philip Fitzhugh the executor, bound in his executorial bond?—2. Whether interest on the annuities ought to have been given at all?—and 3. Whether, as these annuities were given by will in 1791, when the legal rate of interest was only five per cent., if interest should be allowed at all, it was right to allow more than five per cent.?

But the cause went off upon an objection taken by the counsel for the appellee,—that the appeal was barred by the statute of limitation of appeals, and ought to be dismissed, as the appeal had been allowed after three years from the decree of May 1826; they insisting, that that was a final decree in the cause, and the order of May 1827 nothing more than an order to carry the preceding final decree into effect. This objection presented two questions—1. Whether the decree of May 1826 was 213 final or interlocutory? *(for if it was final, the appeal from it was clearly barred) and 2. Whether, if the appeal from the decree of May 1826 was barred, an appeal would lie from the order of May 1827, so as to bring the principle of that order in review before this court?

CARR, J. This case presents at the outset, a question of jurisdiction. If the decree of May 1826 was interlocutory merely, the case is properly before us, but if that was a final decree, the appeal was improvidently allowed, as more than three years had elapsed from the date of the decree to the application for the appeal. We have had many cases here, where the question turned on the character of the decree. Without going into a particular examination of them, I shall avail myself of some of the conclusions which some of my brethren have drawn from them. In Alexander v. Coleman, 6 Munf. 339, 340, judge Cabell said,—“I have examined with great attention every case in this court on the subject of interlocutory decrees, from Young v. Skipwith, 2 Wash. 300, to the present time.”—“They were all without exception, decided on the same general principle, that every decree which leaves any thing to be done in the cause by the court, is interlocutory as between the parties remaining in court.” In Royall v. Johnson, 1 Rand. 427, judge Green said,—“I have carefully examined all the cases decided in this court, which I can find reported, upon the question of the interlocutory or final character of decrees”—“It is sufficient to say, that in all of them it was apparent, that the court intended to proceed further in the cause, and that it was necessary to do so, in order to put a final end to the controversy, between the parties, as to whom the decree was made.” In Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh 108, the court laid it down, that a decree which left no subject to be disposed of, no question to be decided by the court, was, in its nature, final; and judge Brooke very correctly added, “as to the reservations in this decree, those, and all similar reservations, are, in my view, simply provisions

214 for the execution *of the decree, as one final and conclusive, not reservations of any points for future consideration and decision.” These cases seem to me to take the true and clear distinction: where any thing is reserved by the court for future adjudication, in order to settle the matters in controversy, the decree is interlocutory; but where, upon the hearing, all these matters are settled by the decree, such decree is final, though much may remain to be done, before it can be completely carried into execution, and though, to effectuate such execution, the cause is retained, and leave given the parties to apply for the future aid of the court. It is well known that until 1798, there was no appeal from interlocutory decrees; the prior statutes gave them from final decrees only. These laws did not define what should be taken as final decrees. The phrase was perfectly familiar to every student of the english law, and in the sense there settled, it was no doubt used by our legislature. We may then look to the english cases, to ascertain that sense. In England, no appeal could be taken except from final decrees. Yet do the books teem with cases, where the chancellor having at the hearing decreed upon the matters in controversy, an appeal is immediately taken to the house of lords, though various details are directed in execution of the decree, the cause retained, and leave given to the parties to apply to the court. These details are never considered as affecting in the slightest degree the finality of the decree: indeed, it is a settled rule, that the appeal does not suspend the proceedings under the decree, unless it is so ordered on particular motion, by the chancellor, or the house of lords; Gwynn v. Lethbridge, 14 Ves. 585; Waldo v. Caley, 16 Ves. 206; Willan v. Willan, Id. 216. In Waldo v. Caley, a testator gave his personal estate to his executors, in trust to pay to his wife the neat income, interest &c. and enjoined it upon his wife to lay out one half her income yearly in charities with the advice and assistance of his executors; the wife and executors differed about their power in selecting the objects of charity: the master of the rolls decided,

215 *that the wife had the sole power, and was only in her discretion to ask the advice of the executors; that she was bound to lay out the half of her income yearly in charities; and declining, in this case, the usual course of having a scheme for applying the charity drawn up and laid before the master, he said,—“The purpose may be answered by reserving to any of the parties liberty to apply, as there shall be occasion, so that if at any time there shall be ground for supposing, that the fund has not been fairly expended, the court may be called on to interfere.” Here, we see liberty reserved to any of the parties during the whole life of the widow, and thus, the cause retained for that whole period, so far as was necessary for that purpose: yet an appeal was immediately taken. I shall cite one more case—Morice v. Bank of England, Ca. Temp. Talbot, 218, 2 Bro. P. C. new ed. 465. (Let it be premised, that in England, final decrees bind assets in the hands of executors, but interlocutory decrees have no such effect, Perry v. Phelps, 10 Ves. 34.) Certain creditors of Morice filed a bill against his executrix, praying the payment of their debts; she answered, confessing the bill; and the decree was, that an account of the personal assets be taken, and that those debts be paid in a course of administration: the bank, subsequently, sued at law and got a judgment against the executrix, as she could not in that court plead the decree: she filed her bill bringing the whole matter into equity, and praying protection: the chancellor decided, that the decree being first in time, had preference: an appeal was taken to the house of lords, where it was insisted that the decree was not final, being a mere order to take an account of the assets, and to pay the debts in a course of administration; but the decree of the chancellor was affirmed, thereby pronouncing this a final decree. And in Perry v. Phelps, lord Eldon shews the difference between this, and an interlocutory decree; this being a decree “ordering payment of sums, liquidated by the statement in the bill, and *the admission in the answer," which rendered it a final decree, though coupled with an order for an account of the personal assets &c. The supreme court of the U. States can only receive appeals from final decrees. In the case of Ray v. Law, 3 Cranch, 179, the court held, that a decree for a sale under a mortgage, is such a final decree as may be appealed from.

Let us now examine the decree before us. Looking to the nature of the controversy, I apprehend, that but for the liberty reserved to the plaintiff to resort to the court, to have an order for her annuities which should afterwards fall due, there could have been no possible doubt that the decree of May 1826 was final. It had given to the plaintiff her whole claim, with all her costs. True, it had not decreed over against the land, in case the personal fund should prove deficient; and if she had been dissatisfied with this, she might have appealed. It is also true, that the decree had not, in words, decided the matter of ultimate responsibility between the two classes of defendants; but had it not in fact settled that point? The representatives of the personal fund had prayed the court, if it should judge the land ultimately answerable, to decree against it directly, in exoneration of them; which the court ought certainly to have done (according to West v. Belches, 5 Munf. 187, and that class of cases) if it had considered the land liable over to the personal sureties. When, then, instead of doing this, the court decreed solely and exclusively against the personal sureties, did it not just as plainly declare, that the land is not liable over to them, as if it had said so in so many words? and is not the practical effect of the decree (supposing it to have stopped there) precisely the same? subjecting the appellants to pay the whole claim, refusing them a resort to the land, and thus, in effect, putting the purchasers of the land out of court. If this was wrong, that does not affect the finality of the decree. The mode of correction was an appeal. But the decree did not stop there: it provided, that if the 217 *decree should prove unavailing, in whole or in part, either against Philip or John Thornton, liberty was reserved to the plaintiff to apply to the court for a further decree against either of those defendants; and ordered the cause to be retained in court for the purpose of taking further accounts as to the annuities that might in future accrue to the plaintiff. It surely cannot be contended, that the reservation of liberty to the plaintiff, affects, in the least, the character of the decree: it was a provision for the benefit of the plaintiff, looking solely to the execution of the decree, and rendering it effectual. Did the retaining of the cause in court, for the purpose indicated, render the whole decree interlocutory? Unquestionably not, if we look to the meaning of the court. The cause was not retained to enable any of the parties to look back, or touch what had been done, but merely to enable the plaintiff to get decrees for her annuity as it should fall due. I presume there never was a decree for a running annuity, which did not in some form of words (and the form matters not) reserve to the annuitant this liberty. It answers to the scire facias, which issued, after judgment in the old writ of annuity, as new sums grew due. And if retaining the cause for this purpose, prevents the decree from being final, it follows (as was forcibly urged by counsel) that there never can be a final decree in a case like that before the court; for, during her whole life, she will be applying from year to year, and at her death, the whole matter, annuity and all, is at an end. A conclusion so monstrous as this can never be fairly attributed to the law.

I conclude that this was a final decree, and not having been appealed from within three years, cannot now be touched by this court. The appeal should be dismissed, as improvidently allowed.

Taking this view of the case, it is not material to decide whether, on the merits, the decree be right or wrong? I will say, however, that my impression is, that the chancellor was correct in subjecting first the personal estate, and consequently the estate of the surety in the executorial bond.

218 *BROOKE, J. It is the settled principle of this court, that if the whole matter put in controversy by the pleadings is decided, the decree is final, and not interlocutory, although there are reservations embracing matters in execution of the decree, and although there may be a controversy growing out of the execution of it; as in the case of Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh, 108. Nor is it of any consequence whether the whole matter in controversy is decided by the decree, negatively or affirmatively:—whether the errors, if any, are errors of omission or commission, they do not affect the character of the decree. In Perry v. Phelps, 10 Ves. 34, there is much learning on this subject, and many cases examined, in the opinion of the lord chancellor; and all of them, I think, may be brought within the principles before stated. In the case before us, if the plaintiff had not sought to charge the lands in the hands of the purchasers, and had sued the sureties of the executor, on the bond for the due administration of the personal estate, the judgment for the annuities already due would have reserved the right of the plaintiff to sue out a scire facias, toties quoties, for the future annuities as they should fall due; and yet the judgment must have been held to be final. If, in this case, this had not been necessary,—if there had been no future sums to become due,—it is impossible to conceive what matter in controversy would have remained to be settled by the court. The exclusive decree against the sureties of the executor, without any intimation that the land in the possession of the purchasers, was to be subjected in any event (whether right or wrong) negatively decided that the land was, in no event, to be subjected to the payment of the annuity; and it appears to me to have been a casual omission, that the bill was not dismissed as to the purchasers of the real estate. The appeal not having been prayed in time, was improvidently allowed, and must, therefore, be dismissed.

My impression too is, that the decree is correct upon the merits, except in allowing six instead of five per cent. interest.

219 *TUCKER, P. In the examination of this case, we are met at the threshold by an objection to our jurisdiction over the subject. It is said, on the one hand, that the appeal has been improvidently allowed, since more than three years had elapsed from the date of the decree before the application for the appeal. In answer to this objection, it is contended, that the decree, in this case, is not final but interlocutory, and that the limitation in the statute applies only to the case of a final decree. The first question, then, to be examined, is, whether this be a final decree or not?

I heartily concur in the principles laid down on this subject in Royalls v. Johnson, 1 Rand. 421, and Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh, 108. In the former of those cases, it was decided, that where a decree is made as to one of several defendants, whose interests are not at all connected with each other, with a direction for the payment of costs as to that defendant, such decree is final as to him, although the cause may be still pending in court as to the rest. And in the latter, it is most truly said, that when a decree makes an end of a case, and decides the whole matter in contest, costs and all, leaving nothing further for the court to do, it is certainly a final decree. According to these principles, I was strongly impressed with the belief, that the decree in this case was final, until I had an opportunity of accurately examining the record. That examination has resulted in an opposite conviction, the reasons of which I shall endeavour succinctly to state.

1st, In this case, the cause is not out of court as to any of the parties. The entry is, "the court doth order this cause to be retained here for the purpose of taking further accounts as to future annuities." The cause being retained, the parties are all of course retained in court with it. Not only is there no decree at all as to the purchasers of the real estate before the court, but the appellants themselves have still a day in court: the cause being retained, they are not dismissed from the tribunal at whose bar they were commanded to appear. In this regard, the case differs

220 most essentially from the other cases, in which there is "liberty reserved to resort to the court for its further interposition." In those cases, the party availing himself of that liberty, files his petition, upon which process must issue, as his adversary has no day in court. But here, the cause being retained, the parties are still in court, and must attend to the progress of the cause at their peril. A cause continued in court under these circumstances, can scarcely be said, I think, to be finally decided.

But 2ndly, does the "decree, in this case, make an end of the cause, and decide the whole matter in contest, costs and all?" in the language of the court in Harvey v. Branson. To ascertain this, it will be necessary to advert to the pleadings in the case, and the points of controversy thereby presented. The plaintiff claimed to charge both the real estate in the hands of the purchasers, and the sureties of the executor, as responsible for the personality wasted by him, with her demand. Then, out of this claim on the part of the plaintiff, a question arose between the defendants as to which was ultimately to bear the burden. And this question was as much a part of the lis contestata to be settled by the court, as the demand of the plaintiff itself. For it is the established principle of the court, that where the pretensions of the defendants are fairly before it, if the plaintiff has a right to charge them both, the decree will either be rendered directly against the party who ought ultimately to be liable, or if, as sometimes happens, the decree is taken against the other, he will be entitled to a decree over. West v. Belches, 5 Munf. 187; M'Neil v. Baird, 6 Munf. 316; Morris v. Terrel, 2 Rand. 6; Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh, 492. Now, in this case, the respective rights and obligations of the co-defendants are completely ascertained by the pleadings and proofs between the plaintiff and those defendants. The question between them was, therefore, to be decided as part of this cause. Has it been so decided? I think not. The court has, indeed, decreed the plaintiff's demand against the sureties of the executor, who were 221 *doubtless liable in the first instance, but it has not pronounced upon the demand propounded by their answer, that the real estate should be made answerable over to them, in case they should be subjected in the first instance to the plaintiff's demand. So far from deciding this question between those parties, nothing is said about it, and both parties are yet before the court, awaiting its judgment upon the matter. It cannot be denied, I think, that as the cause is retained in court, as the parties are of course retained in court, and as an important and indeed vital question between the defendants, is yet unsettled, which the court ought to have decided, it may yet go on to decide that question.

It has been suggested, that the omission to decree over, was error in the decree, and did not enure to make the decree interlocutory. I do not think so. As it was entirely uncertain whether the decree against the appellants would or would not be available, the court could neither, at the date of this decree, have decreed in favor of the appellee against the purchasers of the land, who were only liable ultimately, if liable at all, nor could it have decreed over against the purchasers of the land in favor of the appellants, as they had then paid nothing. I think it more reasonable to consider these questions reserved, as all the parties were before the court, than gratuitously to impute to that tribunal, the error of omitting to dispose of an important question in the cause.

But it may be said, that, although the contest between the defendants as to their respective liabilities, has not been settled, the rights of the plaintiff as against the appellants have been finally adjudicated, that therefore the decree is final as between those parties, and that no decree as between the defendants can affect the appellee: and the case is thus supposed to be brought within the influence of the principle of Royalls v. Johnson. It is necessary to advert to the peculiarity of this case. The contest between the defendants, which, we have seen, the court was as much bound to adjust, as that between the plaintiff and the defendants, *did not grow out of the pleadings between them, but out of the pleadings between the plaintiff and them. If the decree puts an end to the cause as to the plaintiff, and puts her out of court, it puts all the defendants out of court of course. There being no cross cause as between the defendants, they can only be retained in court, and their pretensions decided, upon the foundation of a subsisting bill of the plaintiff against them; and if that bill be considered as put out of court by this decree, as a final decree, there is no foundation left, upon which the court can proceed to decree between the defendants.

I am, therefore, upon the whole, of opinion, that the decree in this case must be taken to be interlocutory, and so the appeal has been regularly allowed. But the other judges are of a different opinion on this point, and the appeal is to be dismissed. And I the less regret that disposition of the cause, though it is contrary to my own judgment on the point, since I am of opinion, on the merits, that the decree, taking it as a decree settling the controversy between the co-defendants, is right, and that the decree ought to be affirmed; except as to the allowance of six instead of five per cent. interest, in which respect the decree is erroneous, the plaintiff's claim having had its origin in a will made in 1791, when the legal rate of interest was only five per cent.

Equity Jurisdiction—Agents—Accounting.†—A private unchartered company, associated for the purpose of carrying on business as a bank, though such associations are contrary to law, shall be entertained in a court of chancery, in a suit against its cashier, for an account of his agency.

Evans and others, the stockholders or partners in an unchartered company formed in 1815, at Morgantown in Monongalia, called the Monongalia Farmers Company, exhibited their bill in the superior court of chancery of Clarksburg, against Berkshire, who had been the clerk of the company and intrusted with the care of its funds, charging that he had appropriated part of the funds to his own use, and praying an account of his agency, and a decree for the balance that should be found due thereon. Berkshire, in his answer, denied the defalcation laid to his charge; and, alleging, that the company was associated to carry on business, and had in fact carried on business, as a bank, and only as a bank, without authority of law, and in violation or evasion of the statutes prohibiting the circulation of private bank notes, and was therefore an illegal association, and that he, though called the clerk of the company, was in truth its cashier,—he insisted, that this suit of the plaintiffs could not be entertained against him to enforce the performance of his contract with this illegal company, as its cashier.

It appeared, by the articles of association, by the bond given by the clerk for the faithful discharge of his duties, and by the accounts filed as exhibits in the cause, and indeed it was impliedly admitted in the bill, that this was a private company, associated to carry on business as a bank, and none other, and which, in fact, traded only as a bank; and that Berkshire was the cashier: that this was one of those unchartered banks, of which so many were formed

224 *about the same time, for the purpose of trading as banks, and circulating private bank notes, in violation or evasion of the statutes of 1792 and 1804, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 207, and which were suppressed by the statute of 1816, Id. ch. 208.

The chancellor ordered Berkshire to render an account of his transactions as clerk of the company; and by the account taken and reported accordingly, it appeared, that Berkshire was indebted to the company, 364 dollars; upon which the chancellor decreed, that he should pay the plaintiffs that sum with interest. And, on an appeal taken by Berkshire to this court, the decree was affirmed.

had signed and sealed it at the time when it was recorded as to the husband.

This was a writ of dower unde nihil habet, brought in the circuit court of Cumberland, by Susanna Langhorne, widow of William Langhorne deceased, against Thomas Hobson, to recover dower of land of her deceased husband, now claimed and held by Hobson. Hobson pleaded, that William Langhorne, the husband, in his lifetime, and the plaintiff Susanna his wife, by deed of bargain and sale, dated the 25th November 1807, and duly executed by her *as well as by her husband, according to the statute in such case made and provided, conveyed the land whereof the plaintiff claimed dower, to the defendant in fee, by which deed, so duly executed by the plaintiff, she conveyed and released to the defendant her right of dower in the land. And upon this plea, an issue was made up.

The point thus put in issue, and the only point in controversy, was, whether the plaintiff had duly executed the deed of the 25th November, 1807, under which the defendant claimed, so as to make it her deed as well as her husband's, according to the statute of 1792? At the trial, the plaintiff filed two bills of exceptions to opinions of the court—

The first stated that the defendant, to sustain the issue on his part, offered in evidence,—1st, A deed of bargain and sale, dated the 25th November 1807, purporting, in the premises, to be the deed of William Langhorne and Susanna his wife of the county of Cumberland, and appearing 226 *to be signed and sealed by the wife as well as the husband, whereby the land of which she now claimed her dower, described as lying in that county, was conveyed to the defendant, in fee. 2ndly, A commission, issued by the clerk of the county court of Cumberland, dated the 2nd May 1809, and directed to John Woodson and Samuel Hobson (without describing

them as justices of the county, though they were so in fact) by which, after reciting the execution of the deed by Langhorne and wife, and that she could not conveniently travel to the county court to make acknowledgment thereof, the commissioners were empowered to receive the acknowledgment, that the wife should be willing to make before them, of the deed, which was annexed to the commission; and then the commission proceeded in these words—“And we do, therefore, command you, that you do personally go to the said Susanna, and receive her acknowledgment of the said conveyance, and examine her privily and apart from the said William Langhorne, her husband, whether she doth the same, freely and voluntarily, without his persuasions or threats; and whether she be willing that the same shall be recorded in our said county court of Cumberland; and when you have received her acknowledgment and examined her as aforesaid, that you distinctly and openly certify us thereof in our said court, under your seals, sending then there the said deed and this writ.” 3rdly, A certificate of the two justices and commissioners, under their hands and seals, indorsed on the commission, in these words—“In obedience to the within commission to us directed, we have personally waited on the within named Susanna Langhorne, wife of the within named William Langhorne, and examined her privily and apart from her said husband; and she the said Susanna acknowledged the deed hereto annexed, to be her act and deed, and declared that she did the same freely and voluntarily, without the persuasion or threats of her said husband, and also relinquished her right of dower in the land within mentioned conveyed by the said deed, and is willing 227 that the same with *this her acknowledgment should be recorded in our county court of Cumberland—we the subscribers having read the said deed and explained the same to the said —” [here, there was a blank].—“All which” (it was stated in this bill of exceptions) “had been duly recorded in the county court of Cumberland.” And 4thly, The testimony of Samuel Hobson, one of the commissioners, the other John Woodson being dead, that Hobson's signature to the certificate was written by himself, and Woodson's signature by him, to authenticate the same as their joint official act. Whereupon, the plaintiff's counsel moved the court to exclude the commission and the certificate thereon indorsed, from going in evidence to the jury, on the ground, that the commission and certificate were not duly conformable with the statute in such case made and provided: but the court overruled the objection, and admitted the evidence: to which the plaintiff's counsel excepted.

The second bill of exceptions stated, that the deed of bargain and sale of Langhorne and wife (in the first bill of exceptions mentioned) was offered in evidence, with the certificate of the clerk of the county court, thereon indorsed, in these words—“Cumberland, December court, 1807, this deed was acknowledged and ordered to be recorded”—and that the commission for

*Old Rev. Code, ch. 90, § 6; Pleasant's ed. p. 157, 8. The words of the statute, are—“When husband and wife have sealed and delivered a writing, purporting to be a conveyance of any estate or interest, if she appear in court, and being examined privily and apart from her husband, by one of the judges thereof, shall declare to him that she did freely and willingly seal and deliver the said writing, to be then shewn and explained to her, and wishes not to retract it, and shall before the said court acknowledge the said writing, again shewn to her, to be her act,—or if before two justices of the peace of that county in which she dwelleth, if her dwelling be in the United States of America, who may be empowered by commission, to be issued by the clerk of the court wherein the writing ought to be recorded, to examine her privily, and take her acknowledgment, the wife being examined privily and apart from her husband by those commissioners, shall declare that she willingly signed and sealed the said writing, to be then shewn and explained to her by them, and consenteth that it may be recorded, and the said commissioners shall return, with the commission, and thereunto annexed, a certificate under their hands and seals of such privy examination by them, and of such declaration made and consent yielded by her,—in either case, the said writing, acknowledged also by the husband, or proved by witnesses to be his act, and recorded together with such her privy examination and acknowledgment before the court, or together with such commission and certificate, shall not only be sufficient to convey or release any right of dower thereby intended to be conveyed or released, but be as effectual for every other purpose, as if she were an unmarried woman.”—Note in Original Edition.

the privy examination of the wife, and the certificate of her privy examination, were also offered in evidence (without stating, in this bill of exceptions, that these had also been recorded); whereupon the plaintiff's counsel moved, that the deed, commission and certificate, should be excluded from going in evidence to the jury, because the deed had not been recorded together with the privy examination, after it had been signed by the wife, and acknowledged by her to be her act and deed, as certified by the commissioners: but the court overruled this objection also, and admitted the evidence: to which the plaintiff's counsel excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant; from which the plaintiff appealed to this court. And now, 228 *the cause was argued here, by Taylor for the appellant; there was no counsel for the appellee.

Taylor said, that the commission which issued from the clerk's office under which the privy examination of the wife was made, did not conform with the provisions of the statute. The statute required that the deed should be shewn to the feme covert, and explained to her, by the commissioners; the commission did not require them to shew and explain it to her: and if they did so, in fact, they exceeded the authority given them by the commission. The statute required, that the feme covert should declare before the commissioners, that she had willingly signed and sealed the deed; the commission in this case, did not require, that she should be asked, whether she had willingly signed and sealed it, or even whether she had signed it, or sealed it, at all, but only whether she then acknowledged it. But if the commission was in proper form, and gave authority to the commissioners to do every thing that the law required, still it is plain, the commissioners did not perform the duties imposed on them by the statute; at least, it does not appear by their certificate, that they did: they neither certified, that they shewed her the deed, nor that she declared to them she had willingly signed and sealed it, or that she wished not to retract it. If the form of this commission, and certificate of privy examination, be sufficient, and shall be adjudged to be a compliance with the statute; then, a deed executed by the husband, without the signature or seal of the wife, if two justices of the peace, to whom a commission shall be issued to take and certify the privy examination of the wife, shall certify that she acknowledged the deed before them, and consented that it might be recorded, although her name and seal may be affixed to the deed, at any time afterwards, by any person, without her knowledge or consent, such deed would convey her inheritance, or possibility of dower, against the plain words and obvious meaning of the statute.

The provisions of the statute were designed to protect the rights *of the wife, not only against any fraud or imposition which the husband might be disposed to practise upon her, but against fraud and imposition from every quarter, and even against her own hasty and inconsiderate acts; and it was with this intent that it required, in case of a privy examination of a feme covert taken out of court, the presence of at least two commissioners, being justices of the peace, to act jointly and not separately: it required the commissioners to shew the feme covert the deed, in order that a spurious conveyance might not be imposed upon her: it required, that they should explain the conveyance to her, that she might not part with any right which she did not willingly and deliberately intend to part with: it also required, that she should inform the commissioners, that she had willingly signed and sealed the conveyance, and that she wished not to retract it, not that she acknowledged to them a writing to be her deed, at the time neither signed nor sealed by her, to be used as authority by the grantee, or any other person, to set her name and seal to it at any after time, and thereby make it an effectual conveyance or release of her rights. The statute obviously authorized the feme covert to annul her previous acts of signing and sealing, if she desired to retract them, at the very period of privy examination. The case of Ware v. Cary, 2 Call, 263, is not an authority for the judgment of the circuit court. It is true, the commission and privy examination, in this case, are like the commission and privy examination in that: but there, the commission and privy examination were in conformity with the statute of 1748, ch. 1, § 6, 5, Hen. Stat. at large, p. 410, under which the deed was executed, and the privy examination taken: here, the commission and privy examination were still conformed with the statute of 1748, though the deed was executed by the husband, and the privy examination of the wife was taken, not under that statute, but under the statute of 1792, which made many material alterations in the law on the subject, and enacted new provisions, manifestly for the purpose of more effectually guarding and pro-

230 tecting *the rights and interests of femes covert. The enacting of these new provisions by the statute of 1792, evinced the legislative sense of their importance; but if the commission and privy examination, in this case, shall be held good, they being exactly in form and substance what the statute of 1748 required, it must be because the new provisions of the statute of 1792, not one of which was complied with, should be regarded as wholly idle and nugatory. It has been well said, that "it is clear, upon well received principles, that this statute must be strictly pursued; for it is an innovation upon the common law; and, moreover, it prescribes a mode in which a person may convey, who was before disabled to convey: that mode must, therefore, be pursued; and as we do not pursue it, if we vary from it, so it follows, that it must be strictly complied with." 1 Tucker's notes on Blac. Comm. book 2, ch. 17, p. 259.

As to the second bill of exceptions, he said, the question whether the opinion of the circuit court therein stated, was correct or no, depended on the construction of the statute of 1792; the words of which, in relation to this point, were—"In either case, the said writing, acknowledged also by the husband, or proved by witnesses to be his act, and recorded together with such privy examination and acknowledgment before the court, or together with such commission and certificate, shall not only be sufficient to convey or release any right of dower thereby intended to be conveyed or released, but be as effectual for every other purpose, as if she were an unmarried woman." The circuit court (as he understood the bill of exceptions) decided, that at the time the deed in question was admitted to record upon the acknowledgment of William Langhorne, the husband, it was not necessary, that it should have been signed and sealed by the wife, but that her signature and seal put to the deed at or before the privy examination, would make it a good and sufficient deed to bind her interests. The statute most certainly required, that the deed should be signed and sealed by the wife, as well as 231 when it was *the deed of the husband only, but after it had been signed and sealed by the wife. If the deed was signed and sealed by the husband only, and was admitted to record upon his acknowledgment, and was afterwards signed and sealed by the wife, it became by this subsequent signing and sealing of the wife, a new and a different deed from the deed of the husband which had been recorded. It was this new deed which only became the deed of the husband and wife, by her subsequently signing, sealing and delivering it, that the statute required should be recorded, to bind the rights of the wife; but it never was recorded, and therefore did not bind her rights.

Sed per curiam, the opinions of the circuit court are correct, and the judgment is affirmed.

Gore v. Buzzard's Adm'rs.

February, 1833.

Liability of Master for Transactions Carried on by Slave.—A person sends raw hides to a tanner, and receives tanned leather in return, by his slave: Held, he is responsible to the tanner for the difference between the value of the raw material and the manufactured article, notwithstanding the dealings were conducted on his part wholly through the agency of the slave. It appearing that the slave acted by verbal directions of his master.

Assumpsit*—Declaration—Allegations—Proof.—In assumpsit, there are two counts: one for the agreed price of goods sold; the other, quantum valebant for the same; on the general issue, the proof is, that plaintiff, being a tanner, received raw hides from defendant, and credited him for the value, and sent him in return tanned leather, and debited him with the value thereof, and the debt claimed is the balance appearing due the tanner on these dealings: Held, the proof is properly applicable to, and sustains the declaration.

Assumpsit by Buzzard's administrators against Gore, in the county court of Frederick. The declaration contained, 1. the common count of indebitatus assumpsit for the agreed price of goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs' intestate to the defendant, and 2. a count of quantum valebant for *the same goods. The 232 defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and the statute of limitations; but, it seemed, no effort was made to sustain the latter plea.

At the trial, the defendant filed a demurrer to evidence, in which the plaintiffs joined. The evidence therein stated, was—That for some four or five years preceding the death of Buzzard, who was a tanner, Gore was in the habit of sending raw hides to Buzzard's tannery, and getting tanned leather from him; but he never transacted any part of these dealings in person, his raw hides having been always brought to the tannery, and the tanned leather always sent to him, by his slaves, without any written order from him, and indeed without a word passing between him and Buzzard on the subject; that since Buzzard's death, Gore had dealt with two other tanners in the neighbourhood, in the same manner, through the agency of his slaves; he always sending his raw hides and the tanners sending back tanned leather, by the slaves, without written orders from Gore, or a word said by him to the tanners; and the accounts of these tanners for the debts so contracted by Gore through the agency of his slaves, had been settled by him without dispute: that the items of Buzzard's account, namely, the charges for tanned leather sent Gore by his slaves, and the credits for raw hides brought by them, were first set down on a slate, and thence posted in a book by Buzzard himself; but Gore's dealings with Buzzard, as charged in those accounts, amounted to about the same per annum, as his dealings with the other two tanners afterwards: that, in fact, it was the habit of Gore, to send his raw hides to some tannery, and to receive tanned leather in exchange, by his slaves, only giving verbal directions to them, to deliver the raw hides, and bring back what tanned leather he wanted: that, after Buzzard's death, Gore desired a witness to apply to his administrators for his account; which being sent him, he examined it, and said, he would not pay interest (which the administrators had charged) but that if they would give him the credits he was entitled to, he would pay the principal, 233 *if any should be due: and that Gore procured the assignment of a bond of one of Buzzard's administrators, saying, he expected the amount of that bond would be enough to meet the claim of Buzzard's estate against him.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on the demurrer to evidence. The county court gave judgment on the demurrer for the defendant. Buzzard's administrators appealed to the circuit court, which reversed the judgment of the county court, and gave judgment for them. And then Gore appealed to this court.

Nicholas, for the appellant. 1st, The evidence did not sustain either count of the declaration. If it proved any contract, it was not a contract for the sale of tanned leather by Buzzard to Gore, either for a price certain and agreed, or for the reasonable value, but a contract for the exchange or barter of raw hides for tanned leather, from time to time. The customer or the manufacturer, as the case might be, was only bound to make good the difference between the value of the manufactured articles furnished by the one, and the raw material furnished by the other, if and whenever such difference should occur, by the delivery of like articles. 2ndly, The law of Virginia, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 19, p. 426, provides, that "no person whatever shall buy, sell or receive, of, to or from, a slave, any commodity whatever, without the leave or consent of the master, owner or overseer of such slave," and imposes a penalty on any person dealing with a slave without such leave or consent. It would defeat the policy of this statute, and be of mischievous consequence, if a person may be allowed to carry on (as Buzzard did in this case) dealings for a series of years, with the slaves of his neighbor, receiving raw materials from them, and delivering the manufactured article they ask for, without a word said by or to the owner on the subject, before, during, or after such dealings, and then to recover from the owner what may be due on the transaction.

234 *upon the implied leave or consent of the owner to the dealings of his slaves. The policy of the statute cannot be effectuated, but by requiring a person who deals with a slave, to have the express leave or consent of the owner, before or at the time of the dealings. Therefore, the evidence is insufficient in law to prove, that the agency of Gore's slaves in these dealings with Buzzard, was authorized by Gore; and the judgment of the county court was right,—as the judgment of a county court will generally be found to be, in all cases involving a question of police.

Johnson, contra. Supposing the objection arising from the agency of the slaves out of the way, the dealings fairly to be inferred from the evidence, consisted in sales of raw hides by Gore to Buzzard, and sales of tanned leather by Buzzard to Gore; for there is evidence, that Buzzard gave Gore credit for the value of the raw hides, and charged him with that of the tanned leather, in money; and that this account being rendered to Gore, he made no objection to the items of debit, but only claimed credits beyond what were allowed him, of which however, he never adduced any proof. And this evidence, moreover, suffices to prove a distinct admission by Gore, that the agency of his slaves in these dealings, was authorized by him; that his slaves received the tanned leather he wanted, which constituted the items of debit in the account, by his leave and consent, or rather by his express direction previously given to them. The authorized agency of Gore's slaves in his dealings with Buzzard, is also proved by the evidence of his dealing in that manner with two other tanners, and of his habit of dealing through the agency of his slaves,—of giving verbal directions to them to deliver his raw hides at the tannery, and to receive the tanned leather he wanted. The statute referred to, does not prohibit the receiving of goods from the owner by the hands of his slaves; nor does it require that the leave or consent of the owner to the dealings of his slaves, even on their own account, shall be in writing. The just inference from the evidence in this case, is, that Gore's slaves acted 235 *in these dealings by his directions and for him; in other words, by his leave and consent expressly and previously given: but, certainly, such leave and consent might have been implied from his subsequent conduct, without direct positive proof.

CARR, J. A demurrer to evidence is always a dangerous course; and here, I think it was particularly ill-advised. For the evidence stated in the demurrer, giving it only fair play, and drawing the inferences which a jury should reasonably have drawn from it, is quite sufficient to establish the appellee's claim to recover. The facts proved furnish the strongest grounds to infer, that for a series of years Gore was in the habit of getting his leather from Buzzard's tannery; that though his slaves were his agents, or rather his instruments, for carrying raw hides to the tanner, and bringing back tanned leather, yet it was he who sent the raw material and received the manufactured article; and that he was to pay the difference, if any, between the values of what he thus bought and sold. When Buzzard's administrators rendered the account, at Gore's instance, he examined it, and did not object to any of the charges against him; he only objected to the charge of interest, and said that if they would give him the credit she was entitled to, he would pay the principal. This was a plain admission of the justice of the account, except as to the interest, and as to the credits he claimed, which, however, he never attempted to prove; and this admission alone, affords a decisive answer to the whole argument for the appellant. The judgment of the circuit court is right.

The other judges concurred. Judgment affirmed.

Escheat of Debtor's Land—Petition of Creditor—Affidavit—Evidence.—Upon a petition under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 83, § 14 by the creditor of a person whose lands have been escheated, the creditor is required to make affidavit that the amount of his demand is bona fide due, but this requisition of the statute does not dispense with the necessity of other evidence: the court can only render judgment for such sum as is proved to be due.

Appellate Practice—Judgment for Whole Demand, When Whole Not Proved—Effect.—If judgment has been rendered for the whole amount of the demand, when the whole is not proved to be due, and it is uncertain to what part the proof extends, an appellate court will reverse the judgment and dismiss the petition.

Escheat of Debtor's Land—Right of Escheator to Plead Statute of Limitations.—The escheator who is defendant to the petition has the same right to plead the statute of limitations in bar of the petition, that a representative of the debtor would have to plead the statute in bar of an action.

Same—Same—Exception.—Where the exception in the statute of limitations, of accounts which concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, will apply to accounts, no item of which has arisen within five years.

†Dealings between Merchant and Merchant—Statute of Limitations—Exception.—If the items of the lication to the plea of the statute of limitations, that the accounts concerned the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant: no evidence is adduced to prove that either party was a merchant during the time of the dealings between them, nor any evidence of the character of those dealings but that furnished by the account of the petitioner: in which account, the debits to the alleged debtor, consisted of two items for cash paid him on account of bills of exchange, one item for goods sold him, and the other items for cash advanced to or for him, and there was a single credit for the proceeds of a bill of exchange bought of him: HELD, that the replication was not supported by the evidence, and the demand therefore was barred by the statute.

James Lyle administrator of James Lyle the elder deceased, who was the surviving partner of Lyle & M'Creddie, presented a petition to the county court of Albemarle, at August term 1821—shewing, that Robert Miller, a merchant of that county, was indebted to Lyle & M'Creddie, on an unsettled and running account, common among merchants, in the sum of 141 dollars, and died without settling the account, leaving no personal estate to pay the debt, but seized of a parcel of land in Albemarle, which had 237 been regularly escheated to the commonwealth, by office found, for want of heirs of the decedent, and had been sold by the escheator, who still held the proceeds of sale in his hands; and, therefore, praying, that Watson, the escheator, should be made defendant, and should be directed to pay the debt due the petitioner from the decedent, out of the proceeds of sale of the escheated land, according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 82, § 14, p. 297.

In the account exhibited with the petition, the debits to Miller consisted of two items for cash paid him on account of bills of exchange, one item for goods sold him, and the other items for cash advanced to or for him; and there was a single credit, for the proceeds of a bill of exchange bought of him. And the first item in the account account between merchant and merchant are all on one side, the claim will not be within the reason or principle of the exception, which intended open and current accounts, where there were mutual dealings and mutual credits or debits. *Roots v. *The statute provides, that "When any person shall die indebted, seized of lands which shall become escheated to the commonwealth, not having personal property sufficient to pay such debts, the creditor may exhibit his petition before the court of the county or corporation, in which such escheat shall take place, or in the superior court of law for such county, making the escheator of such county or corporation a party defendant, who shall defend such claim; and the said court shall proceed to judgment according to the right of the case, and render the same for such sum as shall appear to be due to such petitioner, if any thing; and it shall be the duty of such escheator, on such judgment being rendered, to satisfy and pay the amount thereof, if the proceeds of the sale be sufficient, and yet in his hands; and if the same shall be paid into the treasury, the auditor shall, and is hereby required, on a copy of such judgment, properly authenticated, being filed, to issue a warrant; and the treasurer shall pay the amount, or so much as has been received on account of such sale: Provided, That the slaves and other personal estate shall be previously applied in the payment of the debts of the said decedent, and that every such creditor shall annex an affidavit to the said petition, stating that the amount of his or her demand is bona fide due and owing at the time of preferring the petition."—Note in Original Edition.

was dated in October 1803, and the last in August 1806.

At the same term of the county court, Robertson surviving partner of Bridges & Robertson, presented a petition to the court against Watson the escheator; exactly similar to that of Lyle's administrator, mutatis mutandis; in which he prayed, that the escheator should be directed to pay him a debt of 2837 dollars, being the balance due from Miller to Bridges & Robertson, on an unsettled running account between them.

238 *There were two accounts exhibited with the petition, in this case. The first was an account of dealing between Miller and Bridges & Robertson, commencing in July 1811, and ending in September 1814, at which time Miller died; and the credits to Miller consisted of one item for tobacco, and nine items of cash received from him, and the debits consisted of a few items for goods sold him, and numerous items of cash advanced to or for him. In the other account, raised between Miller's estate after his death and Bridges & Robertson, the first item was dated in October 1814, and the last in August 1816: and in this account, Miller's estate was charged with the balance due from him in his lifetime, and some other moneys which became due after his death, in consequence of dealings which commenced in his lifetime, and also with all the moneys disbursed for the estate, by Bridges who was Miller's administrator, as having been in fact disbursed by Bridges & Robertson; and the estate was credited with the moneys received by Bridges, the administrator, for Miller's estate; shewing the balance of 2837 dollars claimed in the petition, as due Bridges & Robertson. In the first of these accounts, there were seven charges, amounting to more than 1800 dollars, for advances by Bridges & Robertson to take up notes and acceptances of Miller; and, in the last, charges to the amount of 744 dollars, for a note of Miller for 698 dollars, with interest and charges of protest, paid by Bridges & Robertson after Miller's death.

The escheator pleaded the act of limitations, in both cases, to which the petitioners replied, that the accounts concerned the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant.

In the case of Lyle's administrator, there was no evidence to prove, that either Lyle & M'Creddie, or Miller, during the time of the dealings between them, were merchants, and no other evidence of the character of the dealings between these parties, but that which the account furnished. In Robertson's case, there was proof, that from the year 1803, Miller was engaged, principally, as a merchant *in trade, and that, for some years previous to his death, he was engaged in speculations in the produce of the country, and in the manufacture of cotton cloth; but the only proof that the dealings between these parties, were dealings between them as merchant and merchant, was that furnished by the accounts.

Each of the petitioners verified the allegations of his petition by his own affidavit: each of them, moreover, adduced affidavits mission in the answer," which rendered it a final decree, though coupled with an order for an account of the personal assets &c. The supreme court of the U. States can only receive appeals from final decrees. In the case of Ray v. Law, 3 Cranch, 179, the court held, that a decree for a sale under a mortgage, is such a final decree as may be appealed from.

Let us now examine the decree before us. Looking to the nature of the controversy, I apprehend, that but for the liberty reserved to the plaintiff to resort to the court, to have an order for her annuities which should afterwards fall due, there could have been no possible doubt that the decree of May 1826 was final. It had given to the plaintiff her whole claim, with all her costs. True, it had not decreed over against the land, in case the personal fund should prove deficient; and if she had been dissatisfied with this, she might have appealed. It is also true, that the decree had not, in words, decided the matter of ultimate responsibility between the two classes of defendants; but had it not in fact settled that point? The representatives of the personal fund had prayed the court, if it should judge the land ultimately answerable, to decree against it directly, in exoneration of them; which the court ought certainly to have done (according to West v. Belches, 5 Munf. 187, and that class of cases) if it had considered the land liable over to the personal sureties. When, then, instead of doing this, the court decreed solely and exclusively against the personal sureties, did it not just as plainly declare, that the land is not liable over to them, as if it had said so in so many words? and is not the practical effect of the decree (supposing it to have stopped there) precisely the same? subjecting the appellants to pay the whole claim, refusing them a resort to the land, and thus, in effect, putting the purchasers of the land out of court. If this was wrong, that does not affect the finality of the decree. The mode of correction was an appeal. But the decree did not stop there: it provided, that if the 217 *decree should prove unavailing, in whole or in part, either against Philip or John Thornton, liberty was reserved to the plaintiff to apply to the court for a further decree against either of those defendants; and ordered the cause to be retained in court for the purpose of taking further accounts as to the annuities that might in future accrue to the plaintiff. It surely cannot be contended, that the reservation of liberty to the plaintiff, affects, in the least, the character of the decree: it was a provision for the benefit of the plaintiff, looking solely to the execution of the decree, and rendering it effectual. Did the retaining of the cause in court, for the purpose indicated, render the whole decree interlocutory? Unquestionably not, if we look to the meaning of the court. The cause was not retained to enable any of the parties to look back, or touch what had been done, but merely to enable the plaintiff to get decrees for her annuity as it should fall due. I presume there never was a decree for a running annuity, which did not in some form of words (and the form matters not) reserve to the annuitant this liberty. It answers to the scire facias, which issued, after judgment in the old writ of annuity, as new sums grew due. And if retaining the cause for this purpose, prevents the decree from being final, it follows (as was forcibly urged by counsel) that there never can be a final decree in a case like that before the court; for, during her whole life, she will be applying from year to year, and at her death, the whole matter, annuity and all, is at an end. A conclusion so monstrous as this can never be fairly attributed to the law.

I conclude that this was a final decree, and not having been appealed from within three years, cannot now be touched by this court. The appeal should be dismissed, as improvidently allowed.

Taking this view of the case, it is not material to decide whether, on the merits, the decree be right or wrong? I will say, however, that my impression is, that the chancellor was correct in subjecting first the personal estate, and consequently the estate of the surety in the executorial bond.

218 *BROOKE, J. It is the settled principle of this court, that if the whole matter put in controversy by the pleadings is decided, the decree is final, and not interlocutory, although there are reservations embracing matters in execution of the decree, and although there may be a controversy growing out of the execution of it; as in the case of Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh, 108. Nor is it of any consequence whether the whole matter in controversy is decided by the decree, negatively or affirmatively:—whether the errors, if any, are errors of omission or commission, they do not affect the character of the decree. In Perry v. Phelps, 10 Ves. 34, there is much learning on this subject, and many cases examined, in the opinion of the lord chancellor; and all of them, I think, may be brought within the principles before stated. In the case before us, if the plaintiff had not sought to charge the lands in the hands of the purchasers, and had sued the sureties of the executor, on the bond for the due administration of the personal estate, the judgment for the annuities already due would have reserved the right of the plaintiff to sue out a scire facias, toties quoties, for the future annuities as they should fall due; and yet the judgment must have been held to be final. If, in this case, this had not been necessary,—if there had been no future sums to become due,—it is impossible to conceive what matter in controversy would have remained to be settled by the court. The exclusive decree against the sureties of the executor, without any intimation that the land in the possession of the purchasers, was to be subjected in any event (whether right or wrong) negatively decided that the land was, in no event, to be subjected to the payment of the annuity; and it appears to me to have been a casual omission, that the bill was not dismissed as to the purchasers of the real estate. The appeal not having been prayed in time, was improvidently allowed, and must, therefore, be dismissed.

My impression too is, that the decree is correct upon the merits, except in allowing six instead of five per cent. interest.

219 *TUCKER, P. In the examination of this case, we are met at the threshold by an objection to our jurisdiction over the subject. It is said, on the one hand, that the appeal has been improvidently allowed, since more than three years had elapsed from the date of the decree before the application for the appeal. In answer to this objection, it is contended, that the decree, in this case, is not final but interlocutory, and that the limitation in the statute applies only to the case of a final decree. The first question, then, to be examined, is, whether this be a final decree or not?

I heartily concur in the principles laid down on this subject in Royalls v. Johnson, 1 Rand. 421, and Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh, 108. In the former of those cases, it was decided, that where a decree is made as to one of several defendants, whose interests are not at all connected with each other, with a direction for the payment of costs as to that defendant, such decree is final as to him, although the cause may be still pending in court as to the rest. And in the latter, it is most truly said, that when a decree makes an end of a case, and decides the whole matter in contest, costs and all, leaving nothing further for the court to do, it is certainly a final decree. According to these principles, I was strongly impressed with the belief, that the decree in this case was final, until I had an opportunity of accurately examining the record. That examination has resulted in an opposite conviction, the reasons of which I shall endeavour succinctly to state.

1st, In this case, the cause is not out of court as to any of the parties. The entry is, "the court doth order this cause to be retained here for the purpose of taking further accounts as to future annuities." The cause being retained, the parties are all of course retained in court with it. Not only is there no decree at all as to the purchasers of the real estate before the court, but the appellants themselves have still a day in court: the cause being retained, they are not dismissed from the tribunal at whose bar they were commanded to appear. In this regard, the case differs

220 most essentially from the other cases, in which there is "liberty reserved to resort to the court for its further interposition." In those cases, the party availing himself of that liberty, files his petition, upon which process must issue, as his adversary has no day in court. But here, the cause being retained, the parties are still in court, and must attend to the progress of the cause at their peril. A cause continued in court under these circumstances, can scarcely be said, I think, to be finally decided.

But 2ndly, does the "decree, in this case, make an end of the cause, and decide the whole matter in contest, costs and all?" in the language of the court in Harvey v. Branson. To ascertain this, it will be necessary to advert to the pleadings in the case, and the points of controversy thereby presented. The plaintiff claimed to charge both the real estate in the hands of the purchasers, and the sureties of the executor, as responsible for the personality wasted by him, with her demand. Then, out of this claim on the part of the plaintiff, a question arose between the defendants as to which was ultimately to bear the burden. And this question was as much a part of the lis contestata to be settled by the court, as the demand of the plaintiff itself. For it is the established principle of the court, that where the pretensions of the defendants are fairly before it, if the plaintiff has a right to charge them both, the decree will either be rendered directly against the party who ought ultimately to be liable, or if, as sometimes happens, the decree is taken against the other, he will be entitled to a decree over. West v. Belches, 5 Munf. 187; M'Neil v. Baird, 6 Munf. 316; Morris v. Terrel, 2 Rand. 6; Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh, 492. Now, in this case, the respective rights and obligations of the co-defendants are completely ascertained by the pleadings and proofs between the plaintiff and those defendants. The question between them was, therefore, to be decided as part of this cause. Has it been so decided? I think not. The court has, indeed, decreed the plaintiff's demand against the sureties of the executor, who were 221 *doubtless liable in the first instance, but it has not pronounced upon the demand propounded by their answer, that the real estate should be made answerable over to them, in case they should be subjected in the first instance to the plaintiff's demand. So far from deciding this question between those parties, nothing is said about it, and both parties are yet before the court, awaiting its judgment upon the matter. It cannot be denied, I think, that as the cause is retained in court, as the parties are of course retained in court, and as an important and indeed vital question between the defendants, is yet unsettled, which the court ought to have decided, it may yet go on to decide that question.

It has been suggested, that the omission to decree over, was error in the decree, and did not enure to make the decree interlocutory. I do not think so. As it was entirely uncertain whether the decree against the appellants would or would not be available, the court could neither, at the date of this decree, have decreed in favor of the appellee against the purchasers of the land, who were only liable ultimately, if liable at all, nor could it have decreed over against the purchasers of the land in favor of the appellants, as they had then paid nothing. I think it more reasonable to consider these questions reserved, as all the parties were before the court, than gratuitously to impute to that tribunal, the error of omitting to dispose of an important question in the cause.

But it may be said, that, although the contest between the defendants as to their respective liabilities, has not been settled, the rights of the plaintiff as against the appellants have been finally adjudicated, that therefore the decree is final as between those parties, and that no decree as between the defendants can affect the appellee: and the case is thus supposed to be brought within the influence of the principle of Royalls v. Johnson. It is necessary to advert to the peculiarity of this case. The contest between the defendants, which, we have seen, the court was as much bound to adjust, as that between the plaintiff and the defendants, "did not grow out of the pleadings between them, but out of the pleadings between the plaintiff and them. If the decree puts an end to the cause as to the plaintiff, and puts her out of court, it puts all the defendants out of court of course. There being no cross cause as between the defendants, they can only be retained in court, and their pretensions decided, upon the foundation of a subsisting bill of the plaintiff against them; and if that bill be considered as put out of court by this decree, as a final decree, there is no foundation left, upon which the court can proceed to decree between the defendants.

I am, therefore, upon the whole, of opinion, that the decree in this case must be taken to be interlocutory, and so the appeal has been regularly allowed. But the other judges are of a different opinion on this point, and the appeal is to be dismissed. And I the less regret that disposition of the cause, though it is contrary to my own judgment on the point, since I am of opinion, on the merits, that the decree, taking it as a decree settling the controversy between the co-defendants, is right, and that the decree ought to be affirmed; except as to the allowance of six instead of five per cent. interest, in which respect the decree is erroneous, the plaintiff's claim having had its origin in a will made in 1791, when the legal rate of interest was only five per cent.

Equity Jurisdiction—Agents—Accounting.—A private unchartered company, associated for the purpose of carrying on business as a bank, though such associations are contrary to law, shall be entertained in a court of chancery, in a suit against its cashier, for an account of his agency.

Evans and others, the stockholders or partners in an unchartered company formed in 1815, at Morgantown in Monongalia, called the Monongalia Farmers Company, exhibited their bill in the superior court of chancery of Clarksburg, against Berkshire, who had been the clerk of the company and intrusted with the care of its funds, charging that he had appropriated part of the funds to his own use, and praying an account of his agency, and a decree for the balance that should be found due thereon. Berkshire, in his answer, denied the defalcation laid to his charge; and, alleging, that the company was associated to carry on business, and had in fact carried on business, as a bank, and only as a bank, without authority of law, and in violation or evasion of the statutes prohibiting the circulation of private bank notes, and was therefore an illegal association, and that he, though called the clerk of the company, was in truth its cashier, —he insisted, that this suit of the plaintiffs could not be entertained against him to enforce the performance of his contract with this illegal company, as its cashier.

It appeared, by the articles of association, by the bond given by the clerk for the faithful discharge of his duties, and by the accounts filed as exhibits in the cause, and indeed it was impliedly admitted in the bill, that this was a private company, associated to carry on business as a bank, and none other, and which, in fact, traded only as a bank; and that Berkshire was the cashier: that this was one of those unchartered banks, of which so many were formed
224 *about the same time, for the purpose of trading as banks, and circulating private bank notes, in violation or evasion of the statutes of 1792 and 1804, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 207, and which were suppressed by the statute of 1816, Id. ch. 208.

The chancellor ordered Berkshire to render an account of his transactions as clerk of the company; and by the account taken and reported accordingly, it appeared, that Berkshire was indebted to the company, 364 dollars; upon which the chancellor decreed, that he should pay the plaintiffs that sum with interest. And, on an appeal taken by Berkshire to this court, the decree was affirmed.

had signed and sealed it at the time when it was recorded as to the husband.

This was a writ of dower unde nihil habet, brought in the circuit court of Cumberland, by Susanna Langhorne, widow of William Langhorne deceased, against Thomas Hobson, to recover dower of land of her deceased husband, now claimed and held by Hobson. Hobson pleaded, that William Langhorne, the husband, in his lifetime, and the plaintiff Susanna his wife, by deed of bargain and sale, dated the 25th November 1807, and duly executed by her *as well as by her husband, according to the statute in such case made and provided, conveyed the land whereof the plaintiff claimed dower, to the defendant in fee, by which deed, so duly executed by the plaintiff, she conveyed and released to the defendant her right of dower in the land. And upon this plea, an issue was made up.

The point thus put in issue, and the only point in controversy, was, whether the plaintiff had duly executed the deed of the 25th November, 1807, under which the defendant claimed, so as to make it her deed as well as her husband's, according to the statute of 1792? At the trial, the plaintiff filed two bills of exceptions to opinions of the court—

The first stated that the defendant, to sustain the issue on his part, offered in evidence,—1st. A deed of bargain and sale, dated the 25th November 1807, purporting, in the premises, to be the deed of William Langhorne and Susanna his wife of the county of Cumberland, and appearing 226 *to be signed and sealed by the wife as well as the husband, whereby the land of which she now claimed her dower, described as lying in that county, was conveyed to the defendant, in fee. 2ndly, A commission, issued by the clerk of the county court of Cumberland, dated the 2nd May 1809, and directed to John Woodson and Samuel Hobson (without describing

them as justices of the county, though they were so in fact) by which, after reciting the execution of the deed by Langhorne and wife, and that she could not conveniently travel to the county court to make acknowledgment thereof, the commissioners were empowered to receive the acknowledgment, that the wife should be willing to make before them, of the deed, which was annexed to the commission; and then the commission proceeded in these words—“And we do, therefore, command you, that you do personally go to the said Susanna, and receive her acknowledgment of the said conveyance, and examine her privily and apart from the said William Langhorne, her husband, whether she doth the same, freely and voluntarily, without his persuasions or threats; and whether she be willing that the same shall be recorded in our said county court of Cumberland; and when you have received her acknowledgment and examined her as aforesaid, that you distinctly and openly certify us thereof in our said court, under your seals, sending then there the said deed and this writ.” 3rdly, A certificate of the two justices and commissioners, under their hands and seals, indorsed on the commission, in these words—“In obedience to the within commission to us directed, we have personally waited on the within named Susanna Langhorne, wife of the within named William Langhorne, and examined her privily and apart from her said husband; and she the said Susanna acknowledged the deed hereto annexed, to be her act and deed, and declared that she did the same freely and voluntarily, without the persuasion or threats of her said husband, and also relinquished her right of dower in the land within mentioned conveyed by the said deed, and is willing 227 that the same with *this her acknowledgment should be recorded in our county court of Cumberland—we the subscribers having read the said deed and explained the same to the said —” [here, there was a blank].—“All which” (it was stated in this bill of exceptions) “had been duly recorded in the county court of Cumberland.” And 4thly, The testimony of Samuel Hobson, one of the commissioners, the other John Woodson being dead, that Hobson's signature to the certificate was written by himself, and Woodson's signature by him, to authenticate the same as their joint official act. Whereupon, the plaintiff's counsel moved the court to exclude the commission and the certificate thereon indorsed, from going in evidence to the jury, on the ground, that the commission and certificate were not duly conformable with the statute in such case made and provided: but the court overruled the objection, and admitted the evidence: to which the plaintiff's counsel excepted.

The second bill of exceptions stated, that the deed of bargain and sale of Langhorne and wife (in the first bill of exceptions mentioned) was offered in evidence, with the certificate of the clerk of the county court, thereon indorsed, in these words—“Cumberland, December court, 1807, this deed was acknowledged and ordered to be recorded”—and that the commission for the privy examination of the wife, and the certificate of her privy examination, were also offered in evidence (without stating, in this bill of exceptions, that these had also been recorded); whereupon the plaintiff's counsel moved, that the deed, commission and certificate, should be excluded from going in evidence to the jury, because the deed had not been recorded together with the privy examination, after it had been signed by the wife, and acknowledged by her to be her act and deed, as certified by the commissioners: but the court overruled this objection also, and admitted the evidence: to which the plaintiff's counsel excepted.

*Old Rev. Code, ch. 90. § 6: Pleasant's ed. p. 157. 8. The words of the statute, are—“When husband and wife have sealed and delivered a writing, purporting to be a conveyance of any estate or interest, if she appear in court, and being examined privily and apart from her husband, by one of the judges thereof, shall declare to him that she did freely and willingly seal and deliver the said writing, to be then shewn and explained to her, and wishes not to retract it, and shall before the said court acknowledge the said writing, again shewn to her, to be her act,—or if before two justices of the peace of that county in which she dwelleth, if her dwelling be in the United States of America, who may be empowered by commission, to be issued by the clerk of the court wherein the writing ought to be recorded, to examine her privily, and take her acknowledgment, the wife being examined privily and apart from her husband by those commissioners, shall declare that she willingly signed and sealed the said writing, to be then shewn and explained to her by them, and consenteth that it may be recorded, and the said commissioners shall return, with the commission, and thereunto annexed, a certificate under their hands and seals of such privy examination by them, and of such declaration made and consent yielded by her,—in either case, the said writing, acknowledged also by the husband, or proved by witnesses to be his act, and recorded together with such her privy examination and acknowledgment before the court, or together with such commission and certificate, shall not only be sufficient to convey or release any right of dower thereby intended to be conveyed or released, but be as effectual for every other purpose, as if she were an unmarried woman.”—Note in Original Edition.

There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant; from which the plaintiff appealed to this court. And now, 228 *the cause was argued here, by Taylor for the appellant; there was no counsel for the appellee.

Taylor said, that the commission which issued from the clerk's office under which the privy examination of the wife was made, did not conform with the provisions of the statute. The statute required that the deed should be shewn to the feme covert, and explained to her, by the commissioners; the commission did not require them to shew and explain it to her: and if they did so, in fact, they exceeded the authority given them by the commission. The statute required, that the feme covert should declare before the commissioners, that she had willingly signed and sealed the deed; the commission in this case, did not require, that she should be asked, whether she had willingly signed and sealed it, or even whether she had signed it, or sealed it, at all, but only whether she then acknowledged it. But if the commission was in proper form, and gave authority to the commissioners to do every thing that the law required, still it is plain, the commissioners did not perform the duties imposed on them by the statute; at least, it does not appear by their certificate, that they did: they neither certified, that they shewed her the deed, nor that she declared to them she had willingly signed and sealed it, or that she wished not to retract it. If the form of this commission, and certificate of privy examination, be sufficient, and shall be adjudged to be a compliance with the statute; then, a deed executed by the husband, without the signature or seal of the wife, if two justices of the peace, to whom a commission shall be issued to take and certify the privy examination of the wife, shall certify that she acknowledged the deed before them, and consented that it might be recorded, although her name and seal may be affixed to the deed, at any time afterwards, by any person, without her knowledge or consent, such deed would convey her inheritance, or possibility of dower, against the plain words and obvious meaning of the statute.

The provisions of the statute were designed to protect the rights 229 *of the wife, not only against any fraud or imposition which the husband might be disposed to practise upon her, but against fraud and imposition from every quarter, and even against her own hasty and inconsiderate acts; and it was with this intent that it required, in case of a privy examination of a feme covert taken out of court, the presence of at least two commissioners, being justices of the peace, to act jointly and not separately: it required the commissioners to shew the feme covert the deed, in order that a spurious conveyance might not be imposed upon her: it required, that they should explain the conveyance to her, that she might not part with any right which she did not willingly and deliberately intend to part with: it also required, that she should inform the commissioners, that she had willingly signed and sealed the conveyance, and that she wished not to retract it, not that she acknowledged to them a writing to be her deed, at the time neither signed nor sealed by her, to be used as authority by the grantee, or any other person, to set her name and seal to it at any after time, and thereby make it an effectual conveyance or release of her rights. The statute obviously authorized the feme covert to annul her previous acts of signing and sealing, if she desired to retract them, at the very period of privy examination. The case of Ware v. Cary, 2 Call, 263, is not an authority for the judgment of the circuit court. It is true, the commission and privy examination, in this case, are like the commission and privy examination in that: but there, the commission and privy examination were in conformity with the statute of 1748, ch. 1, § 6, 5, Hen. Stat. at large, p. 410, under which the deed was executed, and the privy examination taken: here, the commission and privy examination were still conformed with the statute of 1748, though the deed was executed by the husband, and the privy examination of the wife was taken, not under that statute, but under the statute of 1792, which made many material alterations in the law on the subject, and enacted new provisions, manifestly for the purpose of more effectually guarding and protecting 230 *the rights and interests of femes covert. The enacting of these new provisions by the statute of 1792, evinced the legislative sense of their importance; but if the commission and privy examination, in this case, shall be held good, they being exactly in form and substance what the statute of 1748 required, it must be because the new provisions of the statute of 1792, not one of which was complied with, should be regarded as wholly idle and nugatory. It has been well said, that "it is clear, upon well received principles, that this statute must be strictly pursued; for it is an innovation upon the common law; and, moreover, it prescribes a mode in which a person may convey, who was before disabled to convey: that mode must, therefore, be pursued; and as we do not pursue it, if we vary from it, so it follows, that it must be strictly complied with." 1 Tucker's notes on Blac. Comm. book 2, ch. 17, p. 259.

As to the second bill of exceptions, he said, the question whether the opinion of the circuit court therein stated, was correct or no, depended on the construction of the statute of 1792; the words of which, in relation to this point, were—"In either case, the said writing, acknowledged also by the husband, or proved by witnesses to be his act, and recorded together with such privy examination and acknowledgment before the court, or together with such commission and certificate, shall not only be sufficient to convey or release any right of dower thereby intended to be conveyed or released, but be as effectual for every other purpose, as if she were an unmarried woman." The circuit court (as he understood the bill of exceptions) decided, that at the time the deed in question was admitted to record upon the acknowledgment of William Langhorne, the husband, it was not necessary, that it should have been signed and sealed by the wife, but that her signature and seal put to the deed at or before the privy examination, would make it a good and sufficient deed to bind her interests. The statute most certainly required, that the deed should be signed and sealed by the wife, as well as 231 by the husband, and be recorded, not when it was *the deed of the husband only, but after it had been signed and sealed by the wife. If the deed was signed and sealed by the husband only, and was admitted to record upon his acknowledgment, and was afterwards signed and sealed by the wife, it became by this subsequent signing and sealing of the wife, a new and a different deed from the deed of the husband which had been recorded. It was this new deed which only became the deed of the husband and wife, by her subsequently signing, sealing and delivering it, that the statute required should be recorded, to bind the rights of the wife; but it never was recorded, and therefore did not bind her rights.

Sed per curiam, the opinions of the circuit court are correct, and the judgment is affirmed.

Gore v. Buzzard's Adm'rs.

February, 1833.

Liability of Master for Transactions Carried on by Slave.—A person sends raw hides to a tanner, and receives tanned leather in return, by his slave: HELD, he is responsible to the tanner for the difference between the value of the raw material and the manufactured article, notwithstanding the dealings were conducted on his part wholly through the agency of the slave. It appearing that the slave acted by verbal directions of his master. Assumpsit*—Declaration—Allegations—Proof.—In assumpsit, there are two counts: one for the agreed price of goods sold; the other, quantum valebant for the same; on the general issue, the proof is, that plaintiff, being a tanner, received raw hides from defendant, and credited him for the value, and sent him in return tanned leather, and debited him with the value thereof, and the debt claimed is the balance appearing due the tanner on these dealings: HELD, the proof is properly applicable to, and sustains the declaration.

Assumpsit by Buzzard's administrators against Gore, in the county court of Frederick. The declaration contained, 1. the common count of indebitatus assumpsit for the agreed price of goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs' intestate to the defendant, and 2. a count of quantum valebant for *the same goods. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and the statute of limitations; but, it seemed,

no effort was made to sustain the latter plea.

At the trial, the defendant filed a demurrer to evidence, in which the plaintiffs joined. The evidence therein stated, was—That for some four or five years preceding the death of Buzzard, who was a tanner, Gore was in the habit of sending raw hides to Buzzard's tannery, and getting tanned leather from him; but he never transacted any part of these dealings in person, his raw hides having been always brought to the tannery, and the tanned leather always sent to him, by his slaves, without any written order from him, and indeed without a word passing between him and Buzzard on the subject; that since Buzzard's death, Gore had dealt with two other tanners in the neighbourhood, in the same manner, through the agency of his slaves; he always sending his raw hides and the tanners sending back tanned leather, by the slaves, without written orders from Gore, or a word said by him to the tanners; and the accounts of these tanners for the debts so contracted by Gore through the agency of his slaves, had been settled by him without dispute: that the items of Buzzard's account, namely, the charges for tanned leather sent Gore by his slaves, and the credits for raw hides brought by them, were first set down on a slate, and thence posted in a book by Buzzard himself; but Gore's dealings with Buzzard, as charged in those accounts, amounted to about the same per annum, as his dealings with the other two tanners afterwards: that, in fact, it was the habit of Gore, to send his raw hides to some tannery, and to receive tanned leather in exchange, by his slaves, only giving verbal directions to them, to deliver the raw hides, and bring back what tanned leather he wanted: that, after Buzzard's death, Gore desired a witness to apply to his administrators for his account; which being sent him, he examined it, and said, he would not pay interest (which the administrators had charged) but that if they would give him the credits he was entitled to, he would pay the principal, 233 *if any should be due: and that Gore procured the assignment of a bond of one of Buzzard's administrators, saying, he expected the amount of that bond would be enough to meet the claim of Buzzard's estate against him.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on the demurrer to evidence. The county court gave judgment on the demurrer for the defendant. Buzzard's administrators appealed to the circuit court, which reversed the judgment of the county court, and gave judgment for them. And then Gore appealed to this court.

Nicholas, for the appellant. 1st, The evidence did not sustain either count of the declaration. If it proved any contract, it was not a contract for the sale of tanned leather by Buzzard to Gore, either for a price certain and agreed, or for the reasonable value, but a contract for the exchange or barter of raw hides for tanned leather, from time to time. The customer or the manufacturer, as the case might be, was only bound to make good the difference between the value of the manufactured articles furnished by the one, and the raw material furnished by the other, if and whenever such difference should occur, by the delivery of like articles. 2ndly, The law of Virginia, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 19, p. 426, provides, that "no person whatever shall buy, sell or receive, of, to or from, a slave, any commodity whatever, without the leave or consent of the master, owner or overseer of such slave," and imposes a penalty on any person dealing with a slave without such leave or consent. It would defeat the policy of this statute, and be of mischievous consequence, if a person may be allowed to carry on (as Buzzard did in this case) dealings for a series of years, with the slaves of his neighbor, receiving raw materials from them, and delivering the manufactured article they ask for, without a word said by or to the owner on the subject, before, during, or after such dealings, and then to recover from the owner what may be due on the transaction, 234 *upon the implied leave or consent of the owner to the dealings of his slaves. The policy of the statute cannot be effectuated, but by requiring a person who deals with a slave, to have the express leave or consent of the owner, before or at the time of the dealings. Therefore, the evidence is insufficient in law to prove, that the agency of Gore's slaves in these dealings with Buzzard, was authorized by Gore; and the judgment of the county court was right,—as the judgment of a county court will generally be found to be, in all cases involving a question of police.
